(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1892.)

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—MANSLAUGHTER—DRUNKENNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where defendant, on trial for murder, pleaded self-defense, the court, after defining "malice" and "manslaughter," properly charged that "to reduce a felonious homicide from the grade of murder to that of manslaughter on the ground of sudden quarrel or heat of passion the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions; and it must appear that the party acted under the smart of his sudden passion and resentment."

2. The court properly charged that "to justify the killing of another in self-defense it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary;" the words "it must appear" clearly referring to defendant, and not to the jury. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

3. The court properly charged that, if defendant killed deceased in repelling an attempt by deceased to murder or to do great bodily harm to defendant, the killing was justifiable; the charge not limiting defendant's right to kill to the two cases specified.

4. The court properly charged that if deceased, seeing defendant draw a pistol, ran away, and defendant followed and overtook deceased, "unarmed, and showing no disposition to kill and murder defendant, and that defendant then and there, without believing himself in the danger of losing his own life at the hands" of deceased, killed deceased, no self-defense is shown. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

5. The court, after defining the two degrees of murder, charged that, in determining the degree, evidence of defendant's mental condition was a proper subject for the consideration of the jury, and continued: "The fact that defendant was drunk does not render the act less criminal, and in that sense it is not available as an excuse. But there is nothing in this case to exclude it as evidence on the question as to whether the act was deliberate and premeditated. It was murder, whether premeditated or not." The court then added that there was no presumption of law in favor of either of the two degrees of murder, the question being one of fact, to be determined by the jury. Held correct, as the jury would not, from the use of the word "murder," understand that the court considered defendant guilty of murder, or that it was their duty so to return a verdict. BEATTY, C. J., and DE HAVEN and PATERSON, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

George H. W. Bruggy was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Sims and J. A. Barham, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of murder of the first degree, and is under sentence of death. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, and insists that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict. The jury had before them many eye-witnesses to the homicide, and also evidence showing all the surrounding circumstances. There was some evidence tending to prove the guilt of the defendant as charged, and for that reason, under well-settled principles, we would not be justified in setting aside the verdict. It is insisted that many of the instructions containing the law of the case, as given by the court to the jury, were erroneous, and prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. The instructions necessary to consider in the discussion of this question are as follows:

"(1) Malice may be express or implied. It is express when there is manifest a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow-creature. It is implied when no considerable provocation appears, or when the circumstances attending the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart.

"(2) Under the information in this case the defendant may, if the evidence warrant it, be convicted of manslaughter. This is defined by our statute to be the unlawful killing of a human being without malice, and is of two kinds: First, voluntary, upon a sudden quarrel, or heat of passion; second, involuntary, in the commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to felony, or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection.

"(3) To reduce a felonious homicide from the grade of murder to that of manslaughter, upon the ground of sudden quarrel or heat of passion, the provocation must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to excite and arouse the passions; and it must appear that the party acted under the smart of his sudden passion and resentment.

"(4) Upon the law of self-defense I instruct you as follows: To justify the killing of another in self-defense it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary. And it must appear that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline further trouble before the fatal shot was fired. If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, George Bruggy, at the time he fired the fatal shot which killed the deceased, Dick Louison, (if he did fire such shot and kill him,) believed, and had good reason to believe, that his life was in imminent danger at the hands of said Dick Louison, then I charge you that defendant was justifiable in firing said shot, and you should acquit him.

"(5) If the jury believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant, Bruggy, killed the deceased by shooting him, and that the shooting was done by Bruggy in resenting an attack on the part of the deceased to murder him, Bruggy, or an attempt on the part of the deceased to do great bodily harm to him, Bruggy, then, in such a case, I instruct you the killing by Bruggy was justifiable, and you should find the defendant not guilty. The rule in such a case is this: What would a reasonable person—a person with ordinary caution, judgment, and observation—in the position of the defendant, seeing what he saw, and knowing what he knew, suppose from his situation and his surroundings?

"(6) If such reasonable person, so placed, would have been justified in believing himself in imminent danger, then the defendant would be justified in believing himself in such peril, and in acting on such appearances. The defendant is not justified because he actually believed he was in imminent danger. When the danger is only apparent, and not actual and real, the question is, would a reasonable man, under all the circumstances, be justified in such belief? If so, the defendant would be justified. If this was the defendant's position, it was his right to repel the aggression, and fully protect himself from such apparent danger.

"(7) If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, while upon the sidewalk, drew his pistol, with a deliberate intent to kill and murder Dick Louison, and that Dick Louison saw the pistol, and, believing himself in danger of the defendant, ran away, and through the alley, and into the saloon, to avoid the defendant; and you further believe from the evidence that the defendant, with intent to willfully and deliberately kill and murder Louison, entered and passed through the saloon, with the pistol in his hand, for the purpose of overtaking or meeting him and killing him; and you further believe from the evidence that he did meet the deceased coming into the saloon, through one of the back doors of the saloon, unarmed, and showing no disposition to kill and murder the defendant, and that the defendant, then and there, without believing himself in danger of losing his own life at the hands of Dick Louison, fired the fatal shot, and killed said Louison,—then I instruct you the evidence shows no self-defense."

Appellant's counsel insist that instruction No. 3 is erroneous, "because, in effect, it tells the jury that, although the defendant acted under the heat of passion, it could not be manslaughter, unless the provocation was of such a character as would naturally excite and arouse the passions of an average man; for the question is not whether some other person would probably have been excited or thrown into a passion by similar circumstances, but whether the defendant acted upon a sudden quarrel, or heat of passion." The instruction is clearly and entirely correct, and the principle of law as announced by appellant has no support in authority. As to the latter portion of the instruction, that "it must appear that the party acted under the smart of his sudden passion and resentment," it is so evident that such must of necessity be the law that we refrain from a discussion of the matter. The provocation to reduce a killing in the heat of passion from murder to manslaughter must be of such a character as would be naturally calculated to "excite and arouse the passions." In the words of the law, it must be a considerable provocation. Persons are not allowed to work themselves into a heat of passion upon any trivial pretext whatever, and in that condition commit homicide, and then set up the plea of manslaughter. Under such circumstances, the crime would be murder, for the law says that "malice is implied when no considerable provocation appears." Prior to the adoption of the Codes, the statute of this state provided that, in order to constitute voluntary manslaughter, "there must be a serious and highly provoking injury inflicted upon the person killing, sufficient to excite an irrestible passion in a reasonable person." Section 1427, Hit. Gen. Laws. While no similar provision is found in the Penal Code, yet it has never been even suggested that the law pertaining to the subject of manslaughter underwent any change upon the adoption of the Code. Such provision was probably omitted from the Code upon the ground that it was entirely unnecessary, and surplusage, being simply a reiteration of a principle of law settled and established by all text-writers upon the subject.

In East, P. C. p. 234, the author says: "It must not, however, be understood that any trivial provocation which in point of law amounts to an assault, or even a blow, will of course reduce the crime of the party killing to manslaughter. This I know has been supposed by some, but there is no authority for it in the law; for where the punishment inflicted for a slight transgression of any sort is outrageous in its nature, either in the manner of the continuance of it, or beyond all proportion to the offense, it is rather to be considered as the effect of a brutal and diabolical malignity than of human frailty. It is one of the true symptoms of what the law denominates malice; and therefore the crime will amount to murder, notwithstanding such provocation." In the case of Nichols v. Com., 11 Bush, 586, the court said: "Heat of passion, in order to reduce a killing with a deadly weapon from murder to manslaughter, must have arisen from some provocation, which, out of a tender regard for the weakness of human nature, the law deems sufficient to arouse passions which the party for the moment is unable to control. But we know of no case in whch heat of passion, without regard to the cause producing it, has been held to reduce an unlawful killing with a deadly weapon from murder to manslaughter." In the case of People v. Freel, 48 Cal. 437, this court said: "But when the mortal blow is struck in the heat of passion, excited by a quarrel sudden, and of sufficient violence to amount to adequate provocation, the law, out of forbearance for the weakness of human nature, will disregard the actual intent, and will reduce the offense to manslaughter." Nothing is more surely calculated to arouse the blood of some men to a heat of passion than grievous words of reproach, yet no words are sufficient provocation to reduce an offense from murder to manslaughter; and this principle is so well established in this state that discussion would be out of place. As to the general principle, see 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 472; Rex v. Lynch, 5 Car. & P. 324; State v. Tooky, 2 Rice, Dig. 104.

Appellant's counsel, with argument and authority, attack that portion of instruction No. 4 which reads: "To justify the killing of another in self-defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary." Counsel places a construction upon this charge which is strained, not warranted by the language used, and undoubtedly never intended by the court who gave it. Counsel insist that the instruction should be interpreted as if it read: "To justify the killing of another in self-defense it must appear (to the jury) that the danger was so urgent, etc., that the killing was absolutely necessary." The proper construction to be placed upon it is: "To justify the killing of another in self-defense it must appear (to a defendant) that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life, or to prevent his receiving great bodily harm, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary." This seems to be the natural construction; the personal pronoun "his" thus plainly referring to its antecedent, "defendant." By the other construction there is absolutely no antecedent in the clause to which the pronoun "his" could refer. The court was stating an abstract proposition of law pertaining to the right of self-defense, possibly too liberally for a defendant, as it omits the qualification that it must appear to him "as a reasonable man." Reading the proposition of law, as embodied in this instruction, from a text-book, it would be absurd to say that the verb "must appear" related to the jury, or to anybody other than the actor in the homicide, the party killing. To support their contention in this regard appellant's counsel rely upon the case of People v. Flahave, 58 Cal. 249, and undoubtedly that case is directly opposed to the views here expressed; but the opinion is not indorsed by a unanimous court, and stands alone in the Reports of this state, for the cases of People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 577, 12 Pac. Rep. 783, and People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 16 Pac. Rep. 537, upon which counsel rely to give it support, entirely fail in that regard. Upon the contrary, the great weight of authority supports the validity of this instruction. This identical instruction was given by the court in People v. Nichol, 34 Cal. 217, and, referring to the instructions given to the jury in that case, the court said; "They are not even obnoxious to criticism." The same instruction was again given in People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 119. The court, after remarking that it had examined the charge to the jury with great care, said: "It is a long charge, completely covering all the points in the case, and is, in our opinion, entirely correct." It was again before the court in People v. Gray, 61 Cal. 164, and the case was reversed upon other grounds. And in People v. Morine, found in the same volume of Reports, (369,) the instruction was again given verbatim, and, referring to it, the court said: "It is claimed that the instruction given was disapproved by this court in the case of People v. Flahave, and it may be conceded for the purposes of this case that the position taken by the learned counsel for the defense is correct, but it does not follow therefrom that the judgment of the court should be reversed. If other instructions were given, which qualify and explain the objectionable instruction, the whole charge will be considered; and if, as a whole, it correctly presents the law applicable to the case, the judgment will not be reversed. In other words, it is not necessary that each instruction should fully state the law of the case, but an instruction may be helped out and explained by another on the same point; and in such case the court will look to all the instructions in pari materia for the purpose of determining whether the law has been correctly given to the jury;" and the court affirmed the judgment. In People v. Herbert, which is also found in 61 Cal. 546, the same instruction was again directly approved. It was also given and approved in People v. Raten, 63 Cal. 425; People v. Turcott, 65 Cal. 129, 3 Pac. Rep. 461; and People v. Guidice, 73 Cal. 228, 15 Pac. Rep. 44. In the latter case the opinion was written by Justice TEMPLE, and concurred in by the whole court. The learned justice said: "The instruction in regard to the right to act in self-defense was taken from the case of People v. Iams, 57 Cal. 115, and has been approved by this court. It correctly lays down the law on the subject;" and, in speaking of the instruction given by the court in the Flahave Case, said: "This instruction was not qualified by any statement of the right to act upon apparent danger. Here the right of the defendant to act upon appearances was fully and clearly stated." The same reasoning, applied to this case, takes it also out of the authority of the Flahave Case; for here, as in the Guidice Case, the right of the defendant to act upon appearances was fully and clearly stated to the jury by the court. The doctrine of apparent danger was repeatedly explained to the jury. It is stated in a subsequent portion of the instruction under discussion, and is reiterated in various forms in the three following instructions. It would seem that this instruction has been before the court many times in the past, and with but a single exception has been sustained; many times as an abstract proposition of law, and many times when read and considered in connection with other instructions. As we have already seen, it can only be correct as an abstract proposition when the appearances "are directed to the defendant;" and, if superior courts are still inclined to give this instruction, it would be clearer and more satisfactory if the words, "to the defendant as a reasonable man," were inserted after the verb "must appear." The jury, as men of ordinary intelligence, must have understood that the defendant was justifiable in killing the deceased when it appeared to him as a reasonable man that he was in danger of losing his life, or suffering great bodily injury. Indeed, taking all the instructions upon the question of self-defense pari materia, as was said in People v. Morine, supra, the jury could not have been misled upon the question.

Counsel insist that instruction No. 5 is erroneous, inasmuch as it confined the defendant's right to kill the deceased to a state of facts where the deceased was endeavoring to "murder Bruggy, or do him some great bodily harm;" and that it should have stated further that "an attempt to kill Bruggy by the deceased, either with or without malice aforethought," would have warranted the defendant in taking the life of the deceased. The instruction is entirely correct, and does not attempt to limit or confine the right of the defendant to kill the deceased only in the case of an attack to murder, or an attempt to do great bodily harm. If the defendant desired an instruction including other and additional conditions, he should have asked for it. People v. Franklin, 70 Cal. 642, 11 Pac. Rep. 797; People v. Northey, 77 Cal. 618, 19 Pac. Rep. 865, and 20 Pac. Rep. 129.

Counsel complain of instruction No. 7. It is based upon a hypothesis founded upon evidence in the case; and, if the facts existed as stated in the instruction, there is no question of self-defense involved, for the hypothesis stated makes a case of murder. If one person, with murder in his heart, and a deadly weapon in his hand, pursues and overtakes another, and then and there fires the fatal shot, he is guilty of murder, regardless of what the deceased may have been doing at the moment of the shooting, for murder was in his heart, and he acted upon that malice, and not upon any appearances created by the deceased. Again, if he had murder in his heart when he overtook the deceased, and then and there fired the fatal shot, no question of his declining a further struggle is involved in the issue. We think the instruction correct.

We see no error in the instruction given to the jury upon the question of drunkenness. As a principle of abstract law, the instruction is entirely correct. The court defined the two degrees of murder, and then instructed the jury as to the effect of the evidence of drunkenness upon the question of degree of the crime. In using the word "murder," the jury, as men of average intelligence, certainly did not understand that the court considered the defendant guilty of murder, or that it was their duty to so return their verdict. Necessarily is this the fact when we consider that previously the court had fully instructed the jury as to the definition of "manslaughter," and stated to them that under the information and the evidence the defendant could be convicted of such offense.

While some of these instructions might have been improved to their advantage in clearness, we see no error sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment. The practical administration of justice should not be defeated by a too rigid adherence to a close and technical analysis of the instructions of the court. The instructions are for the enlightenment of the jury as to the law of the case, and a jury never enters into such character of analysis in construing them. In this case the evidence discloses that the killing of the deceased was to some extent the result of a drunken brawl; and it would seem that a verdict by the jury of imprisonment for life would have satisfied the law, but that is not a question to be here considered. The law gives the power of fixing the punishment in such cases to the jury, and the only appeal from their decision as to that matter is to the executive. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Harrison, J.; Sharpstein, J.

De Haven, J. I dissent. In my opinion, the court erred in giving the following instruction: "If the murder was deliberate and premeditated, it was murder of the first degree; otherwise, it was murder of the second degree. And in determining the degree, any evidence tending to show the mental status of the defendant is a proper subject for the consideration of the jury. The fact that defendant was drunk does not render the act less criminal, and in that sense it is not available as an excuse. But there is nothing in this case to exclude it as evidence upon the question as to whether the act was deliberate and premeditated. It was murder, whether premeditated or not. And, as between the two degrees of the offense, there is no presumption or intendment of law in favor of the first. Presumptively every killing is murder. But, so far as the degree is concerned, no presumption arises from the mere fact of the killing, considered separately and apart from the circumstances under which the killing occurred. The question is one of fact, to be determined by the jury from the evidence in the case, and is not a matter of legal conclusion." This instruction was given in connection with others relating to the purpose for which the evidence of defendant's drunkenness was received, and doubtless the court in its charge intended to state the familiar rule which is found in section 22 of the Penal Code, to the effect that the jury might consider such evidence for the purpose of determining whether the defendant was capable, at the time of the homicide, of acting with that peculiar deliberation which is necessary in order to make an unlawful killing murder of the first degree; that is, whether his mental condition was such that he could and did form in his mind a design deliberately and premeditatedly to take the life of deceased. But it must be conceded, I think, that the language chosen was not sufficiently guarded. The use of the word "murder" throughout the instruction, and particularly in the sentence, "it was murder, whether premeditated or not," must have been understood by the jury as intended to apply to the particular case before them, and indirectly as an expression of what the judge believed the evidence to establish. Instructions should not, directly or indirectly, assume or suggest that a defendant is guilty of any degree of crime. People v. Lanagan, 81 Cal. 144, 22 Pac. Rep. 482. And when a defendant claims that the act of killing was done in self-defense, the act should not be spoken of by the judge as a murder.

I concur: Beatty, C. J.

Paterson, J., (dissenting.) In my opinion, the seventh instruction was clearly erroneous. If the defendant declined any further struggle immediately prior to the firing of the shot, although he was the assailant, he was justified in shooting the deceased, if he believed upon reasonable ground that he was in danger of receiving great bodily injury. Pen. Code, § 197, subd. 3. The instruction ignores the fact that the defendant may have declined any further struggle, and tells the jury, in effect, that the defendant was not justified in shooting the deceased if he was the assailant, unless he believed that he was in danger of losing his own life. I think that the learned judge of the court below erred also in giving the fourth instruction, and the instruction upon the question of drunkenness. This court granted a rehearing in this case because in the opinion of the majority the petition for a rehearing presented a new point, as to which there were grave doubts. It is practically admitted in the opinion of the majority affirming the judgment of the court below that the case upon the evidence is a close one. If, therefore, the instructions are contradictory or confusing, the court should be willing to grant the defendant another trial. There are cases in which the appellate court can say that, although the instructions are somewhat contradictory, yet, taken as a whole, upon all the evidence in the case, it is clear that no prejudice resulted to the defendant; but in this case the evidence is of such a character, it seems to me, that the infliction of the death penalty, at least, was unjust, and, unless the instructions are clear and fair in all respects, a new trial should be granted. The evidence shows without conflict that the deceased and the defendant were personal friends, and there is nothing to show that they had ever before had any difficulty. Both were drinking heavily, evidently, and were in a maudlin state. The defendant took offense at something the deceased said or did, and persistently annoyed him, and provoked deserved chastisement. The deceased was a much larger and a more powerful man than the defendant. The defendant had a fractured arm. The deceased threw the defendant violently upon the floor three times before the final struggle. After throwing the defendant down the third time, and slapping his face, the deceased took out a pocket-knife, and, holding it in his hand, said to Bruggy, "This is the way we fight in Germany." There seems to be a conflict as to whether Bruggy had exhibited any weapon before the deceased took out his knife. When the deceased saw the defendant's pistol he ran around the saloon, through the alley, and into the back room of the saloon. The parties met right at the back of the saloon, and the deceased immediately grabbed the defendant by the arms, and pushed him back several feet to the billiard table, and was pushing him over against it, when the fatal shot was fired. What occurred beyond what has been stated, or what, if anything, was said by either party after they met at the rear door of the saloon, and before the shot was fired, does not appear in the evidence. If the defendant did decline further struggle, he certainly was justified in shooting the deceased, if he believed that he was in danger of receiving great bodily harm. The court cannot say, as matter of law, that he did not decline further combat. That was a question peculiarly the province of the jury to determine, and the law should have been given to the jury upon such an assumption.

DAWSON v. SCHLOSS et al. (No. 14,085.)

JUDGMENT AGAINST TWO DEFENDANTS—NEW TRIAL AS TO ONE—MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE —INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL.

1. Where two defendants are sued jointly for malicious prosecution, and judgment is rendered against them, but one defendant obtains a new trial, a judgment for a less amount may be rendered against him, while the former judgment remains in force against the other.

2. In an action for a malicious prosecution, defendant cannot contend on appeal that the evidence does not justify the verdict that defendant prosecuted plaintiff maliciously, and without probable cause, unless these points are specified in the statement on motion for a new trial.

3. Where plaintiff, for the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness, is permitted to read to him a portion of his testimony on the former trial, and to ask him if he so testified, but the witness does not answer, and the portion read is afterwards stricken out, if error to permit the reading, it is not reversible, when the testimony read contains nothing which defendant does not admit.

4. In an action for malicious prosecution for perjury, where it appears that the attorney for defendant advised him that there was "probable cause" for believing that plaintiff had perjured himself in a certain suit, defendant's attorney cannot testify as to what plaintiff's attorney said in such suit without showing that plaintiff was present or assented.

5. In an action for malicious prosecution for perjury, where it appears that in a former suit plaintiff verified an answer alleging that he had paid the rent for certain property, and where there is evidence tending to prove that he had good reason to believe, and did believe, that the rent had been paid by him, and that defendant so understood it at the time he commenced the prosecution, it is not error for the court to refuse to charge that, if the rent had not been paid at the time the answer was sworn to, there was probable cause that plaintiff had committed perjury.

6. In an action for malicious prosecution, the erroneous sentence in an instruction to the jury that "if you find, in this case, that malice existed on defendant's part, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover," is not ground for reversal, where three times before and once after this sentence the court charged that before plaintiff could recover he must prove that the prosecution was both malicious and without probable cause; and especially where the record shows that the instruction was at defendant's request.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by George Dawson against Sigmund B. Schloss and Phillip Hinkle. On the first trial plaintiff recovered a judgment against both defendants for $5,000. A new trial was granted to Schloss, and a verdict and judgment for $3,000 was rendered against him; from which judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. H. H. Lowenthal, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for malicious prosecution on a charge of perjury in verifying an answer in an action by Schloss and others against Dawson and others. On the first trial plaintiff recovered a judgment against both defendants for the sum of $5,000 and costs. A new trial was granted to Schloss alone. The new trial resulted in a verdict and judgment against Schloss for $3,000, and Schloss alone appeals from this judgment against him, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Both trials were by jury, and the judgment against Hinkle remains in force, but wholly unsatisfied.

1. It is contended by counsel for appellant that no judgment should have been rendered against Schloss on the new trial so long as the original judgment of $5,000 existed against Hinkle; that "while separate suits may be brought against each of joint tort-feasors, yet it is well settled that if the defendants are sued jointly, as here, there can be but one verdict and judgment." Such is not the prevailing rule in the United States. Says Judge Cooley at page 159 of his book on Torts, (2d Ed.:) "The rule laid down by that eminent jurist, KENT, in Livingston v. Bishop, 1 Johns. 290, and which has since been generally followed in this country, in that the party injured may bring separate suits against the wrong-doers, and proceed to judgment in each, and that no bar arises to any of them until satisfaction is received." See cases cited in note. The same author, on page 160, says: "It is to be observed, in respect to the point above considered, where the bar accrues in favor of some of the wrong-doers by reason of what has been received from or done in respect to one or more others, that the bar arises, not from any particular form that the proceeding assumes, but from the fact that the injured party has actually received satisfaction, or what in law is deemed the equivalent." This passage is quoted with implied approval by Mr. Justice McKinstry, in Urton v. Price, 57 Cal. 270. See, also, Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 164, 4 Pac. Rep. 1165. There is nothing in the California cases cited by counsel for appellant opposed to the above quotations from Judge Cooley. There is no pretense that any part of the judgment against Hinkle has been paid or satisfied, or even that execution has been taken out upon that judgment.

2. In their brief, counsel for appellant make and specify the point that the evidence does not justify the verdict that defendant prosecuted plaintiff maliciously, or without probable cause. Counsel for respondent object to the consideration of this point, for the alleged reason that it is not specified in the statement on motion for new trial; and in my opinion this objection should be sustained. The truth of several propositions of fact are essential to constitute a cause of action for malicious prosecution, which must be alleged in the complaint, and which are alleged in this complaint. Among them are the two propositions that the proscution was malicious, and that it was without probable cause. There is no specification in the statement on motion for new trial that either of these is not justified by the evidence. Under the head of "Specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict," counsel undertake to allege what "the evidence shows,"—which is unnecessary and out of place in the specifications required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procdure,—yet do not allege even "that the evidence shows" either of the two propositions to be untrue. Indeed, neither of these propositions is stated or referred to in the so-called "specifications." It is further alleged: "There is no evidence to support the verdict as against the defendant Schloss." But this is not a specification of any particular one of the several facts involved in and affirmed by the verdict. If this is sufficient, it would be sufficient, in any case tried without a jury, to allege merely that there is no evidence to support the findings of fact, even though there may be 20 distinct findings of fact. Edelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 277. Of course, the specification is not required to be made in any particular form of words, but, in some form, should distinguish each particular proposition of fact excepted to from all others found by the court, or involved in a general verdict of a jury. Hence it has been held that a statement that there is no evidence to support a particular finding of fact is a sufficient specification of the particular finding alleged not to be justified by the evidence, (Knott v. Peden, 84 Cal. 300, 24 Pac. Rep. 160;) and such a specification of a particular fact involved in a general verdict would probably be held sufficient. The principal object of requiring these specifications in statements on motions for new trial, and in bills of exceptions, is to abbreviate the statement of evidence by restricting it to such as is relevant and material to prove or disprove the specified fact. By the specifications required, the opposing party and the judge are notified of the exact points of contest, and thereby enabled to determine what evidence should be brought into the statement, and what should be excluded therefrom. Without such specifications the judge could not perform the duty enjoined upon him "to strike out of it [the statement or bill of exceptions] all redundant and useless matter, and to make the statement truly represent the case," (Code Civil Proc. §§ 650, 659;) nor would the opposing party have any means of distinguishing what portions of the evidence would be redundant from that which tends to prove the issue on his part; and the consequence would generally be that all the evidence would be brought into the statement or bill of exceptions, though nine-tenths of it were irrelevant and useless. So important were the required specifications in a statement on motion for new trial regarded by the legislature that it enacted, "If n such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion," (Code Civil Proc. § 659;) and this penalty has been enforced by this court in so many cases that there seems to be no excuse for failure to comply with the Code rule, especially as a compliance with the rule is not difficult in any case; it being much easier to state, in a few lines, each distinct proposition of fact not justified by the evidence, than, as is often done, to cover pages with a restatement of evidence, and of counsels' arguments and inferences therefrom, as to what the evidence shows, and thus obscuring, if not entirely concealing, the specific points to be contested upon the hearing of the motion or on appeal. But should it be conceded that the specifications are sufficient, I think the statement on motion for a new trial contains evidence tending to prove both malice and want of probable cause; and although such evidence, as it appears in the record, may seem to be overbalanced by rebutting evidence, it is nevertheless sufficient, under the well-settled rule of this court, to justify the verdict of the jury.

3. Appellant contends that he was advised by counsel that there was probable cause for believing respondent guilty of perjury; that he in good faith acted upon such advice; and, therefore, that he is not responsible, even though there may have been no probable cause. In order to avail himself of this defense, it devolved upon the defendant to prove that, before receiving the advice, he had fairly and fully communicated to his counsel, or at least that his counsel knew, all the facts within defendant's knowledge tending to prove or to disprove probable cause for the prosecution; and also that at the time of commencing the prosecution the defendant believed the plaintiff to be guilty as charged. Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 144. Did the defendant make the required communication to his own counsel? And did he believe the plaintiff guilty at the time he made his affidavit to that effect? These questions having been properly submitted to the jury with proper instructions by the court, the verdict necessarily implies that the jury answered one of them, at least, in the negative; and, since there is no specification that the evidence did not justify the verdict in any particular, the verdict is conclusive of all facts necessarily implied in it. Besides, I think there was evidence tending to prove that the defendant did not fully state to his counsel the facts within his knowledge tending to exculpate the plaintiff from the charge of perjury. To make this fairly appear, however, would require a tedious statement of the evidence, which, in view of the defective specifications of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient, is deemed unnecessary.

4. Plaintiff called as a witness the defendant Hinkle, whose memory seemed bad, and for the purpose of refreshing his memory was permitted, against the objection of defendant, to read to the witness a portion of his testimony on the former trial, and to ask him if he so testified. The witness did not answer this question, and what was so read as his former testimony was afterwards stricken out by the court. Again, plaintiff's counsel asked the witness if he did not give a certain answer to a certain question on the former trial, to which witness answered, "I cannot recollect the words." Under the circumstances it does not appear that the action of the court amounted to an abuse of discretion; but, if it did, the defendant was not injured by it. The portion of Hinkle's former testimony which was read, contained nothing prejudicial to defendant which defendant did not admit in his own testimony, viz., that in a certain conversation he (defendant) "spoke of arresting Dawson for perjury." When the witness answered that he did not recollect what was his answer to a certain question on the former trial, his answer at the former trial was not read; and the only possible ground of objection to this last question is that it was in the nature of cross-examination of plaintiff's own witness, but this ground of objection was not stated.

5. It was claimed on the trial that Mr. Olney's advice to defendant as to "probable cause" was grounded in part upon knowledge derived from others than defendant; and Mr. Olney, as a witness for defendant, was asked to state what Mr. McGowan, as Dawson's attorney, had said while representing Dawson on the trial of the case in which Dawson was charged with perjury in his answer, without showing that Dawson was present, or in any way assented to what McGowan said. After testifying that he was present in court on that occasion, Mr. Olney testified as follows: "Mr. Reddy. Question. Were you informed in any way by Mr. McGowan or any other person, on the part of Dawson, at any time, as to what the defendant (Dawson) meant by the plea of payment in that answer?" An objection to this question was sustained by the court. "Q. Were you informed of what the plaintiff meant by his plea of payment in that answer? Answer. I cannot answer that question exactly by 'Yes' or 'No.' If you will fix the time and place, I can state what I remember. Q. After the answer was filed, were you informed? A. Well, I can say 'Yes,' if you will allow me to modify my answer, because it is a little too sweeping. The Court. You can explain it. A. (continued.) With that understanding, I say 'Yes,' but I desire to explain it. I will have to state what I said in court, and what Mr. McGowan, respresenting Mr. Dawson, said. The Court. That is what I have ruled out. Witness. That is all I know about it,—what took place in the court-room at the time of the trial before Judge REARDEN on the 1st day of June; and it was said by Mr. McGowan, who was there representing Mr. Dawson. It came up in regard to this answer; and it was a statement in regard to the answer. The Court. Then the objection is sustained." I think the objection was properly sustained.

6. It is insisted that certain instructions asked by defendant's counsel, (numbered 2, 12, 13, and 15,) and refused by the court, should have been given. The whole substance of Nos. 2, 12, 15, and so much of No. 13 as is correct, was substantially given in other instructions. Number 13 is erroneous, in that the court is asked to charge that if the jury believed "that a demand for rent and possession of the premises in question was made upon Dawson on the 25th day of February, 1885, and that the rent had not been paid at the time the answer in said suit was sworn to and filed, there was 'probable cause,'" etc. From these facts it would not necessarily follow that Dawson's verified answer that the rent had been paid by him was willfully false, nor that Schloss had reasonable grounds for so believing. The instructions, as asked, entirely ignore the evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending to prove that he had good reasons to believe, and did believe, that the rent had been paid by him, and that Schloss so understood at the time he commenced the prosecution of plaintiff for perjury.

7. It is also insisted that in three particulars the instructions given are erroneous. The court introduced its instructions to the jury in the following language: "Gentlemen of the jury, at the request of the defendant in this case I give you the following instructions." Then follow all the instructions shown to have been given. With one exception these instructions are quite as favorable to defendant as he was entitled to ask. At folio 318 the following erroneous sentence is found in the instructions given: "If you find in this case that malice existed upon his (defendant's) part, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover." Three times before and once after this sentence the court correctly and distinctly instructed the jury that before the plaintiff could recover he must prove that the prosecution was both malicious and without probable cause. The introduction of the erroneous sentence, whether by the court or by defendant's attorney, was probably accidental, as it is inconsistent with four other instructions given. The record, in the language of the court, shows that the erroneous instruction was given at the request of the defendant; and nothing to the contrary being suggested, except the improbability that defendant's counsel excepted to instructions asked by themselves, and as it is not impossible that counsel for defendant excepted to instructions requested by themselves, (People v. Lopez, 59 Cal. 362; Harrison v. Spring Val. H. G. Co., 65 Cal. 376, 4 Pac. Rep. 381,) the record must be taken as decisive of the question. The consequence is that appellant's exceptions to the instructions given should be disregarded. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: Fitzgerald, C.; Foote, C.

Smith v. McDermott. (No. 12,844.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 19, 1892.)

Bond for Costs—Action for Slander—Sufficiency—Validity of Act.

1. Under St. 1871-72, p. 533, requiring plaintiff in an action for slander to file an undertaking with sureties who shall annex to such undertaking an affidavit that they are residents "within the county," and whose qualifications "shall be as required in their affidavits," such sureties must be residents within the county in which the action is brought.

2. Such act having been passed by the same legislature that adopted the four Codes, including the Code of Civil Procedure, but subsequent to such adoption, it was not repealed by any provision in said Code inconsistent with the act.

3. If such act were inconsistent with any provision of any of the Codes, the act must prevail, under Pol. Code, § 4479, giving precedence over the Codes to all acts passed at the same session that adopted the Codes.

4. Such act is not a special law, and as such inconsistent with Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3, and art. 22, § 1, providing that the legislature shall not pass special laws regulating the practice in courts of justice.

5. If such act were a special law, it, having been passed prior to the adoption of the constitution, would not be affected thereby.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; E. F. Head, Judge.

Action by Mary Smith against Hugh McDermott. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellant. Edward F. Fitzpatrick and George N. Buck, (Henry W. Walker, of counsel,) for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action to recover damages for slander. The complaint was filed in the superior court of San Mateo county on the 28th day of March, 1887. The summons was issued on the 18th of February, 1888, and on that day the plaintiff filed a written undertaking, in the sum of $500, to meet the requirements of the "Act concerning actions for libel and slander," passed March 23, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 533.) The undertaking was executed in the city and county of San Francisco, and in the affidavit annexed thereto each of the sureties stated that he was "a resident and freeholder within the state of California." As a matter of fact each of the sureties was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco. On the 29th of February, 1888, "and within the time allowed by law," the defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that he excepted to the sureties, and each of them, and that he required them to appear before the judge of the superior court of San Mateo county, at a specified time and place, to justify as such sureties, as prescribed by section 3 of the act of 1872. At the time and place named the two sureties appeared before the said judge, and were examined as to their sufficiency by counsel on both sides, and were approved, as shown by an order of the court entered on its minutes. Afterwards, on March 31, 1888, the defendant served on the plaintiff notice that he would move the court to dismiss the action, on the ground that an undertaking, as required by the act of 1872, had not been filed. This motion came on for hearing in April, and was argued before the court, and submitted upon briefs filed by the respective parties. After considering the matter, the court granted the motion on the ground that, "since the commencement of said action, no sufficient undertaking has ever been filed herein." An order dismissing the action was thereupon entered, and from this order, which was duly excepted to, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The act of 1872 provides as follows: "Section 1. In an action for libel or slander the clerk shall, before issuing the summons therein, require a written undertaking on the part of the plaintiff in the sum of five hundred (500) dollars, with at least two competent and sufficient sureties, specifying their occupations and residences, to the effect that, if the action be dismissed, or the defendant recover judgment, that they will pay such costs and charges as may be awarded against the plaintiff by judgment, or in the progress of the action, or on an appeal, not exceeding the sum specified in the undertaking. An action brought without filing the undertaking required shall be dismissed. Sec. 2. Each of the sureties on the undertaking mentioned in the first section shall annex to the same an affidavit that he is a resident and householder or freeholder within the county, and is worth double the amount," etc. "Sec. 3. * * * The qualifications of the sureties shall be as required in their affidavits." These sections are parts of one act, and must be read and construed together. When so read it clearly appears that the sureties, to be "competent and sufficient," must have the qualifications required in their affidavits. One of the qualifications required to be stated in the affidavits is that the surety is a resident "within the county." This evidently means within the county in which the action is brought. Here the sureties were not residents of the county of San Mateo, and therefore they were not, in this regard, competent and sufficient. But the affidavits are to be annexed to, and are parts of, the undertaking, and the statute expressly declares that if the undertaking required is not filed the action shall be dismissed. The appellant contends that this act was repealed by the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that it "establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates," (section 4,) and that, "in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated," (section 18.) It is urged that the Code provides for but one form of civil action, prescribes how a civil action is to be commenced, how and when the summons is to be issued and served, and that, when the service is complete, "the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction of the parties, and to have control of all the subsequent proceedings;" that these provisions apply to all civil actions; and that there is no provision, expressly or by implication, continuing in force the act in question. The ready and obvious answer to this argument is that the four Codes were passed on the 11th day of March, 1872, while the act claimed to have been repealed thereby was subsequently passed at the same session. A subsequent act is not repealed by a prior one. Besides, section 4479 of the Political Code provides: "If the provisions of any law passed at the present session of the legislature contravene or are inconsistent with the provisions of either of the four Codes, the provisions of such law must prevail."

The appellant also contends that the act was a special law, and inconsistent with the provisions of our present constitution, and that it ceased to exist upon the adoption thereof. The portions of the constitution relied upon as affecting this result are section 25, subd. 3, art. 4, and section 1, art. 22. They are as follows: "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases; that is to say, * * * regulating the practice of courts of justice." "The provisions of all laws which are inconsistent with this constitution shall cease upon the adoption thereof." We do not think this contention can be sustained. In our opinion the act is not a local or special law within the meaning of the constitution. It applies to the whole state, and to every person within the state who may wish to commence an action for libel or slander. A special law is one relating to a selected class, as well as to a particular object. This act does not relate to a selected class, but extends to and binds all within the jurisdiction of the law-making power. If, however, the act could be considered a special law, still the result claimed would not follow. It has been held by this court that the provision of the constitution that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws in certain cases applies to future and not to past legislation, and therefore does not operate to repeal acts passed before the constitution went into effect. Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6; School-Dist. v. Shoecraft, 88 Cal. 372, 26 Pac. Rep. 211.

The appellant further claims that the order of dismissal should be reversed upon the authority of Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. Rep. 179, and Stinson v. Carpenter, 78 Cal. 571, 21 Pac. Rep. 304. In the first of these cases no undertaking was filed at the time of the commencement of the action. Afterwards the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, to which the defendant demurred, and, the demurrer being overruled, answered. The case was then, by agreement of the parties, set for trial on a day named. Before that day arrived the defendant moved the court to dismiss the action, on the ground that no bonds for costs had been filed. The court refused to dismiss the action, and gave the plaintiff leave to then file the statutory undertaking; and one in due form was executed and filed. This was held, on appeal, not to be error, the court saying: "The statute (Acts 1871, p. 533, § 1) does not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction in case the undertaking is not filed. The object of the statute is accomplished if, when the objection is made, the undertaking is executed, and the defendant thus secured the costs and charges which may be awarded to him." In the second case no undertaking was filed by the plaintiff before the issuance of the summons, but four days later one in due form was filed. About two months after that, when a jury was in attendance for the trial of the case, the defendant objected for the first time that an undertaking had not been filed in time, and moved to dismiss the action because the undertaking was not filed for several days after filing the complaint, and issuance and service of summons. The trial court granted the motion, and, on appeal, this was held to be error, on the authority of Dixon v. Allen, supra. The obvious difference between those cases and this is that in each of them an undertaking "in due form," that is, meeting all the requirements of the statute, was filed, while here no such undertaking has ever been filed or offered to be filed. When the motion to dismiss was made, and the plaintiff's attention was directly called to the matter, she might have asked, and doubtless would have obtained, leave to file an undertaking in due form, as required by the statute. This, however, she failed to do, preferring, as it would seem, to rely on the defective undertaking already on file, and to take the chances of its being held sufficient. Under the circumstances shown, we think the court below was right in dismissing the action, and we therefore advise that the order and judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re BURTON'S ESTATE. (No. 14,450.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 20, 1892.)

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATES—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER OF INTEREST.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1664, which provides that, in all estates now being administered, any person claiming to be heir to the deceased, or entitled to distribution, in whole or in part, of such estate, may file a petition praying the court to "declare the rights of all persons to said estate, and all interests therein, and to whom distribution thereof should be made," etc., one who has, by purchase, succeeded to the rights of the heirs to land before distribution may maintain her petition in the superior court for the determination of the title, and for distribution. Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. Rep. 724; Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 16 Pac. Rep. 307; Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. Rep. 1081,—distinguished.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Petition by Maggie Leach, executrix of the will of Wallace Leach, deceased, praying for the determination of the rights of all persons to the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and for distribution. Maria A. Burton as widow, and others as heirs, of Burton, answered. Petitioner had decree, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Works, Gibson & Titus and Luce & McDonald, for appellants. Wellborn, Parker & Stevens, Haines & Ward, and James S. Callen, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is a proceeding initiated by the petition of Maggie Leach, as executrix and sole devisee of the will of Wallace Leach, deceased, under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, praying the court to ascertain and declare the rights of all persons to the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and to determine to whom distribution thereof should be made. In due course of the proceeding, the petitioner filed her complaint, alleging that she had succeeded to the title of the heirs of Henry S. Burton in and to a tract of land containing 8,925 acres, situate in the county of San Diego, known as "Rancho Jamul," subject to administration and to the homestead of the widow of the deceased, and praying that it may be so determined, and that distribution of the estate be made to her. The heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased, who appeared, and by answer denied the alleged right of petitioner, were Maria A. Burton, the widow of deceased; Nellie de Pedrorena and Henry H. Burton, the children of deceased; and Elizabeth Lull Cochrane and Richard Swann Lull, the grandchildren of deceased. The court found that five-sixths of the Rancho Jamul had descended to Maria A. Burton, Nellie de Pedrorena, and Henry H. Burton, as heirs of Henry S. Burton, deceased, and that, through the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by these heirs, the plaintiff, Maggie Leach, as executrix of the will of Wallace Leach, deceased, and as sole devisee, has succeeded to and is the owner of all their rights, as such heirs, in and to the Rancho Jamul; and decreed that, upon final distribution, five-sixths of said rancho, less the homestead, be distributed to her, and that the remaining one-sixth be distributed to the two grandchildren above named. From this decree Maria A. Burton, Henry H. Burton, and Nellie de Pedrorena bring this appeal upon the judgment roll, and without any bill of exceptions.

1. It is contended by counsel for appellants that section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not authorize the superior court to ascertain and declare the rights or interests of others than the heirs of an intestate and the devisees and legatees by will; and that one who has purchased the interest of an heir or devisee in the property of an estate, pending the administration, has no right, under that section of the Code, to have the interest thus purchased, ascertained, declared, or directly distributed to him by the superior court, "while sitting as a court of probate"—First, because no such legislative intent is expressed in that section; and, second, because, if such intent is expressed, the section is unconstitutional in that respect.

First. I think it cannot reasonably be questioned that it was the intention of the legislature, by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to provide a mode of proceeding by which all persons who claim ownership of or an interest in the property of an estate of a testator or an intestate, whether directly, as heirs and devisees, or indirectly, through the heirs or devisees, may have their respective rights and interests in and to such property conclusively ascertained, determined, and declared, so far, at least, as the parties before the court are concerned, before distribution is decreed, to the end that the final distribution of the property may be made directly to the persons respectively entitled thereto; and the language of the section seems to express this intention so clearly that there is no room for construction. But the provisions of the section are carefully limited to the ascertainment and determination of rights and interests claimed in privity with the estates, and are not applicable to rights or titles claimed adversely to such estates. The case most relied upon as being opposed to the views above expressed is that of Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. Rep. 1081. But that case was not a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure; nor did it involve any question as to the construction or constitutionality of that section; nor is there any allusion to that section in the opinion. The only point decided in that case is that an ordinary decree of distribution to an heir is not conclusive of title in the heir as against a prior grantee of such heir. The reasons for this, as I understand the opinion, are that in the ordinary mode of distribution the grantee of the heir is not a party to the proceeding, and there is no issue as to his title presented for determination. This being so, of course the court would have no jurisdiction to try or determine anything as to the title of the grantee. The opinion indicates, however, that the cases in this state are not entirely harmonious on this point; and hence the apparent need of such a mode of procedure as that provided by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the grantees of heirs and devisees may have their rights determined, and distribution ordered directly to them, instead of being compelled to pursue the heirs or devisees by another suit in substantially the same court, after the latter, by decree of distribution, have been invested with prima facie title.

Second. It is further contended that, conceding that section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure clearly expresses the intention of the legislature to authorize the court to ascertain and determine the rights of alleged assignees of the heirs, as a part of the proceedings in the settlements of estates of deceased persons, to that extent, the legislature attempted to confer upon superior courts a jurisdiction not authorized by the constitution; since the constitution has conferred upon "superior courts, while sitting as courts of probate," jurisdiction of only probate matters. The point made is that while the superior court was engaged in the proceeding to settle and distribute the estate of H. S. Burton, deceased, it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of ascertaining and determining the rights of the alleged assignees of the heirs, although it had jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the respective rights of the heirs among themselves. It is not questioned that the court had jurisdiction of the persons of all parties interested, nor that the proceeding was conducted in strict accordance with section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No distinct "court of probate" has been created or recognized by the present constitution of this state. The constitution has created superior courts, and has given them original jurisdiction of the subjects-matter of various classes of actions and special proceedings, more or less distinct from each other; among which are "all actions at law which involve the title or possession of real property," and "all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for," and "all matters of probate." Article 6, § 5. The proceeding provided by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a special proceeding, (Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 Pac. Rep. 206,) and is embraced within the scope of "matters of probate," as clearly so as is the proceeding for the sale of real property to pay debts of an estate. The objects of probate proceedings are to administer, settle, and distribute the estates of deceased persons. They are commenced by petition for letters of administration or for the probate of wills, and they are closed by a decree distributing "the residue of the estate in the hands of the executor or administrator, if any, among the persons who by law are entitled thereto," (Code Civil Proc. § 1665,) and an order discharging the executor or administrator, but who cannot be discharged from his trust until he has delivered up, under the order of the court, (order of distribution,) all property of the estate to the parties entitled, (section 1697.) It will not be denied that the decree of distribution, and the order discharging the executor or administrator, are within the scope of "matters of probate," in the sense of the constitution; from which it necessarily follows that the court must have the incidental power, in some mode, to ascertain and determine who are entitled, as distributees, to the residue of the estate, even though such determination should involve a question as to title or possession of real property; and I see no objection, on constitutional grounds, to the mode provided by section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The superior court, while sitting in matters of probate, is the same as it is while sitting in cases in equity, in cases at law, or in special proceedings; and, when it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a case falling within either of these classes, it has power to hear and determine, in the mode provided by law, all questions of law and fact, the determination of which is ancillary to a proper judgment in such case. This is an incidental power pertaining "to all courts for the purpose of enabling them to exercise the jurisdiction which is conferred upon them." Smith v. Westerfield, supra. It is true, however, that in special proceedings the court must exercise its jurisdiction, substantially at least, in the mode prescribed by the statute authorizing the proceeding; but in this case it is not questioned that the court did so. The statute (section 1664) expressly authorizes and requires the court to determine "the heirship to the deceased, the ownership of his estate, and the interest of each respective claimant thereto or therein," which is not claimed adversely to the estate. This certainly includes the "ownership" of grantees of the heirs, and all those who are "claimants" through the heirs. All such are required to be cited to appear and to plead "the facts constituting their claim of heirship, ownership, or interest in said estate;" and it further provides that evidence shall be received in support of all issues made by the pleadings. The proceeding thus authorized, expressly and necessarily involves questions to the title to the property of the estate, whether real or personal. How is the court to exercise the jurisdiction given without trying and determining such questions? The cases of Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. Rep. 724; and Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 16 Pac. Rep. 307,—are irrelevant to any point in this case, since in each of them the claim to be determined was adverse to the estate of the deceased. For such a case, as before remarked, section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not provide.

The findings of fact support the decree. The points made by appellants, in addition to those above considered, have not a sufficient foundation in the record, even if the reports of former cases in this court between the same parties may be considered. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

(Supreme Court of California. March 3, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the defendant, on a trial for robbery, desired to have the jury instructed as to the definition of "reasonable doubt," it was his duty to have asked for such instruction.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. TOOHY, Judge.

Prosecution against Michael Ahern for robbery. From the judgment on conviction, and an order denying him a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict, and we find no merit in the assignment of errors of law. If the defendant desired to have the jury instructed as to the definition of "reasonable doubt," it was his duty to have asked for such instruction. People v. Christensen, 85 Cal. 571, 24 Pac. Rep. 888. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

JAMES v. McCANN, Judge. (No. 14,821.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1892.)

REPORTER'S FEES—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REFUSAL TO SETTLE—WRIT OF MANDATE.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 274, which provides that the reporter's fees for taking notes in civil cases shall be paid by the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and shall be taxed as costs against the party against whom judgment is rendered, does not authorize the trial judge to refuse to settle the bill of exceptions until appellant has paid to the reporter certain fees ordered during the trial, and a writ of mandate will issue to compel the judge to settle such bill.

2. Conceding that the amendment of 1885, which provides that each party, before judgment or verdict is entered, shall pay a per diem of $2.50 to the clerk of the court, to be by him paid into the county treasury, is constitutional, it does not authorize the judge, after entry of judgment, to refuse to settle the bill of exceptions until appellant has paid to the reporter certain fees ordered during the trial.

In bank.

Original petition for writ of mandate by Sarah M. James against E. J. McCann, judge of superior court, to compel defendant to settle a bill of exceptions. Granted.

Horace N. Philbrook, for plaintiff. J. H. Skirm and Z. N. Goldsby, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant to settle a certain bill of exceptions, and it was submitted upon a demurrer to the complaint or petition. The plaintiff, (or petitioner,) Sarah M. James, and one Leonora A. James, were hostile contestants in the court of the defendant (or respondent) for letters of administration on the estate of William E. Jones, deceased. That contest, after a full trial, was decided by the court in favor of said Leonora, and judgment was entered accordingly. The petitioner herein (Sarah) then duly filed her notice of and undertaking on appeal; and afterwards, and within the proper time, appeared and served on said Leonora a draft of a bill of exceptions. The said Leonora duly prepared and served on petitioner certain amendments to said draft; and the draft and amendments were duly presented to said respondent, who designated the 27th day of October, 1891, at 10 o'clock A. M., as the time when he would settle said bill. At that time the parties appeared, and the settlement was begun and proceeded with until the 29th day of said month, at which time a large part of said bill had been settled. But on said last-named day the attorney of said Leonora moved that all further proceedings in the settlement of said bill be stayed until certain fees of the short-hand reporter of the court should be paid; and the judge, (respondent herein,) against the objection and exception of petitioner, ordered "that all proceedings herein be stayed until the above amount, to-wit, $45 and $55, making a total amount of $100, be paid by Sarah M. James to said reporter." And since then the respondent has refused to settle said bill of exceptions because said Sarah has not paid said reporter's fees, and declares that he will not settle said bill, or any bill of exceptions in said cause, unless said Sarah shall first pay said fees. It appears that during the trial of said contest for administration between said Sarah and Leonora the court on one occasion made an order "that each party in this action pay the reporter $45 for short-hand reporting;" and that at a later period in the trial it made another order "that Sarah M. James and Leonora A. James each pay the reporter $55 for reporting herein;" and it is for the failure of said Sarah to pay the amounts stated in said two orders that the respondent refuses to settle the bill. It is alleged in the petition, and therefore must be taken as true, that said short-hand reporting referred to in said orders meant the taking of short-hand notes of the testimony and proceedings as the trial progressed, and not the transcription of said notes into long-hand. The ground upon which the respondent rests his refusal to settle the bill of exceptions is not tenable. In some respects the statutory law about the payment of reporters' fees is in an uncertain and unsettled condition. Prior to March 23, 1885, the law upon that subject was contained in section 274 of the Code of Civil Procedure. See Newmark's Code, 1883. On March 23, 1885, the legislature passed a bill by which they undertook to amend section 274 by re-enacting it, so as to provide that the judges should fix monthly salaries for reporters; that the salaries should be paid out of the county treasuries; and that certain fees to be paid by litigants for reporting should be paid into the county treasuries. That attempted amendment, however, was held in Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 194, 8 Pac. Rep. 852, to be unconstitutional, so far, at least, as it attempted to confer upon courts the power to fix salaries; and, as the other parts of the amendment are based upon the theory that the salaries were to be so fixed, and are interwoven with the system sought to be established, it is probable that the whole amendment fails. In that event, the section as it stood before is still the law; and if such construction be correct, then the provision is that "the reporter's fees for taking notes in civil cases shall be paid by the party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and shall be taxed up by the clerk of the court as costs against the party against whom judgment is rendered." If, on the other hand, there is anything left of said attempted amendment of March, 1885, then the provision is that "each party shall pay a per diem of two dollars and fifty cents before judgment or verdict therein is entered," said per diem "to be paid to the clerk of the court, and by him paid into the treasury of the county." And neither provision warrants the action taken in the case at bar. Whether or not a court might, during the progress of a trial, compel the parties to make a deposit of money, or in some other way secure in advance the payment of the reporter for taking notes of the proceedings, or might refuse to order the reporter to do such work without such security, or might by some other means force the parties to secure him before the work should be done, are questions which do not arise in this case. Here the reporter did his work voluntarily, and without demanding security. The trial in which he took the notes terminated, and judgment was entered. After that the view most favorable to the reporter's right that could be taken is that the petitioner is his debtor; and, in order to enforce the payment of that debt, the respondent has not the power to refuse to settle petitioner's bill of exceptions, and thus practically destroy her right of appeal. (Respondent moved to strike out certain parts of the petition, but, as the case was submitted on demurrer, the motion is of no importance, and is denied.) Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

Attachment—Claims by Third Persons—Evidence—Estoppel by Admissions.

1. Plaintiff claimed certain wheat in his possession which was attached by defendant as sheriff, and sold on an execution of M. against one D. Plaintiff, in reply to a question by M.'s attorney just before the attachment issued, said that the wheat belonged to D., and he (plaintiff) had a lien on it. Defendant claimed that plaintiff was estopped by such declaration from denying that the wheat belonged to D., and at the trial asked M.'s attorney whether, in instructing the sheriff to levy, he relied solely upon the declaration of plaintiff and the belief that that declaration was true. Held, that the question was competent.

2. Plaintiff, having testified that he had received other security for the money owing by D., was asked, on cross-examination, if such security was not of greater value than the money due from D. Held, that the question was material.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; William O. Minor, Judge.

Action by H. Barnhart against Fulkerth & Perley. Judgment for defendants. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. W. E. Turner and Chas. J. Heggerty, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order denying him a new trial. He had also taken an appeal from the judgment, and on that appeal (No. 13,682) the judgment was by this court affirmed. 27 Pac. Rep. 71. There had also been an earlier judgment in the trial court in favor of plaintiff; and upon appeal by defendants from that judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, it was reversed, and a new trial ordered. 73 Cal. 526, 15 Pac. Rep. 89. Upon those two appeals the main questions in the case were decided against the contention of plaintiff. In the last appeal from the judgment (No. 13,682) it was definitely determined as the law of the case that the findings supported the judgment. The only questions arising upon this present appeal, from the order denying a new trial, appertain to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and rulings of the court as to the admissibility of evidence. The evidence as to the main issues of fact is voluminous, and somewhat conflicting; and it would be a useless labor to review it here in detail. It is sufficient to say that there is no reason for disturbing the findings of fact made by the trial court upon the ground that they are not warranted by the evidence. There are only two alleged errors on rulings upon the admission of evidence which are relied upon, one relating to the testimony of Howel, and the other to the testimony of Barnhart. The action was to recover certain wheat in a warehouse claimed by plaintiff, but attached and sold by defendant Fulkerth, sheriff, as the property of one Davis, upon a writ issued in a certain action brought by Mathews and wife against said Davis. Davis owed the plaintiff (Barnhart) $2,500, and had pledged the wheat to the latter to secure that sum of money; and when the sheriff attached the wheat he tendered the plaintiff the amount of his debt and lien. The witness Howel was the attorney of the Mathews, and was also acting as the agent for the sheriff; and immediately before the attachment was levied he visited the plaintiff, Barnhart, and asked him about the ownership of the wheat. Barnhart told him that the wheat belonged to Davis, and that he (Barnhart) had a lien on it for $2,500 and interest. Afterwards it was claimed by Barnhart that the wheat, at the time of the attachment, really belonged to one Vancel, who lived in an eastern state, and to whom Davis had deeded a life-interest in the land upon which the wheat had been raised. Defendants contended, among other things, that under these circumstances, wherever the strict legal title to the wheat may have been, Barnhart was estopped from denying that it belonged to Davis. Now, the questions asked Howel to which appellant objected were these: "Upon what did you base your action in instructing the sheriff to levy?" and "Did you rely solely and entirely upon the declarations of Barnhart, and the belief that that declaration was true from Barnhart's own declaration?" The objection was that the questions were "irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial," and we think that it was properly overruled. One of the necessary elements of estoppel is that the party setting it up must have been actually induced to do a certain act by the conduct or directions of the party sought to be estopped; and under our system, where all persons (practically) may testify, a witness may be examined as to the intent with which he did a certain act, where that intent is a material thing in the action. Even in a criminal case a defendant may testify as to the intent with which he entered a building or killed a human being, although, of course, a jury is not bound to believe the witness either in a criminal or a civil action. But such testimony is competent and relevant, and is not immaterial.

The other rulings excepted to relate to certain questions asked by respondents in cross-examination of the plaintiff. Plaintiff, having testified that he had received other security (land) for the money owing by Davis, was asked if such additional security was not "in value twice or three times as much as the money that you loaned him," and the only objection that it was "immaterial." We think the question was, at least, material; and, moreover, as the answer was negative, it could have done no harm. There were three other questions asked plaintiff, which were objected to upon the sole ground that they were "not cross-examination." We are disposed to think that the court was right in holding that they were legitimate cross-examination of the plaintiff; but as the answers were all negative, or that the witness had "no recollection" of the matter asked about, the appellant could not have been prejudiced by the questions, particularly as the case was tried by the judge without a jury. These views make it unnecessary to determine respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURTS—ELECTIONS BY CORPORATIONS.

1. By the constitution of 1879, district courts theretofore existing were superseded by the superior courts. Const. art. 22, § 11, declares that "all laws relative to the present judicial system shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this constitution." Held, that the superior courts were vested with the jurisdiction of the district courts to inquire into any election held "by any corporate body," pursuant to the provisions of Civil Code, §§ 312, 315.

2. The fact that an act, passed after the adoption of the new constitution for the purpose of adapting the phraseology of the several Codes to the nomenclature of the courts, omitted such change in any particular section of the Code, did not prevent the superior court from exercising any jurisdiction conferred on it by the constitution. Fraser v. Alexander, 16 Pac. Rep. 757, 75 Cal. 147, explained.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against N. J. Brittan to determine the right of defendant to be a director in the Bank of San Luis Obispo. Defendant's demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. For former opinion, see 28 Pac. Rep. 792.

Henley & Swift, Lippitt & Lippitt, Wilcoxson & Bouldwin, and Crittenden Thornton, (F. H. Merzbach, of counsel,) for appellant. James L. Crittenden and Graves & Graves, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The opinion heretofore rendered in this cause is modified by adding thereto the following:

The superior court had jurisdiction to entertain this proceeding. Sections 312 and 315 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1878, conferred such jurisdiction upon the district court of the district in which the election was held. Upon the adoption of the constitution of 1879, the district courts theretofore existing were superseded by the superior courts, and the superior court was given original jurisdiction "of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for." Article 22, § 11, of the constitution, also provided that "all laws relative to the present judicial system of the state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this constitution until changed by legislation." The effect of this section was, by a single comprehensive provision, to preserve and adopt for the courts created by the new constitution the statutory procedure that was then existing with reference to the courts which were by that instrument abolished, and to authorize that procedure in all rights of action that were to be determined under the new constitution. For the purpose of adapting the phraseology of the several Codes to the new nomenclature of the courts provided by the constitution, the legislature in 1880 amended the greater portion of the sections in which were the names of the old courts, by substituting therefor the names of the new courts. But its omission to make such change in any particular section did not have the effect to prevent the superior court from exercising the jurisdiction over any right of action which had been conferred upon it by the constitution. During the interim between January 1, 1880, and the date of any such amendment, the superior court could rightly entertain and hear all proceedings and actions instituted therein under the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the constitution. The jurisdiction thus conferred was not such a provision of the constitution as required legislation to enforce it, (article 22, § 1;) and the laws for the exercise of such jurisdiction were not "inconsistent" with the constitution, and did not cease upon its adoption, but, by the provision of section 11 of article 22, were expressly preserved in force until changed by legislation. In Fraser v. Alexander, 75 Cal. 147, 16 Pac. Rep. 757, it was held that the act of March 30, 1874, under which the proceedings were instituted, had been superseded by the provisions of the county government act of 1883; and what was said in the opinion respecting the effect of section 1 of article 22 of the constitution was obiter dictum, inasmuch as, upon holding that the provisions of that act had been thus superseded and "changed by legislation," there was no opportunity for the court to consider or determine the effect of the constitutional provision upon the statute existing at the date of its adoption.

DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—CONSTRUCTION—ATTORNEY'S FEES—WHO CHARGEABLE.

1. Where a decree of the probate court distributed to certain trustees the legal title to an undivided one-third of certain property, "that is to say, * * * one-third of the aggregated value of all the six items hereinafter specified," and contained a statement of such items, together with the amounts thereof, the values of the various items were thereby fixed.

2. Where a testator leaves a portion of his estate to a charity, and the charity engages in litigation involving the construction of the will, its attorney's fees will not be chargeable against the whole estate, but only against the portion devised to it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by Mary C. Hinckley against Horatio Stebbins and others, trustees. From the final decree of the court, dividing certain trust funds, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William Barber, for appellant. C. K. Bonestell, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This suit was brought by the plaintiff, as residuary legatee under the will of William C. Hinckley, deceased, against the defendants, for the purpose of securing an accounting, procuring the sale of certain property, the payment of certain unpaid legacies out of the proceeds of that sale, and to obtain a division of the balance left in their hands between the residuary legatee and some of these defendants, as trustees of a certain charity. There had been a contest as to the construction of this will, and what proportion of the estate was to be distributed to the parties here, and this court, in 58 Cal. 517, adjudicated the matters there involved, and ordered a probate court decree of distribution to be made, modifying a previous one made on the 10th of March, 1879, which decree, modified as directed by the appellate court, was made and entered on the 22d of May, 1882. This last decree has never been appealed from, and is in full force and effect. It is prayed in the complaint that the California Theater property, which had been by that decree distributed to certain of the defendants here, in trust for certain purposes, should be sold, and that from the proceeds of that sale, and any money remaining in the hands of these trustees derived from rents and profits of the theater property, should be paid certain 12 specific legacies, of $3,000 each. The answer of the legatees agrees to this prayer, and so does the answer of the trustees. Upon this state of affairs an interlocutory decree was entered, following this agreement. After that, upon findings of fact and conclusions of law filed by the trial court, a final decree was made and entered, dividing the remaining trust funds between the trustees for the charity and the residuary legatee, plaintiff and appellant here. It is claimed in her behalf that certain findings of fact made by the trial judge are not supported by the evidence, and that the conclusions of law attached do not follow the findings.

The most important matter, therefore, which is first to be considered and determined, is what the amended probate court decree does declare as to certain matters. The appellant contends that the third finding of fact, made by the trial court, is not sustained by the language of the amended probate court decree of distribution. It is said that the decree does not affix any value to the distributable assets at the date of its entry, and that the finding assumes that it does fix such value, and therefore that such finding is erroneous. The finding is as follows: "The value of the distributable assets of the estate at the date of the amended decree, May 22, 1882, estimating the value of the theater property at $120,000, at which sum it had been appraised in the probate court on the 5th day of June, 1876, was $150,492, less the amount of the unpaid mortgage of $37,500, referred to in the decree,—the remainder being $112,992, of which one-third is $37,664." The decree referred to reads thus: "To the trustees and their successors hereinabove named is hereby distributed the legal title to an undivided interest in the California Theater property, equal to one-third (⅓) of the distributable estate of said testator, that is to say, equal to one-third of the aggregated value of all the six items, hereinafter specified as the distributable assets of said estate. * * * The distributable assets of the estate of said testator, one-third of which is subject to the charitable uses, are as follows, viz.: (1) Cash heretofore paid to legatees amounting to $8,912.02. (2) Cash distributed to trustees, $6,420.90. (3) The house and lot on Bush street, appraised, $11,500. (4) The personal property in said house, appraised at $3,659.50, being all the personal property mentioned in the inventory, excepting mining stock, and the $60 in money. (5) 150 shares of stock in the Scorpion Silver Mining Company. (6) The California Theater property, inventoried and appraised on the 5th day of June, 1876, as of the value of $120,000, and which said theater property is subject to the said mortgage held by said Frank H. Woods." This mortgage was in the sum of $37,500. From the original probate court decree and the amended decree, from which the quotation is taken, it is easily perceived that, by direction of the supreme court in the case heretofore alluded to, the probate court was proceeding to carry out the views of the appellate tribunal in fixing the share or proportion of the California Theater property which would go to the trustees for the charity; and, inasmuch as the theater property was all that was left of the estate in their hands, in order to determine what that proportion was, it was deemed necessary to enumerate certain distributable assets that had passed from the hands of the trustees to those entitled thereto, and of which the charity had no benefit, and the theater property. In this enumeration the theater property was stated to have been appraised at $120,000, and it was also stated that it was subject to a mortgage of $37,500. The decree does fix the values of various items of distributable property, and whether the values so fixed are upon a right basis or not, as the probate court fixed the value of that property at its appraised value, which is contrary to both the statute and the decision of the supreme court, which the lower tribunal was then carrying out, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 1445, 1451; Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 517,) it must stand if it is a decree of distribution at all, as it is not appealed from, and is in full force and effect. This part of the decree was for the purpose of determining what the distributable assets then were out of which the trust was to be awarded an interest in the theater property, equal to one-third of the distributable assets, whatever they might be. This amended decree did undertake to vest in the trustees for the charity a definite fractional interest that was fixed as to value in the theater property. It did nothing more than to follow the supreme court in its directions, and distributed to the charity an interest in the theater property which was all that then remained in the hands of the trustees, under the will of Hinckley, of the estate, equivalent to one-third of the whole of the then known items of the distributable assets of the estate as of that date, which was then positively known or declared in the decree. And a specific value was given of that share of the whole distributable assets. By making an arithmetical calculation, based on the language of the decree, it appears that the whole value placed on the distributable assets was $150,492, less the mortgage of $37,500, all debts and liabilities and costs of administration having then been paid, and the net result is that the distributable assets was then the amount of $112,992. Of that, according to the decree which seems to have followed the decision of the appellate court, (58 Cal. 516,) the trust was entitled to $37,664; and, since there was no distributable assets to pay it out of except the theater property, there was given to the charity a legal interest in the theater property equal to one-third of the whole of the distributable assets ascertained by the decree. The charity from thenceforth owned 37,664-120,000 of the theater property, subject to the payment of its share of the mortgage; for, after distribution, the interest of the charity was not subject to any future costs or liabilities which might be incurred by the trustees, not growing out of the incumbrance or mortgage.

The income of the theater property was charged by the final decree with the payment of the 12 $3,000 legacies, and what was left of that the charity was entitled to 37,664-120,000 thereof. How, then, is the present accounting to be stated between the parties thereto? It appears that the theater property afterwards, by consent of all parties, was sold for $126,000. 37,664-120,000 of this sum, less the amount paid out for the mortgage debt and interest, belonged to the charity. Amount received from increase of the property was $115,416.67. From this sum the legacies were to be paid before any division between the parties hereto. That sum is $36,921.85, according to finding 6. The item of taxes on mortgage, if payable by the estate at all, was payable out of the interest of each party, on the basis of his proportional interest; and it does not seem to be questioned that it was payable out of the interest of some one, a party here, and not the mortgagee. The Scorpion stock assessment paid was, of course, chargeable against the share of the residuary legatee. From the finding we should judge that the $500 fee paid Mr. Baldwin for litigation about the mortgage was payable out of the interest of both parties, in proportion to their share in the theater property. The balance expended by the trustees seems to have been, according to the record, $60,628.50, which the trial court charged wholly against the gross income, $115,416.67. It does not appear what this sum of $60,628.50 was paid out for, except $100, mentioned in findings 6 and 7, and $5,850, (erroneously added up as $5,000,) mentioned in finding 7; so it will be presumed that all of that sum, except $5,950, is chargeable, as allowed, to the entire gross receipts. But we cannot perceive how any party to this proceeding except the charity is chargeable with this last sum. The money was not for costs of administration or debts, but for counsel fees to those employed by the trustees of the charity to litigate their side of the controversy, and to get all that was possible from the residuary legatee for the benefit of the charity. The charity was the real party in interest, and should pay its own attorneys' fees. It will thus be seen that finding 5, where it assumes the balance on hand for division to be $95,157.10, and the 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th conclusions of law are erroneous. The judgment should therefore be reversed, and we so advise.

I concur: FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. HOLLADAY et al. (No. 13,676.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—LAND DEDICATED TO PUBLIC USE—RES JUDICATA—ACTION ON BEHALF OF STATE.

1. Act Cong. July 1, 1864, (13 U. S. St. at Large, p. 332,) grants to the municipality of San Francisco all the rights and title of the United States in a certain public square known as "Lafayette Park," within the city limits as fixed by act of the legislature of 1851, "for the uses specified in the ordinance of said city, ratified by an act of the legislature" approved March 11, 1858. The ordinance referred to was passed in 1855, and provided for the location of Lafayette park. Defendant was in actual possession of the land in question, January 1, 1855, and so continued till after March 11, 1858. Held, that the land having been dedicated to the public by the act of the legislature of 1858, which dedication was confirmed by the act of congress of 1864, making it operative on the legal title in the government as well as on such title as the city held prior thereto, the defendant never acquired any title by possession.

2. The city and county of San Francisco being a municipal corporation, endowed with full power and jurisdiction over the public parks within its territory, a suit prosecuted by such city, wherein it claims legal title to land as part of a public park and as trustee of the people of the state, is a bar to any subsequent action by the people of the state for the same land.

3. In such case, in a suit against the city by the person in possession to quiet the title to land claimed by such city as part of a public park, a judgment in favor of the plaintiff is a bar to an action for the recovery of such land by the people.

4. Where a former suit was brought against defendant by plaintiff herein, involving the same land in question, and issue joined therein prior to the passage of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, and judgment rendered in favor of defendant, such judgment does not constitute a bar to this action, commenced after the passage of said act of congress. 9 Pac. Rep. 655, affirmed.

5. The findings of the court below, that the plaintiff has acquired no different title to the land since the commencement of the former suit, does not change the rule that such former judgment is not a bar, for the reason that such findings were set aside by the order of the court granting a new trial, and for the further reason that it was a conclusion of law drawn from the facts presented on the former appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by the people against Holladay and others. From an order setting aside judgment for defendants, and granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. W. & E. B. Holladay, Mastic, Belcher & Mastic, John R. Jarboe, and Lloyd & Wood, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, William Matthews, and Craig & Meredith, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action brought by the attorney general in behalf of the people of the state, upon the relation of one Bryant. It is alleged in the complaint that the land therein described was lawfully dedicated to public use as a public square, on March 11, 1858, by the name of "Lafayette Park," and that defendants have erected buildings and fences thereon, thereby obstructing the public in the use of the same as a square; and judgment is asked to the effect that such buildings and fences constitute a nuisance, and that defendants be enjoined from maintaining or continuing the same, or from otherwise obstructing the people of the state in the free use of said land for the purpose for which it was dedicated. In their answer the defendants deny that the land described in the complaint was ever dedicated to public use as a square, and also allege that on November 16, 1863, the plaintiff herein, upon the relation of one Bohen, commenced an action against S. W. Holladay, one of the defendants herein, and through whom the other defendants claim; that in said action the same identical matters alleged in this complaint were in issue, and judgment therein was finally rendered against this plaintiff, and in favor of defendant Holladay. It is also particularly averred, as a separate defense, that in said action one of the material issues was whether the land here in controversy was ever dedicated to the public as a square, and that this issue was in said action found and adjudged against plaintiff. The answer further alleges, as a separate defense, that on December 17, 1864, the said defendant S. W. Holladay commenced an action against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet his title as against all adverse claims of said city and county to the land in controversy, and that judgment was therein given to the effect that said Holladay was the owner of an undivided nineteen-twentieths of said land, and his title thereto was quieted as against the said city and county; and in this connection it is further alleged that one of the material issues tried in that action, and determined adversely to the present claims of the plaintiff herein, was whether the land in controversy had ever been dedicated to the public use as a square, and whether said city and county held the legal title thereto in trust for the people of the state. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and findings filed to the effect that the matters alleged in the answer of defendants were true, and judgment was thereafter entered for the defendants. Subsequently the court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and from this order the defendants appeal.

The land in controversy is within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined by the act of the legislature of this state of April 15, 1851, (St. 1851, p. 157;) and all the right and title of the United States thereto were by section 5 of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California, (13 U S. St. at Large, p. 332,) "relinquished and granted to the said city, and its successors, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinance[1] of said city, ratified by an act of the legislature of the said state approved on the 11th of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight." It is a conceded fact in the case that this land forms a part of the tract designated as "Lafayette Park" upon the map, showing the location of streets and public squares in the city of San Francisco, which map was approved by one of the ordinances of said city, ratified and confirmed by the act of the legislature of this state, approved March 11, 1858, (St. 1858, p. 52,) referred to in the act of congress of July 1, 1864. It further appears from the evidence that the defendants and their successors in interest were in the actual possession of the land on January 1, 1855, and so continued until after March 11, 1858.

1. It has been repeatedly held by this court that this act of the legislature, in ratifying and confirming the ordinance referred to, operated as a selection and dedication to public use of the tracts marked as public squares on the map approved by that ordinance, and that the act of congress of July 1, 1864, had the effect to confirm such dedication, and make it operative upon the legal title, as well as upon such title as the city held prior thereto. Hoadley v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265; Sawyer v. San Francisco, Id. 370; Hoadley v. San Francisco, 70 Cal. 320, 12 Pac. Rep. 125. This being so, it follows that the land in controversy was in fact dedicated to the public as alleged in the complaint, and, as a consequence, defendants never acquired any title thereto by virtue of the possession of themselves or predecessors, and the act of the legislature of this state of March 11, 1858, or the ordinances thereby ratified. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to maintain this action, unless estopped by one or the other of the judgments relied upon by defendants as a bar.

2. It was held by this court, upon the former appeal in this case, that the judgment rendered in favor of defendant Holladay, in the action brought by the people of the state upon relation of Bohen, is not a bar to the present one. In discussing this question the court said: "The title which passed to the city and county of San Francisco by the act of congress of July 1, 1864, was unaffected by the judgment pleaded in bar thereof—First, because it was acquired long after issue in the action in which that judgment was rendered was joined and the case submitted for decision, and was not in issue therein, (Bank v. Hodgdon, 64 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. Rep. 938; Valentine v. Mahoney, 37 Cal. 396;) and, secondly, because the attorney general of the state had no power to submit to the determination of any tribunal the title of the government of the United States." People v. Holladay, 68 Cal. 439, 9 Pac. Rep. 655. This record does not disclose any new or additional facts in relation to the judgment the effect of which was thus passed upon, and the decision thus quoted must therefore be deemed the law of the case so far as concerns the particular point therein decided. The findings of the court below, that the people of the state have acquired no new or different title to the land in controversy since the commencement of the former action, relied upon as a bar, is not sufficient to take the question now under consideration out of the operation of the law as decided on the former appeal—First, because the finding itself was set aside by the order granting a new trial; and, secondly, because it was only a conclusion of law which that court drew from the same facts which were before this court on the former appeal. Nor can the appellants avoid the force of that decision by the special and particular manner in which they have alleged that respondent is estopped to retry in this action the question of dedication which was in issue and passed upon in the former action. The fact of dedication is essential to support respondent's cause of action, and that it is not estopped by that judgment from showing such fact is not only the necessary and logical effect of the decision upon the former appeal, but was so stated by the court in the following language: "To hold that the plaintiffs are concluded, by the judgment pleaded in bar, from showing that there was a dedication to which the title conveyed by the act of 1864 related, and which it perfected, would be in effect to hold the title conveyed by the act of 1864 concluded by the former judgment, which, for the reasons already given, is not the case." As already stated, this decision constitutes the law of this case, and we hold in accordance with it that the former judgment in the action brought against defendant Holladay, by the present plaintiff, upon the relation of Bohen, does not constitute a bar to this action, or conclude the question of dedication involved here.

[1] The ordinance referred to was passed in 1855, and provided for laying out public squares on pueblo lands.

3. This brings us to consider the effect of the judgment in the case of Holladay v. The City and County of San Francisco. That was an action to quiet title, and it appears from the evidence that the question therein litigated was whether the land in controversy had ever been dedicated to the public use claimed by the people in this action. It is contended by the respondent that such matter was not in issue in that case, the answer of the defendants simply denying all the allegations of the complaint in that action. But this court held in the late case of San Francisco v. Holladay, in relation to this particular judgment, that this question was involved therein, and that such judgment was a bar to any further assertion by the city and county of San Francisco that it held the legal title in trust for the people. The court there said: "It is claimed by the appellant that the record in that case is not binding upon the city or the people, for the reason that at the date of the institution of the suit all the title that the city had was the bare right to the possession of this land in trust for the people of the state. But the particular matter litigated in that case was whether the city held the fee in trust for the people or at all, and it was adjudged therein that the city had no right, title, or interest in the land. The judgment in that case was not appealed from, and is final, so far as the city is concerned. It quieted the title of the plaintiff as against any and all claims of the defendant herein." San Francisco v. Holladay, 76 Cal. 18, 17 Pac. Rep. 942. The pleadings in that case being sufficient to put in issue the question of dedication involved herein, what is the effect of such judgment upon the rights of the present plaintiff? Are the people of the state thereby estopped from asserting that the defendant in that action, the city and county of San Francisco, did hold and now holds the legal title to the land in controversy, in trust for the use of the people of the state as a public square?

The city and county of San Francisco is a municipal corporation created by the legislature of the state, and has conferred upon it by the state full power and jurisdiction over the public squares within its territorial limits, with the right to sue and be sued; and this necessarily includes the authority to maintain and defend all actions relating to its right to exercise control over and subject to the public use such squares or land claimed by it to have been dedicated for such purposes, and in any action brought by it for the purpose of vindicating and protecting the public rights in such squares, or land claimed as such, the state would be bound by the result, because in such action the city and county would in fact represent the people of the state by virtue of its authority to maintain such actions for the purpose of preserving the public rights of which it is the trustee. A municipal corporation is for many purposes but a department of the state, organized for the more convenient administration of certain powers belonging to the state, (Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 530; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 544; Board v. Martin, 28 Pac. Rep. 799;) and such corporations, in their management and control over streets and squares within their limits, and in actions for the vindication and preservation of the public rights therein, exercise a part of the sovereignty of the state. Accordingly, it has been held that the city has the same right to maintain an action to prevent the unlawful obstruction of a street as would the people of the state. Thus, in the case of Railway Co. v. Chicago, 96 Ill. 628, it is said: "The state has a like control over highways, streets, and public grounds as is exercised by the crown of England, and may have like remedies against persons unlawfully obstructing the same. A portion of the political power of the state is committed to the municipalities. The general assembly of this state has vested in cities, villages, and towns the right to control the use of highways, streets, and public grounds, within their respective limits, and they are invested with the authority of the crown and of the state, in this respect, to file bills to prevent and remove obstructions from the streets, highways, and public grounds under their control." So, also, in Trustees v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 510, it was held that the municipality so far represents the equitable rights of its inhabitants that it is authorized to maintain action to abate a public nuisance upon a public square; and to the same effect is the case of City of Demopolis v. Webb, (Ala.) 6 South. Rep. 408. There are other cases which seem to base the right of municipal corporations to maintain such actions upon the narrower ground that they suffer special and peculiar injury in the obstruction of streets and squares different from that sustained by the general public, but we are satisfied with the broader rule announced in the above-cited cases. We entertain no doubt that the city and county of San Francisco has the authority to maintain an action for the purpose of preserving the rights of the general public to the use of squares, or land claimed as such, within its limits, and that in such action it is authorized to put in issue the alleged rights of the people to such easement, and that the state itself is bound by the result of such litigation, if the same is not collusive. The rule that the citizen shall not be twice vexed for the same cause of action is binding upon the state as upon other litigants. And we see no reason why these same rights might not also be tried and determined in an appropriate action in which the municipality might be a defendant; as, for instance, ejectment, where it has ousted the claimant from the possession; or by injunction, where it threatened to remove his buildings or trees or a portion of the soil from the land claimed by it as a public square, and the public would be bound by the result of any such litigation, if conducted in good faith on the part of the city. And that an action by the adverse claimant against the city to quiet his title, where the city claims to hold the legal title in trust for the use of the people, as a public square, is an appropriate action to determine such claim, is the effect of the decisions of this court in San Francisco v.

Holladay, supra, and San Francisco v. Itsell, 80 Cal. 57, 22 Pac. Rep. 74. In San Francisco v. Holladay, supra, the action was ejectment by the city and county of San Francisco, for the purpose of recovering the land in controversy in this action; the plaintiff claiming that it held the legal title to the land in trust for the people of the state, and that the same had been dedicated to the use of the public, and that the defendants were intruders thereon. The action was therefore substantially one for the use and benefit of the people of the state, and, as the plaintiff therein was authorized by law to bring the action for the purpose of preserving the alleged rights of the people, it could only be defeated by showing that the people of the state were not entitled to maintain such action, and the court, in holding that the right of the city and county of San Francisco to recover possession of the land in controversy for the use of the general public was barred by the judgment in Holladay v. San Francisco, in effect decided that the rights of the people of the state were also barred by that judgment.

There is nothing decided in the case of Branham v. Mayor, etc., of San Jose, 24 Cal. 585, in conflict with the conclusion we have reached on this point. All that was there decided was that a decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the execution by a sheriff's deed under the decree, transferred to the purchaser the interest which the mortgage created and vested in the mortgagee, and nothing more. In that case the city of San Jose executed a mortgage upon certain lands, which mortgage was void because of want of power in the city to execute the same or alienate the land, and it was held that its subsequent foreclosure, in an action to which the city was a party, gave to the mortgage no additional validity, and that the city was not estopped by the decree of foreclosure from asserting the invalidity of the title attempted to be conveyed by the sheriff's deed thereunder. This was only the assertion of a very familiar rule, as to the estate or title upon which a decree of foreclosure operates, but, manifestly, can have no relation to the question we have been considering, which is whether the state, by authorizing the city and county of San Francisco to sue and defend actions, for the purpose of preserving and protecting the rights of the general public in land claimed to have been dedicated as a public square, is bound equally with the municipality by the result of such litigation.

4. The judgment in Holladay v. San Francisco was undoubtedly erroneous under the law as declared by this court subsequently in the cases of Sawyer v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 370, and Hoadley v. San Francisco, 70 Cal. 324, 12 Pac. Rep. 125; but its force as an adjudication of the rights of the parties thereto, and those in privity with them, is not affected thereby. Case v. Beauregard, 101 U. S. 688. To say that the bar of an estoppel by judgment can be removed by showing that it ought not to have been rendered would be, in effect, to declare that no fact is to be deemed as finally set at rest by judgment, and that litigation upon the same matter may be interminable. But by the judgment in Holladay v. San Francisco it was determined that the defendants here own an undivided nineteen-twentieths of the land in controversy, and the finding of the court below that all the land in controversy is the private property of the defendants, free and clear from any and all dedication whatever, (and we construe the first conclusion of law as a finding of fact,) was not justified by that judgment or by the other evidence in the case, and because of this error in the findings the court did not err in granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. Although the effect of the judgment in Holladay v. San Francisco is a bar to the right of the plaintiff to the relief demanded in this action, it is still entitled to a correct finding as to the extent of the interest owned by defendants in the land in controversy. Upon the evidence disclosed in this record the finding as to this fact should have been in accordance with the judgment in Holladay v. San Francisco. Order affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1892.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by the people, on the relation of R. D. Chandler, against Smith to abate a nuisance. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. D. Wheeler and R. Guy McClellan, (S. W. & E. B. Holladay, of counsel,) for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Philip G. Galpin, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by the people, on the relation of R. D. Chandler, to abate a nuisance. It is alleged in the complaint that the land upon which the building stands is part of a public street in the city of San Francisco known as "Oregon Street;" that defendant placed the structure in said street on or about July 1, 1885, and ever since has unlawfully kept and maintained the same. The defendant denied that the land on which the building stands ever became a public street by dedication or otherwise; averred that he was the owner in fee of the premises described, and entitled to the use and enjoyment of the same; and for a further answer alleged that for more than 17 years immediately prior to August 18, 1877, he had been in the actual, open, peaceable, and exclusive possession of the property; that on said last-named day the city and county of San Francisco, falsely pretending that the premises were included within the limits of the public street called "Oregon Street," wrongfully entered upon the premises, and ousted him therefrom; that thereafter he commenced an action against said city and county to recover the possession of the premises; that in the answer filed therein the defendant claimed that the premises in controversy had been dedicated to public use as a street; that on May 14, 1880, a judgment was entered in said action in favor of the plaintiff herein, and against the city and county, for the possession of the land; that the court adjudged therein that neither the state of California nor the city and county of San Francisco dedicated the premises to public use; that an appeal was taken from the order of the court refusing to grant a new trial, but said appeal was dismissed on May 22, 1885, and the judgment thereupon became final; that on June 14, 1885, this defendant was placed in possession of the premises by the sheriff, and has ever since remained in possession, and erected a valuable building thereon. For further answer, the defendant alleged that he was in actual, open, exclusive, and notorious possession of the premises, claiming in good faith to own the same for many years before any action was taken by the city and county of San Francisco, or the state of California, in the matter of laying out, opening, or dedicating the land in controversy as a public street. At the trial, among other matters, the defendant introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the action of A. B. Smith v. The City and County of San Francisco, commenced September 12, 1877, and the writ of restitution under which the defendant was placed in possession, as alleged in his answer. As one of its findings of fact, the court found that the allegations of the defendant's answer, as to the matters therein set forth with reference to the action brought by Smith (the defendant here) against the city and county of San Francisco, were true, but held that the people of the state were not a party to said action, and that consequently the judgment therein rendered was no bar to this action, and thereupon ordered judgment for plaintiff. This identical question was involved in the recent case of People v. Holladay, 29 Pac. Rep. 54, (No. 13,676, filed February 4, 1892,) and there decided contrary to the views held by the trial court in this case. The judgment being a complete bar to the cause of action, it becomes unnecessary to examine other assignments relied upon. Upon the authority of People v. Holladay, supra, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

ROLLINS v. WRIGHT. (No. 13,787.)

TAX-DEEDS—NOTICE OF APPLICATION—EVIDENCE—QUIETING TITLE.

1. In an action to quiet title to lands claimed by plaintiff under tax collector's deeds, where the evidence shows that the tax collector presented the certificates of the sales to the county recorder for filing, and that the recorder received them, but did not mark them "Filed" because no fees were paid him, the certificates must be deemed to have been filed, as such filing is a public duty, for which no fees are provided.

2. Pol. Code, § 3785, as amended in March 1885, so as to require notice of an application for a tax-deed, does not apply where the right to a tax-deed had become absolute before the passage of the amendment.

3. In an action to quiet title to land claimed by plaintiff under a tax collector's deed, plaintiff need not show title in the person to whom the land was assessed before the tax-sale, as under Pol. Code, § 3786, the deed is prima facie evidence of the validity of the assessment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by William Rollins against John A. Wright to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wright and Arthur Rodgers, for appellant. William Leviston, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order refusing new trial. This action is to quiet title to lots in San Francisco. Plaintiff claims under tax collector's deeds, and all the questions in the case are as to the validity of such deeds. There are four tax-deeds,—three based on sales made in 1882 for the assessments made in 1881, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, to A. F. Hinchman; the fourth on a sale made in 1880, for an assessment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. The deeds were read in evidence, against defendant's objections, which were as follows, so far as urged on this appeal: First. The certificates of sale were not filed in the office of the county recorder. Second. No notice of the application for the deeds, under section 3785 of the Political Code, was given. Third. The assessment and sale were not for any fiscal year. Fourth. No title or claim of title was shown in A. F. Hinchman, to whom the property was assessed. And it is further claimed here, although such points were not made in the court below, (1) that defendant is a purchaser for value without notice; and (2) the sale was under a local statute which violated section 25, art. 4, of the constitution, and is therefore void. The respondent contends that the tax-deeds are conclusive upon all these points. Section 3786 of the Political Code provides that the deed shall recite, and that the recitals shall be primary (prima facie) evidence of their truth, eight enumerated facts: (1) The assessment; (2) equalization; (3) tax-levy; (4) non-payment of tax; (5) the property was regularly sold; (6) has not been redeemed; (7) grantor was proper officer to execute deed; and (8) when sold to pay tax on personalty, that owner of the property was liable for the tax. The next section makes the deed "conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed." The first of the above sections has the effect, as to matters required to be recited in the deed, to shift the burden of proof, but leaves the owner of the property free to establish by proof that such facts do not exist. As to other matters the deed is made conclusive. We see no valid objection to these provisions. If the property owner held property which was liable to taxation, which had been properly assessed, for a tax duly levied, which had not been paid, but allowed to become delinquent, and the property had been sold as required by law and not redeemed, there is no hardship in providing that he shall not take advantage of mere irregularities, which did not affect his substantial rights, to avoid the effect of his delinquency. The matters which he is expressly authorized to dispute enable him to raise every point essential to a just defense. Justice does not require that he should be entitled to interpose pure technicalities. These stringent provisions were made to enable the state to collect its revenues, and property owners owe the duty to the government to pay taxes when due, and are not deprived of any substantial rights when they are limited in their defense to such matters as show that they do not justly owe the tax. We cannot do better than to adopt the language of the supreme court of the United States in De Treville v. Smalls, 98 U. S. 525, upon a similar point: "Besides, all possible attack upon the prima facies of the certificate was limited by the express provisions of the act, which enacted, as before stated, that it should only be affected as evidence of the regularity and validity of sale, by establishing the fact that the property was not subject to taxes, or that the taxes had been paid previous to sale, or that the property had been redeemed. This left to the owner of lands subject to the tax every substantial right. It was his duty to pay the tax when it was due. His land was charged with it by the act of congress, not by the commissioners; and the proceeding ending in a sale was simply a mode of compelling the discharge of his duty. All his substantial rights were assured to him by the permission to show that he owed no tax, that his land was not taxable, that he had paid what was due, or that he had redeemed his land after sale. He was thus permitted to assert everything of substance,—everything except mere irregularities. We do not feel at liberty to disregard the plain intention of the acts of congress. We are not unmindful of the numerous decisions of state courts which have construed away the plain meaning of statutes providing for the collection of taxes, disregarding the spirit and often the letter of the enactments, until of late years the astuteness of judicial refinement had rendered almost inoperative all legislative provisions for the sale of land for taxes. The consequence was that bidders at tax-sales, if obtained at all, were mere speculators. The chances were greatly against their obtaining a title. The least error in the conduct of the sale, or in the proceedings preliminary thereto, was held to vitiate it, though the tax was clearly due and unpaid. Mr. Blackwell, in his treatise on Tax Titles, says (page 71) 'that, out of a thousand cases in court, [of tax-sales,] not twenty have been sustained.' To meet this tendency of judicial refinement very many states have of late adopted very rigid legislation. The acts of congress we are considering must have had it in view. Hence the stringent provisions they contain. They declare, in effect, that the certificate of the commissioners' sale shall be evidence of compliance with the preliminary requisites of the sale, and that this evidence shall be rebutted only by proof of one or the other of three specified things. There is no possible excuse for not enforcing such statutes according to their letter and spirit."

If this position be correct, the appellant is not in a position to make his first objection,—that the certificates were not filed by the recorder; but waiving for the time this point, and looking into the evidence, it shows that they must be held to have been properly filed, so far as that fact can affect the rights of the purchaser. It was the duty of the tax collector to present them to the recorder for filing. This he did. The recorder received them, but did not mark them "Filed," because no fees were paid him. It was a public duty for which no fees are provided. They must be deemed to have been filed. Page v. Rogers, 31 Cal. 307; section 1170, Civil Code; Donald v. Beals, 57 Cal. 399; Tregambo v. Comanche M. Co., Id. 506.

The second point—that no notice was given of the application for the deed, under section 3785 of the Political Code—the defendant is, perhaps, not precluded from making. Whether he is or not need not be decided in this case, for we think no such notice was necessary. Section 3785 was amended, so as to require notice, in March, 1885. Before that no notice was required. Long prior to this amendment the purchaser's right to a deed had become absolute. When the law was amended, the owner had no right to redeem, and the legislature could not deprive the purchaser of his absolute right. Oullahan v. Sweeny, 79 Cal. 537, 21 Pac. Rep. 960, does not hold to the contrary. On the other hand, the intimations are in favor of these views. There the time for redemption had not expired when the amendment took effect, and the court held that it did not have the effect to extend the time for redemption, and said: "It may be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that the legislature cannot make an absolute extension of the time." Even if the legislature could do that, it would fall far short of the necessities of this case. Here under the provisions of the statute the time for redemption had fully expired before the amendment, and, if it applies, its effect may be to compel one fully entitled to a deed conveying property worth many thousand dollars to accept in lieu of it a small sum. The cases upon this subject are collected by Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, p. 353. They are not all in accord, but none of them go to the extent requisite to sustain the contention of appellant. The learned author says that "to extend the time for redemption is to alter the substance of the contract, as much as would be the extension of the time for payment of a promissory note." A fortiori would a law give a right to redeem, when, by the law under which the purchase was made, the right to the deed has become absolute.

Third, it is claimed that the assessment was not made for any fiscal year. That point seems to be the result of pure carelessness. Section 5, art. 20, of the constitution provides that "the fiscal year shall commence on the first day of July." Of course it would end with the 30th of June.

The fourth point is that no title was shown in Hinchman. No such showing was required. The deed establishes the assessment prima facie. If it were essential to the validity of the assessment that Hinchman should have been the owner, it was incumbent on the defense to negative the fact which had been established by prima facie proof. The defendant was not an innocent purchaser without notice. Reeve v. Kennedy, 43 Cal. 644. As we have seen, the certificates must be deemed to have been filed. If other parties have suffered from the failure of the recorder to do his duty, their remedy must be against him. The point that the sale was under a local law which contravened section 25, art. 4, of the constitution seems also to be an inadvertence. The law was passed before the constitution was adopted, and not amended until after the tax-sales were made. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinon the judgment and order are affirmed.

Fairchild v. Wall, Street Superintendent.
(No. 13,684.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 16, 1892.)

Mandamus—To Street Superintendent—Awarding Contract—City Improvements.

The Oakland city charter provides that, within 10 days after the first posting and publication of an award by the city council for street work, the owners of three-fourths of the abutting lots where the work is to be done, or of the lots which are liable to be assessed for the work, or their agents, may elect to take the work, under a written contract, at the price at which the same has been awarded; and that the superintendent of streets shall, in his official capacity, make all written contracts, receive all bonds, and do all other acts that pertain to the street department. Held, that the superintendent of streets has final discretion in respect to the sufficiency, in number and amount, of the persons to whom the charter gives the right to do the work, and that, after he has entered into a contract with such persons, he cannot be compelled by mandamus to enter into a contract with one to whom the city council has awarded the work.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. Gibson, Judge.

Application of J. A. Fairchild for a writ of mandate to J. S. Wall, superintendent of streets of the city of Oakland, to enter into a contract for street work with plaintiff. From a judgment dismissing an alternative writ of mandate plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. T. H. Palmer, (J. C. Martin and Olney, Chickering & Thomas, of counsel,) for appellant. James A. Johnson and Parker & Eells, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action is to obtain a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant to enter into a contract for street work with the plaintiff, to whom, it is claimed, a contract for street work had been awarded by the city council of the city of Oakland, to which tribunal such authority is delegated by the charter of that city. A demurrer was filed to the affidavit upon which an alternative writ of mandate was issued, which reads thus: "Now comes J. S. Wall, superintendent, etc., defendant, and makes return to the alternative mandamus, and demurs to the affidavit upon which the same was issued herein, upon the grounds that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or to entitle the petitioner to the relief asked for, or to any relief." The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend the affidavit, judgment of dismissal of the alternative writ of mandate, and that the order to show cause be discharged, and that the plaintiff take nothing, etc., and for costs in favor of the defendant, was duly given and made, from which this appeal is taken.

It appears from the affidavit in mandamus that the plaintiff claims to have been awarded a certain street contract by the Oakland city council, and that the superintendent of streets, whose duty it is to enter into such contracts by and on behalf of the city, refuses to do his duty in the premises. It is also stated in the affidavit that the reason assigned by the superintendent why he will not do so is "solely because he, in his official capacity as street superintendent, had already received from other persons, purporting to be the owners of three-fourths or more of the frontage of lots and lands liable to be assessed for said work, the said sum of $67.30, advanced by them to him for payment of said incidental expenses, and had already executed with said persons, as owners, a contract for said work, in which he had fixed the periods of time for beginning and completing the work, and had received from them a bond for said work; and therefore would not perform said acts a second time, except under mandate of a court." The part of the sections of the charter of the city of Oakland under which the authority on the part of the superintendent of streets exists to enter into a contract with owners of frontages of lots and lands upon a street where work is to be done, even after the city council has awarded a contract such as is claimed by the plaintiff to have been awarded to him by that body, reads thus: "The owners of three-fourths of the frontage of lots and lands upon the street whereon said work is to be done, or of the lots and lands which are liable to be assessed for said work, or their agents, and who shall make oath that they are such owners or agents, shall not be required to present sealed proposals or bids, but may, within ten days after the first posting and publication of said notice of said award, elect to take said work and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the price at which the same has been awarded." St. 1889, p. 162. "Sec. 6. The superintendent of streets is hereby authorized, in his official capacity, to make all written contracts and receive all bonds authorized by this act, and to do any other act, either express or implied, that pertains to the street department under this act," etc. St. 1885, p. 151. The affidavit for the mandamus does not, as we read it, declare that the affidavits mentioned in section 5 of the act of 1889, as amended, (page 162 of those acts,) were not made, nor does it declare anything material, positively, except that three-fourths of the owners, etc., "did not elect to take such work, and enter into a written contract to do the whole work at the prices at which the same had been awarded, or to file with the street superintendent any bond therefor, as required by law in case of such election." The main idea prevalent in the affidavit, and in the argument of the appellant, seems to be that the street superintendent did not contract with three-fourths of the owners of the frontage of lots and lands on the street where the work was to be done, and that such owners did not elect to do the work; that, as a matter of fact, they did not, in numbers and amount of ownership, as the statute requires, elect to do the work, or enter into a legal contract therefor with the superintendent of streets. Therefore the appellant claims the right, in this proceeding, to show this fact, and thereby to control the action of the street superintendent by mandamus, and force him to enter into a contract, and accept the bond of the plaintiff as the awardee of the contract from the city council.

The position of the defendant seems to be that he has already ascertained the fact that the requisite number of proper owners have elected to do the work, and that he has done his duty under the law, and entered into a contract with them, and cannot legally do as desired by the plaintiff. The rule with reference to the enforcement of the remedy sought here seems to have been announced in the case of Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. Rep. 766: "If the determination of the tribunal was intended to be final, it is plain that it cannot be disturbed, either on mandamus, or any other way." The matter to be determined in that case was whether the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco had the right to determine a purely legal question, as a finality; and it was held therein that he did not have such power. 76 Cal. 555, 18 Pac. Rep. 767. In the present instance we do not perceive that the street superintendent had anything to do except to be satisfied that, as a fact, the owners, or their agents, of three-fourths of the frontage on the street where work was to be done elected to do the work ordered on the street on which they fronted; and the section of the statute which gives them this right, before the awardee has any right at all to do the work, has, as we have seen, this provision: "And who shall make oath that they are such owners or agents," who shall elect to do the work. We can see no useful purpose for this clause, unless it be to enable the street superintendent to determine, as a fact, that the persons applying to elect to do the work are the persons who are entitled, under the law, to do it. It would appear that such a requirement is useless, unless it at least is intended to afford the means of ascertaining this fact; and, as an officer is presumed to do his duty, we do not see any sound reason why such a thing may not be confided to his discretion, as a finality. The street superintendent has nothing to do with the awardee of the contract until the "owners or agents" have failed to elect to do the work. All that he can do, in the first instance, is to enter into a contract with those whom the law gives the right to elect to do the street work, and before doing this he is to satisfy himself, from the affidavits required, that they are the owners or agents, sufficient in number or amount to authorize them to do the work. The discretion vested in him is confessed by the affidavit for mandamus to have been exercised, and we see no reason why he should be compelled by that writ to act a second time, and contrary to his former action. We think the demurrer was properly sustained, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MCNULTY. (No. 20,659.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 19, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—SENTENCE—INCREASING PUNISHMENT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Pol. Code, § 329, providing that "the repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment, information, or punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act," is a general saving clause; and under it a person who has been convicted of an offense must be punished under the law as it existed at the time of the commission of the offense, though the clause of the act prescribing the punishment has since been repealed by an amendment which increases the punishment.

2. Act March 31, 1891, increasing the punishment for murder in the first degree, is constitutional when construed with Pol. Code, § 329, as it is thereby rendered inapplicable to past offenses, and prospective only in its operation.

HARRISON and DE HAVEN, JJ., dissenting.

28 Pac. Rep. 816, modified.

On rehearing. For former reports, see 26 Pac. Rep. 597, and 28 Pac. Rep. 816.

MCFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to suffer the penalty of death; and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial he appealed to this court. This court examined and considered all the points made on the appeal, determined that no error had been committed at the trial, and ordered the judgment affirmed. 26 Pac. Rep. 597. Afterwards, however, and before the remittitur went down, upon the suggestion of a difficulty caused by amendments of the law concerning the death penalty which had been enacted by the legislature after the conviction of the appellant, the judgment of affirmance was set aside, and an argument ordered as to the effect of said amendments. The amendments, if constitutional, repealed the former law upon the subject, and contained no express saving clause by which past offenses might be punished under the law as it stood at the time of their commission. But under the authority of the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in Medley, Petitioner, 134 U. S. 160, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384, the change made by said amendments in the punishment was so material as to render it as against appellant ex post facto, and void under the constitution of the United States; and as the amendments, if constitutional, repealed the former law, there seemed to be no means left by which the appellant could be punished. The main question, therefore, before the court on the first argument was whether the amendments were not unconstitutional in toto, and thus inoperative as a repeal of the former law; and a majority of the court reached the conclusion, upon the views then presented, that it was so unconstitutional, and therefore left the law as it stood before the attempted repeal. The question, however, was of such importance that a majority of the court ordered a rehearing and a reargument. The opinions of both the majority and minority of the court, on the first hearing of the question, were based upon the assumption that the amendment under review stood entirely without a saving clause, either in the amendment itself or in the general statutory law. Since the rehearing was granted, our attention has been called, for the first time, to section 329 of the Political Code, as constituting a saving clause fully covering the said amendments; and, if it does constitute such a saving clause, then the question presents an entirely different aspect. In that event the legislature could not be held as either intending the new law to apply to past offenses, or as intending to allow past offenders to escape; but, construing the new law as passed with the knowledge and in the light of the permanent saving clause existing in the general body of the law, it is clearly constitutional as to future crimes, while it leaves past offenses to be punished under the law as it was when the offenses were committed. It is quite clear that a general saving clause, if it be clothed in apt language to express the purpose, is as efficient as a special clause expressly inserted in a particular statute. This proposition is too plain to need the support of authorities; but there are authorities directly to the point. People v. Quinn, 18 Cal. 121; U. S. v. Barr, 4 Sawy. 254; Jordan v. State, 38 Ga. 585; Volmer v. State, 34 Ark. 487; Acree v. Com., 13 Bush, 353; State v. Shaffer, 21 Iowa, 486; State v. Ross, 49 Mo. 416. In the statutory law of a number of the states there is a general saving clause intended to prevent the miscarriage of justice in cases where the legislature should repeal or substantially change a penal statute, and neglect to put a special saving clause into the new enactment. Congress has enacted such a general saving clause, which is found in section 13 of the Revised Statutes; and when applying it, in U. S. v. Barr, supra, the United States district court explains the purpose and effect of such a provision as follows: "This section 13 is a salutary provision, and if it, or something like it, had always been incorporated in the statutes of the states and the United States, it would have prevented many a lame and impotent conclusion in criminal cases, in which the defendant escaped punishment because the legislature, in the hurry and confusion of amending and enacting statutes, had forgotten to insert a clause to save offenses and liabilities already committed or incurred from the effect of express or implied repeals." The said section 13, and the saving clauses in the legislation of the various states which have enacted them, are all somewhat different from each other, and from section 329 of our Political Code; but they all have the same general purpose, viz., to prevent the mischief mentioned by the United States district court as above quoted, and the language employed in each of them should be construed in the light of that purpose. Some examples of saving clauses in other states are as follows: In Georgia the language employed is: "All crimes and offenses committed shall be prosecuted and punished under the laws in force at the time of the commission of such crime or offense, notwithstanding the repeal of such laws before such trial takes place." In Arkansas the language is: "When any criminal or penal statute shall be repealed, all offenses committed or forfeitures incurred under it while it was in force shall be punished or enforced as if it were in force, notwithstanding such repeal, unless otherwise expressly provided in the repealing statute." And in Iowa the language is: "The repeal of a statute does not revive a statute previously repealed; nor does such repeal affect any right which accrued, any duty imposed, any penalty incurred, nor any proceeding commenced, under or by virtue of the statute repealed." These examples are sufficient to show the main purpose in view, and the variety of language used to express it.

Section 329 of our Political Code is as follows: "The repeal of any law creating a criminal offense does not constitute a bar to the indictment or information and punishment of an act already committed in violation of the law so repealed, unless the intention to bar such indictment, information, or punishment is expressly declared in the repealing act." Now, the impression which a first reading of this section naturally leaves upon the mind of the reader is that it is substantially the same as the saving clauses in other states to which we have alluded; and closer inspection of the language used, and full consideration of the objections made to it by appellant, only make that first impression stronger and surer. The stress of appellant's argument is upon the words "law creating a criminal offense;" and the contention is that a law repealing the punishment of an offense is not to be brought within the meaning of a law repealing a law "creating" an offense. (We do not deem it necessary to here quote in full the old and the new law upon which the question under discussion arises. It is sufficient to say that, when appellant committed the crime of which he was convicted, certain sections of the Penal Code provided for the death penalty; and that afterwards, on March 31, 1891, the legislature passed an act by which it amended and re-enacted those sections, and in the sections thus re-enacted provided for what is admitted to be a different and more severe punishment. The sections of the Penal Code which define murder were not changed. The most important sections of the Penal Code thus changed are sections 1217, 1227, and 1229, and the act changing them is to be found commencing on page 272 of the Statutes of 1891. The act contained no expression of intent to bar an indictment or information for a past offense, or the punishment thereof.) The contention of appellant rests upon the position that the description or definition of acts necessary to constitute a crime creates the crime, and that, unless the definition in a law creating a crime is repealed, there is no repeal of such law, within the meaning of the Political Code. But that position cannot be maintained. A description of acts necessary to constitute a crime does not make the commission of such acts a crime. Punishment is as necessary to constitute a crime as definition. Without either there is no crime, and the repeal of either leaves no crime. What constitutes a crime is definitely stated in section 15 of the Penal Code as follows: "A crime or public offense is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments: First, death; second, imprisonment; third, fine; fourth, removal from office; or, fifth, disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit in this state." And so we think that a close analysis of section 329 removes all the refined distinctions by which its apparent general purpose is sought to be thwarted. The case of State v. Shaffer, supra, is very much like the case at bar. In that case section 4324 of the Criminal Law of Iowa had been amended after the commission of the crime charged against the defendant so as to merely change the punishment, and it was contended that the amendment took away the jurisdiction of the court in which he was tried. But the court, after citing section 29, which contained the general saving clause, (heretofore quoted in this opinion,) says: "The amendment to section 4324 is to be construed in connection with this section, and with such section it is equivalent to adding to such amendment, 'provided that such amendment shall not affect any penalty incurred under the section aforesaid.' This subdivision of section 29 of the revision was not presented by counsel, and hence not passed upon by the court, in the case of State v. Burdick, 9 Iowa, 402." In People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104, there is some discussion of section 329 of the Political Code; but at the time of the commission of the crime there charged the defendant could have been proceeded against by indictment only, and not by information, and at the time of the decision section 329 did not contain the word "information." But the defendants were prosecuted by information under a subsequent law, and the court held that section 329 could not be applied because there was no power to inject into it the word "information;" saying: "We do not think that the respondents in this case could be held to answer for the offense with which they are charged, 'unless on presentment of a grand jury.'" This is all that was decided, and it does not touch the point involved in the case at bar. It seems clear enough that the section, at least as it then stood, could not be applied to the attempted prosecution by information of a crime which at the time of its commission could be prosecuted only by indictment; but the extent which the court discusses the question there involved shows that it must have considered section 329 as of wide-reaching influence. There are no other decisions in this state to which our attention has been called that throw further light upon the question.

It is quite clear that the act of March 31, 1891, repealed all contained in the sections amended that is not contained in the said sections as re-enacted, and thus repealed the former punishment. Indeed, counsel for appellant not only admit this proposition, but they declare it as the very basis of their contention that there is now no law by which their client can be punished. They say in their brief: "That these amendments absolutely and completely wiped out the old sections of the Penal Code there can be no question." And this is clearly so. The language of the act, as to each section, is that the section "is hereby amended so as to read as follows," and, of course, everything not put into the section as re-enacted vanished. The effect of such a re-enactment is well stated in the opinion of the court in State v. Ingersoll, 17 Wis. 634. It was there contended that a certain section 5 of chapter 35 of the Revised Statutes had not been repealed; but the court say: "We are satisfied, however, that this is a mistake, and that that section had been repealed by chapter 147, above referred to; for that chapter provides that 'section 5, chapter 35, of the Revised Statutes, entitled "Of Excise," is hereby amended so as to read as follows,' etc. Now, the conclusion is irresistible that any provision of section 5 not found in this chapter is repealed. This must be so, since the legislature says expressly that that section shall thereafter read and be to the effect following; then going on to enact a complete substitute for the former provision. In what clearer manner could the legislature indicate its intention to supersede, change, and repeal section 5 than by the one adopted? It is amended so as to read and be to the effect therein prescribed, and quite different from what it was as it formerly existed. An examination of our statutes will show that this method of superseding and changing the existing law is frequently resorted to, and it certainly leaves no room to doubt as to what the legislature intended. The legislature in effect says that such a provision of law shall be read and construed to be as therein declared, and shall have no other meaning or effect given to it. See case of State v. Andrews, 20 Tex. 230. Section 5, therefore, being superseded, changed, and repealed by chapter 147, was not in force when the trial was had in this case, and furnished no authority to the court to give judgment upon it. It can no more be said to exist for the purpose of regulating the punishment applicable to the offense here complained of than one committed since the law of 1862 went into operation." See, also, on this point, U. S. v. Barr, 4 Sawy. 254. And of course the materiality of the difference between the punishment as prescribed by the old sections, and the punishment prescribed by them as re-enacted, is admitted by appellant; for upon that materiality depends his whole contention that the reenactments are, as to him, ex post facto. Our conclusion is that under section 329 of the Political Code the appellant is to be punished under the law as it existed at the time of the commission of the crime of which he was convicted; and that, under this view, the said act of March 31, 1891, is constitutional, because not intended to apply to past offenses, but to be prospective only in its operation. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, and the superior court is directed to take further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

HOMICIDE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, it appeared that defendant was himself shot during the difficulty which resulted in the homicide; and as defendant claimed to have acted in self-defense, and did not shoot until he himself was wounded, the position of defendant's arm at the time he was shot became a material question. Held that, as it was for the jury to determine the relative positions of the parties from the position of the wound and the course of the bullet, the admission of the opinion of an expert as to defendant's position was error. MCFARLAND and GAROUTTE, JJ., dissenting, on the ground that the error was harmless.

J. D. Smith was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

S. J. Hinds, Frank H. Short, and F. P. Taylor, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, (W. W. Foote, of counsel,) for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and was convicted of manslaughter. The defendant was himself shot by the deceased during the difficulty which resulted in the homicide, and it was a contested question upon the trial as to whether the defendant or the deceased fired first; the contention of the defendant being that he acted in self-defense, and did not shoot until after he himself was wounded; and in the determination of this question it became material to ascertain the position in which the defendant was at the time when he was shot. Upon the trial, Dr. Hayden, a physician and surgeon, was called as a witness on behalf of the people, and was asked: "Will you state, if you can, from your examination of this man's arm and your familiarity with gunshot wounds, if you are familiar with them, in what position, in your judgment, this man's arm was at the time that wound was received?" The question was objected to by defendant as incompetent, which objection was overruled, and the witness, in giving his opinion, stated that the defendant when shot was in one of two positions: First, standing with his side towards the discharged weapon, with the forearm flexed almost to a right angle to the upper arm, and the arm and elbow curved in front of and well towards the right side of the trunk, the trunk being inclined to the right of a perpendicular; or, second, "the arm may have been only partially flexed in the upper arm, and hanging at the side, the wounded party having his back towards the party firing the shot." But the general tenor of his testimony was to the effect that it was his opinion rather that the wound was received while the defendant was in this latter position. The court erred in the admission of this evidence. The subject-matter of the inquiry was not one in relation to which the opinion of an expert can be properly received. The position of the wound being given, and the course taken by the bullet known, the jury was fully as competent to determine the relative positions of the parties to the difficulty as was the witness. Kennedy v. People, 39 N. Y. 245; Cooper v. State, 23 Tex. 331; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303. Nor can we agree with the attorney general and associate counsel for the people that the admission of this incompetent evidence was a harmless error, and therefore without prejudice to the appellant. It went to sustain the theory of the people in relation to the pivotal point in the case, and at the same time to discredit the testimony of the defendant. The defendant testified, in effect, that he did not draw his weapon, or fire, until after he had been shot by the deceased; that after firing the first time he continued to face the deceased, at the same time backing to and against the door, and while thus backing he shot at the deceased again. On the other hand, the theory of the prosecution seems to have been that the defendant fired the first shot, and then turned and ran, and while running towards the door was shot by the deceased; and, in this connection, Brown, a witness for the people, who was present and engaged in the difficulty, and was himself knocked down by the defendant, testified: "I don't know who drew his pistol first. I know that during the shooting Mr. Smith started to run, and ran fast. Question. Did he turn his back, or back out? Answer. Turned his back." If the testimony of this witness is true, then the deceased must have received his mortal wound before the defendant turned his back upon him and started to run away; and if the defendant was shot, as Dr. Hayden seemed to think more probable, while his arm was hanging down by his side, and his back turned towards the deceased, the inference would be that he was shot while running away, in the manner described by the witness Brown, and that the testimony of the defendant that he did not fire his weapon until after he was himself shot was therefore untrue. In this state of the case, we do not think it can be said with any certainty that this incompetent evidence did not have any influence upon the minds of the jurors in reaching a verdict; and for the error in admitting it the judgment must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent. Dr. Hayden was examined as a witness in chief for the prosecution, not in rebuttal; so that whether or not that part of his testimony objected to was of any importance could not be determined before the evidence of the defendant was introduced. At the time of the homicide, defendant received a pistol wound, inflicted by the deceased; and Dr. Hayden was first properly asked about that wound,—what part of the body it was in, its size, the points of entry and exit, etc. He testified that it was on the inner side of the left forearm, a little below the elbow. Then the prosecution, with the approval of the court, and against defendant's objection, made an excursion into the doubtful domain of expert testimony. The transcript relates what occurred, as follows: "Question. Will you state, if you can, from your examination of this man's arm and your familiarity with gunshot wounds, if you are familiar with them, in what position, in your judgment, this man's arm was at the time that wound was received? Mr. Hinds. We object to that on the ground that it is incompetent. Court. Let him answer the question. Mr. Hinds. We except. Answer. It would be one of two positions, provided he was on his feet. If he was on his back or on the ground, it might be another position. If he was on his feet, I should say some such position as that, or this, way; either one. It could not be this way, because the ball would have entered his body some place, and it would have to be well over this way in order to miss the shoulder. Q. It was either the way you describe, or turning around with the arm down? A. With the arm down this way. I rather think this way, because the ball seemed to pass from rather that side towards the center. Q. Well, now, suppose that you are there and I am here, and I am going away, either running or walking fast, would you say that the ball could have entered? Mr. Hinds. The same objection goes to all these questions. Mr. Foote. Would it enter there, and come out that way, entering the same position relatively? Mr. Hinds. Same objection, ruling, and exception. Mr. Foote. Is that the fact? A. Yes, sir; very similar; very much that position. Q. What arm was it? A. The left arm." At the end of this testimony is appended a note as follows: "Note. The above witness, Dr. Hayden, in giving his testimony, illustrated the two positions testified to by him, viz.: First. With the forearm flexed almost to a right angle to the upper arm, and the elbow carried in front of and well towards the right side of the trunk, the trunk being inclined on its perpendicular axis to the right also, so the ball on its exit would not enter the trunk or the right upper extremity; that is, the wounded man should stand with his side towards the discharged weapon. Second. Or the arm may have been only partially flexed in upper arm, and hanging at the side; the wounded party having his back towards the party firing the shot." I do not deem it necessary to determine definitely whether or not this ruling of the court was, in the abstract, erroneous, because it is apparent that the appellant was not injured or prejudiced by it. As before stated, the defendant was himself wounded at the time of the homicide. The deceased fired at defendant either before or after the shot by which defendant killed the deceased. The theory of defendant, and his subsequent testimony when on the witness stand, was that the deceased fired first, and that defendant then killed him in self-defense. Now, if, when defendant testified, it had appeared that his testimony was in conflict with the former testimony of Dr. Hayden,—that is, if the deceased could not have fired first, and hit defendant in a position in which Dr. Hayden thought he must have been,—then appellant might have been prejudiced by the testimony of Dr. Hayden, which is claimed to have been erroneously admitted. But there was no such conflict. Appellant's theory and testimony were entirely consistent with the said testimony of Dr. Hayden. If appellant had contended or testified that he was facing deceased when the latter fired, some importance might have attached to Hayden's testimony. But there was no such testimony. The appellant, when on the witness stand, first described the difficulty between the deceased and himself over a game of cards, and some blows between them, and after speaking of a man, naming Brown, who was present, said as follows: "As I came out I expected to find him in front of me, but I didn't. I turned around as I came out, and kind of looked to see where he was. He was at my left." Further on he says: "I shoved Brown back that way, and, as I looked around again, Williams had his gun down on me, —throwed his gun down on me,—and shot. Just before he shot, as he was about to shoot, I turned and jumped sideways, and started to get my gun out, and he shot." And again he says: "I felt the shot strike my arm,—felt my arm kind of drop,—and I was getting my gun out at the same time. I got my gun out just as quick as I could, and turned, and shot at him." Now, there is nothing in these statements—and there was no different testimony—that is not entirely consistent with the testimony of Dr. Hayden. There was nothing in Hayden's testimony which could have prevented the jury from believing the story of the appellant, or which could have influenced them in any manner, when weighing appellant's testimony. I am satisfied, therefore, that the testimony objected to could have had no influence upon the conclusion of the jury.

GAROUTTE, J. I dissent. While the authorities cited by Mr. Justice DE HAVEN beyond question determine that the testimony of Dr. Hayden was incompetent, still I am unable to see how the defendant was prejudiced thereby. The theory of the prosecution at the trial was that the defendant had his back turned towards the deceased at the time he received the wound in the arm. The theory of the defense was that the defendant was standing with his side to the deceased, and his left arm raised to a certain angle at the time he received the wound. The doctor, as an expert, testified that the defendant could have been in either one of those two positions at the time he received the wound; consequently, I do not perceive how the defendant was prejudiced by the admission of the testimony.

City and County of San Francisco v. Pennie. (No. 12,923.)

Assessment Book — Contents — Sufficiency of Entry — Record — Administrator — Liability for Taxes.

1. Pol. Code, § 3650, provides that "the assessor must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings, * * * in which must be listed all property within the county, and in which must be specified, in separate columns, under the appropriate head," among other things, "all personal property, showing the number, kind, amount, and quality; but a failure to enumerate in detail such personal property does not invalidate the assessment." Held, that the word "enumerate" applied to each of the specifications previously named, and that the legislature intended that no assessment should be invalidated because the number, kind, amount, or quality of the personal property was not specified.

2. An entry in an assessment book as follows: "C., administrator of the estate of S., deceased, per. prop., as per inventory on file in the superior court, dep't No. 9,"—with the valuation of the property, and the amount of taxes thereon, is a sufficiently definite description of the property assessed; Pol. Code, § 3642, providing that the undistributed property of decedents may be assessed to administrators, etc., and section 3639 providing that, "where a person is assessed * * * as an administrator, his representative designation must be added to his name.

3. In a suit to enforce the collection of such taxes, the court found that there was no inventory on file in the superior court on the first Monday of March of the year such assessment was made, but did not find that it was not on file on a subsequent day, nor was this alleged by the answer. Held, that the record did not show that the inventory was not on file when the assessment was made, as, under Pol. Code, § 3628, providing that an "assessor must, between the first Mondays of March and July in each year, ascertain * * * all property in his county subject to taxation, * * * and must assess such property to the person by whom it was owned or claimed, or in whose possession or control it was, at 12 m. of the first Monday of March next preceding," the assessor had until the first Monday in July to make the assessment.

4. The liability of an administrator for the taxes on his decedent's estate is official, and not personal, and, on his discharge, such liability is assumed by his successor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco: T. K. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against Pennie, administrator. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. A. S. Nicholson, (W. H. Bodfish, of counsel,) for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, (W. H. Cook and Mr. Wheeler, of counsel,) for respondent.

Harrison, J. Action to recover the amount of certain taxes on personal property of the estate of Cynthia Hoff Shillaber, deceased, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, originally commenced against Carroll Cook, as executor of the last will and testament of said deceased, and, the present defendant having succeeded Cook in the administration of said estate, continued in his name. The complaint alleges that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in certain amounts, specifying them, for taxes, "which said taxes were duly assessed and levied upon personal property in the possession or under the control of said defendant, as special administrator aforesaid, heretofore mentioned herein, to-wit, personal property, as per inventory on file in superior court, department No. 9,—personal property, $100,000, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886,—all of which said property was in the possession of or under the control of said Carroll Cook, as such special administrator of said estate, at 12 o'clock m. on the first Monday in March, 1885." The complaint was not demurred to, but in his answer the defendant denies any indebtedness for taxes, and denies that any taxes had been at all levied or assessed upon personal property in the possession or under the control of said special administrator for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and alleges affirmatively "that there was an attempt made by plaintiff to assess the personal property belonging to said estate for taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and that said attempted assessment was in the words and figures as follows, to-wit: 'Personal property, as per inventory on file in superior court, department No. 9,—personal property, $100,000,'—as set forth in the complaint on file herein;" and denies that there was any inventory on file in said superior court, in the matter of said estate, on the first Monday in March, 1885. At the trial counsel for the plaintiff read from the complaint the foregoing averment of the assessment, which was admitted by the defendant to be a correct copy of the assessment, and it was also admitted by the defendant that the amount claimed to be due was correct. It was also admitted that, on the first Monday of March, 1885, there was no inventory of the estate on file in the superior court. No other evidence was introduced at the trial. The court found in accordance with the foregoing averments and admissions, and made its conclusion of law that, from said facts, the assessment was invalid, and plaintiff not entitled to recover anything thereon. Judgment accordingly was rendered for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

The objection presented by the respondent to the constitutionality of the act of April 23, 1880, does not arise in the case. The sufficiency of the complaint was not objected to by demurrer, and it is too late after trial and decision for a defendant to make objections to a complaint that should have been specially raised by demurrer. While the entire absence of an averment which is essential to a cause of action is at any time available to the defendant, yet the defective allegation of a cause of action is cured by the verdict. Hence it is unnecessary to consider the power of the legislature to prescribe a special form of complaint for this class of actions. Neither does the sufficiency of the proof of authenticity of the assessment arise. The averment of the fact was not only not denied in the answer, but the defendant set out, in terms, the exact form in which the assessment had been made, and at the trial it was admitted that the averment in the complaint was a correct copy of the assessment. The only question which was contested at the trial, and the only one which it is necessary to consider on this appeal, is whether the description of the property assessed, viz., "Personal property, as per inventory on file in the superior court, department No. 9,—personal property, $100,000,"—is a sufficient compliance with he trequirements of the statute to form the basis of an assessment for the taxes sued for. Section 3650 of the Political Code provides: "The assessor must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings alphabetically arranged, * * * in which must be listed all property within the county, and in which must be specified in separate columns, under the appropriate head: * * * (4) All personal property, showing the number, kind, amount, and quality; but a failure to enumerate in detail such personal property does not invalidate the assessment. * * * (10) The cash value of all personal property exclusive of money." We are asked by the respondent to hold that the word "enumerate," found in the latter clause of subdivision 4, means merely to "number," and to construe that subdivision so that it will read: "All personal property, showing the number, kind, amount, and quality; but a failure to number in detail such personal property does not invalidate the assessment." It would be giving too narrow a construction to the word "enumerate" in this section to hold that it means simply "number." The word "number" had been already named as one of the specifications of the property to be shown in the assessment; and if it had been the intention of the legislature that this was the only specification which might be omitted without invalidating the assessment, we think it would have been so stated in explicit terms. The word "enumerate" is very frequently used with the meaning of "designate," or "specifically mention." Lexicographers give as definitions of the word, "to mention in detail," or "reckon up singly;" "to tell;" "to recount;" "to relate." It must be held that this word applies to each of the specifications previously named in the clause, and that the legislature intended that the assessment should not be invalidated if neither the number, kind, amount, or quality of the personal property should be specifically mentioned. This construction is supported by the provisions of section 3885 of the Political Code, which provides that "no assessment or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes is illegal on account of informality." This section was under construction by this court in San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. Rep. 264, in which the only description of the property assessed was "mining stock." That term did not show either the number, amount, or quality,—only its kind,—but the court held that it was sufficient. The court must have determined that it was not essential to enumerate the property in detail, i. e., to specify with precision its amount, quality, or number. This construction of the statute in sustaining the assessment is also supported by the authority of People v. Sneath, 28 Cal. 612. It is true that the statute under which the assessment in that case was made did not contain the provisions that are contained in section 3650 of the Political Code; but, if we give to that section of the Political Code the construction above mentioned, and which appears to have been given to it in San Francisco v. Flood, it gives to the section a reading similar to that of the statute under which the assessment in People v. Sneath was made. It is not necessary that the assessment should contain a specific and exact description of the property assessed, as would be necessary in an action to recover the same property. The object of requiring any description of the property is that the tax-payer may know for what property he is assessed; and whatever is sufficient to identify that property with reasonable certainty is a sufficient compliance with the statute. As was said in San Francisco v. Flood, supra: "If the description of the property assessed in the assessment is certain enough to inform the tax-payer for what he is to be taxed, it is sufficiently certain." The description in that case was "mining stock;" but, in view of the fact that there are many species of mining stock, it can hardly be said that that term gave any greater description of the property assessed than the one in the case under consideration. People v. Insurance Co., 29 Cal. 549; People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 441; Monroe v. Town of New Canaan, 43 Conn. 309; Lewis v. Town of Eastford, 44 Conn. 477; Town of Hartford v. Champion, 54 Conn. 436, 7 Atl. Rep. 721. In the case last cited the description of the property in the assessment was, "All taxable property not specifically mentioned, $25,000," and the assessment was upheld.

For the purpose of determining whether this description was sufficient to identify the property, and to give sufficient information to the tax-payer of the property for which he was assessed, the court was at liberty to examine the surroundings connected with the assessment. Mrs. Shillaber died February 18, 1885, and the original defendant was appointed special administrator for her estate February 25, 1885. The assessment is of the property belonging to her estate on the first Monday of March of that year. Section 3642 of the Political Code provides that "the undistributed property of deceased persons may be assessed to the heirs, guardians, executors, or administrators;" and section 3639 provides that, "when a person is assessed as * * * administrator, his representative designation must be added to his name, and the assessment entered on a separate line from his individual assessment." The assessment in the present case was made to Carroll Cook, as the administrator of Mrs. Shillaber's estate. Whether he was special administrator or general administrator was immaterial. It was an assessment to him of only the property of the decedent whose estate he represented, and not of any of his individual property. This fact of itself eliminated all uncertainty as to whose property was intended by the assessment. The "description of the personal" property assessed to him as her representative was also made still more definite by adding the words, "As per inventory on file in the superior court, department No. 9." Assuming that there was an inventory of the personal property of the estate of Mrs. Shillaber on file in the superior court, department No. 9, at the time the assessment was made, the administrator would thus be fully informed of the property for which the estate was to be taxed. That inventory must have been prepared by himself, and its contents were, consequently, within his knowledge. It is not essential that the assessment book shall in itself contain a complete description of the personal property to be assessed. It is sufficient if it clearly refer to any public record or document in which the details of the description may be found. The usual manner in which mortgages are assessed is by a reference to the volume and page in which they are recorded in the office of the county recorder. The record does not disclose whether the administrator furnished this description to the assessor, or whether it was prepared by the assessor himself. It would appear from the plaintiff's specifications of error that the administrator did not give it, and that it was made by the assessor. The assignments of error are, however, merely the statements of the party, and not a portion of the record of the proceedings before the court, and we cannot look to them for the facts in the case. The sufficiency of the description, however, would not be affected by either of these conditions. If a description was absolutely uncertain, or if it were such that it did not give any information of the property assessed, it could not be sustained merely upon the ground that the assessor has made as good a one as he was able; while, on the other hand, if the description was merely defective in detail, but sufficiently explicit as not to mislead the tax-payer, he ought not to be heard to complain. As was also said in San Francisco v. Flood, supra: "If the description was taken from a list furnished by the defendant, or some one on his behalf, and by his authority, he ought not to be heard to complain of the insufficiency of the description. If made by the assessor without the aid of such list, the assessor has given a description as certain as could be reasonably required of him, and, under such circumstances, the defendant's objection to the assessment should not be regarded."

It is further contended by the respondent that there was no inventory of the estate of Mrs. Shillaber on file in the superior court, and that, consequently, the reference to it in the assessment was false, and must be disregarded in determining the sufficiency of the description. It does not, however, appear from the record that there was no inventory of her estate on file at the time the assessment was made. It is found by the court, in accordance with the averment in the answer, that "there was no inventory of the personal or real property of said estate of Cynthia Hoff Shillaber on file in the superior court of San Francisco, or any county, or city and county, on said day of March, 1885." The assessment, however, does not purport to state that it is of property of which there was an inventory on file on the first Monday of March. It was not essential to its sufficiency that the inventory should have been on file on that day. The assessor is not required to make his assessment on that day. Section 3628 of the Political Code provides that "the assessor must, between the first Mondays of March and July in each year, ascertain * * * all property in his county subject to taxation, * * * and must assess such property to the persons by whom it was owned or claimed, or in whose possession or control it was, at 12 o'clock M. of the first Monday of March next preceding;" and section 3652 of the same Code provides that he must complete his assessment book on or before the first Monday in July in each year. In the city and county of San Francisco the assessor must complete the assessment of personal property on or before the first Monday of June in each year. St. 1874, p. 477. The value of the property is to be affixed as of the first Monday of March, but a subsequent ascertainment by the assessor that such property was, on that day, under the control of the individual assessed, is within the provisions of the statute, and in the present case it is not disputed that such was the fact. The complaint alleges that all the property "was in the possession of or under the control of said Carroll Cook, as such special administrator of said estate, at 12 o'clock M. on the first Monday in March, 1885." The answer does not deny this allegation, but merely denies that "Cook, as such special administrator, had under his control or in his possession at 12 o'clock M., or at any other hour, on the first Monday in March, 1885, personal property of the value of $100,000." This was merely a denial of the value of the property, but it was not competent for the court to investigate its value in this proceeding. That had been determined by the assessor when he fixed the value to it in the assessment book; and if the defendant did not make any application to the board of equalization for a reduction of that valuation, he was bound thereby, and could not question its correctness in an action brought against him to recover the tax. It may be assumed, in this case, that the assessor made the assessment at any time after the first Monday of March, and before the first Monday of June; and we are not at liberty to assume that, at the time it was made, there was not on file in the superior court an inventory of the personal property belonging to the estate of Mrs. Shillaber. It is neither alleged in the answer, nor found by the court, that the inventory was not on file at some time prior to the first Monday of June; and the denial in the answer "that there was any inventory on file in said superior court, or any court, in the matter of said estate, at 12 o'clock M. on the first Monday in March, 1885, or at any hour on said date," is equivalent to an admission that it was on file at any subsequent day. The finding of the court "that said tax was assessed as of the date of 12 M. on the first Monday of March, 1885," was not within any issue presented to it for trial, and may be disregarded. It may be observed, however, that it is the property which is by law assessed, and not the tax. The tax is levied upon the property after the assessment has been made. Even if we consider that the court intended by this to find that the property was assessed as of the date of the first Monday of March, 1885, it is not a finding of the date when the assessment was actually made. If, however, by these words is meant that the value placed upon the property was that which it bore on the first Monday of March, it is only a finding of what the law would have implied, and was not a fact in the case. The statement in the findings that there was an "attempted" assessment for personal property taxes may be disregarded. The fact which was found by the court is that there was made and entered on the assessment book of the city and county of San Francisco the following words and figures, to-wit: "Cook, Carroll, administrator of the estate of Cynthia Hoff Shillaber, deceased, per. prop., as per inventory on file, superior court, dep't 9," with the valuation of said property and the amount of taxes thereon. This was a finding of a sufficient assessment; and upon the finding that such an assessment had been made, with the admission of the defendant that the amount of the taxes levied thereon was correct, the court should have rendered judgment for the plaintiff.

The objection that the action should have been brought against Cook as special administrator, and not as executor, is untenable. The cause of action is for taxes due from the estate of Mrs. Shillaber, (Pol. Code, § 3642,) and is properly brought against the custodian of that estate. No order or decree for the distribution of the property can be made until they have been paid. Pol. Code § 3752. The liability of the administrator therefore is official, and not personal, and, upon his resignation or discharge, such liability is assumed by his successor in the same manner as is any other obligation of the estate. We do not mean to be understood as holding that a defendant in a suit against him to collect a tax cannot show any facts that will defeat the regularity or sufficiency of the assessment. Our decision is based upon the proposition that the plaintiff, upon showing from the assessment book an assessment which, on its face, purports to be sufficient, has, in the absence of any evidence to controvert it, established its right to recover. If the defendant would overcome the effect of this evidence, it was incumbent upon him, as an affirmative proposition, to introduce evidence therefor. No such evidence having been introduced by him, the court should have rendered its judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment and order of the court below are reversed, and that court is directed, upon the facts heretofore found by it, to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as prayed in the complaint.

DEDICATION OF HIGHWAY—EVIDENCE.

The fact that on the "Engineer's Map," and on "Humphrey's Map of the City and County of San Francisco," a certain street is laid down as a "public street," is not conclusive of the character of such street; it being determinable from proof as to whether such street was offered for dedication as a "public street," and accepted by user or otherwise as such.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by John A. Whelan against Alexander Boyd and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hutchinson & Campbell, for appellant. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was to enjoin the excavation of what is claimed to be a private street or alley-way. The only question at issue seems to be whether the land involved was or was not a public street. Findings were waived. The court below held, in effect, that it was conclusively proved to be a public street, because it was laid down as such upon what is called the "Engineer's Map" and "Humphrey's Map of the City and County of San Francisco," and on that account would not allow the plaintiff to introduce proffered testimony upon the point that there had been no dedication by the owner of the land to the public use, and no user thereof by the public as a street. The land here involved came direct to the original owner under an alcalde grant, and as private property. His grantee through mesne conveyances chose to make the land now in controversy a way for the common benefit of certain owners of lots who had purchased the same from him. Whether it also became a public street did not depend upon the fact alone that the land appears on these maps as a public street, but whether the proof showed that it had been offered for dedication, and accepted as such by user or otherwise. Upon these points the evidence offered was admissible, and it was prejudicial error to exclude it. The judgment and order should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

BYRNES et al. v. MOORE. (No. 13,861.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 16, 1892.)

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. J. HUDSON, Judge.

Action by John W. Byrnes, J. B. Robinson, and Charles Stubbs against Gawn Moore to recover the possession of personal property. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

R. W. Crump and Ira C. Jenks, for appellants. T. B. Bond, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action of claim and delivery was brought against a sheriff, who had levied upon certain personal property under a writ of attachment, at the suit of certain parties who were the creditors of the seller of the property to the plaintiffs. The court below granted a nonsuit, apparently upon the ground that the debtor of the attachment creditors had not made a sale of the property to the plaintiffs which would satisfy the provisions of section 3340 of the Civil Code, because the transfer of the property was not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. Every case of the kind here involved has its own peculiar features, and must be determined on the particular facts which surround the given transaction or transfer. Carefully examining all the evidence in this case, we are of opinion that it was of such a character as not to render it clear, as matter of law, that no evidence existed tending to show a transfer which would be good under the statute. Therefore, as it seems to us, the question was one of fact, which should have been permitted to go to the jury for determination. We therefore advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be reversed.

I concur. VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed.

People v. Mesa. (No. 20,878.)

Assault with Intent to Rape—Evidence—New Trial.

1. Pen. Code, § 959, provides that an information is sufficient if the act charged as the offense is clearly set forth in ordinary language, with such certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment. Section 960 provides that no information is insufficient by reason of a defect which does not tend to prejudice the rights of defendant on the merits. Section 1404 provides that a departure from the forms prescribed by the Code in respect to pleadings shall not render an information invalid where it does not affect the substantial rights of defendant. Held, that an information which charged that defendant "did assault W., a female child under 14 years of age, with intent to commit rape," etc., sufficiently charged the intent to commit rape on W.

2. On a trial for assault with intent to rape, where complainant, a girl 13 years of age, testified to facts which, if true, proved the crime, and her testimony was corroborated in many respects by other witnesses, a conviction will not be disturbed.

3. The denial of an application for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence will not be reversed where such evidence was merely cumulative, and in every material point contradicted by counter-affidavits.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; F. T. Williams, Judge.

Blackstock & Shepherd, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Belcher, C. The defendant was found guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state-prison for the term of 10 years. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and has appealed from the judgment and order. The first ground urged for a reversal is that the information was wholly insufficient to support the verdict and judgment, because it did not state the name of any person upon whom the rape was intended to be committed. The part of the information objected to is as follows: "The said Juan Mesa * * * did unlawfully, feloniously, with force and violence, assault Alice Westfall, a female child under fourteen years of age, with intent to commit rape, and without her consent and against her will." The Penal Code has the following provisions: "Sec. 220. Every person who assaults another with intent to commit rape * * * is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years." "Sec. 959. The indictment or information is sufficient, if it can be understood therefrom * * * (6) that the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended; (7) that the act or omission charged as the offense is stated with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction, according to the right of the case. Sec. 960. No indictment or information is insufficient, nor can the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected, by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." "Sec. 1404. Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right." The information is substantially in the language of the statute defining the offense, and there was no demurrer to it. It was evidently intended to charge thereby that the defendant made an assault on Alice Westfall with intent to commit rape upon her; and, if the words "with intent to commit rape" had immediately preceded her name, there can be no question that the charge would have been sufficient.

People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 388. Does the transposition make any difference? Can it be said that, while the defendant made the assault on Alice Westfall, he may have intended to commit the rape upon some one else, and therefore that the charge, so far as it relates to her, must be treated as one of simple assault? To so hold would be saying, in effect, that though a criminal act be set forth in an information in ordinary language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, still, if there be a defect or imperfection in mere matter of form, though in no way prejudicial to any substantial right of the defendant, it may be availed of by him as good ground for having the information declared insufficient and set aside. But this would be in direct violation of the plain provisions of the Code above quoted, and the rule is that all the provisions of the Code are to be construed according to the fair import of its terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Section 4, Pen. Code. In our opinion, therefore, the information here should be held sufficient.

It is next claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The prosecutrix was a girl 13 years of age, and, if her testimony was true, the defendant was evidently guilty as charged. It is said that an inspection of the record will show that she was not a credible witness; but we are unable to find anything to warrant this conclusion. In a case like this, a conviction may be had upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix. People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. Rep. 691; People v. Stewart, 90 Cal. 212, 27 Pac. Rep. 200. But here her testimony was corroborated in many respects by other witnesses. Whether the defendant was guilty or not was therefore a question for the jury to pass upon, and it cannot be said in this court that the verdict was not justified.

Objections are made to some of the instructions given by the court to the jury, but they are upon the theory that the information did not charge the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape, and that the instructions were therefore erroneous. This theory of appellant cannot, as we have seen, be maintained, and hence the objections are not well taken. The instructions as a whole seem to state the law of the case fully, fairly, and correctly.

One of the grounds on which a new trial was asked was that of newly-discovered evidence. At the hearing of the motion the defendant read several affidavits to show that, if a new trial were granted, he could prove by the affiants that the testimony on part of the prosecution, as to the time and place the assault was claimed to have been committed, could not have been true, and that his own testimony as to the matter was true. The alleged newly-discovered evidence was merely cumulative, and the authorities are numerous in this state that such evidence does not constitute good ground for granting a new trial. Besides, every material fact was contradicted by counter-affidavits. The motion was addressed to the discretion of the court below, and we cannot say that it abused its discretion in denying it. In our opinion the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

BAUM v. REAY. (No. 14,028.)[1]

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE OF POSSESSION—REFRESHING MEMORY OF WITNESSES.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 318, provides that no action for the recovery of real property can be maintained unless plaintiff, his ancestor or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property within 5 years before suit. In ejectment for an unimproved lot, the evidence showed that plaintiff and his grantors had held the legal title to the same for more than 10 years prior to the action, maintaining the fence inclosing it, and paying the taxes. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff.

2. A witness may be permitted to refresh his memory from a writing or memorandum made by himself at the occurrence of the facts to which it relates, but the memorandum is not competent evidence to prove the facts stated in itself.

3. In ejectment, evidence that plaintiff and his grantor paid the taxes on the land in suit is admissible to show the claim of title, and that it had not been abandoned.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. FINN, Judge.

Ejectment by Julius Baum against Joseph W. Reay. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought in 1877 to recover a 50-vara lot in the south-east corner of Van Ness avenue and Turk street, in the city of San Francisco. Plaintiff claims that one Jacob C. Beideman, who died prior to 1867, was in his life-time in possession of the whole of said lot sued for, and that by mesne conveyances he has succeeded to the title of said Beideman. The defendant denies that Beideman was ever in possession of that portion of the premises sued for. Plaintiff's deraignment of title from Beideman is as follows: Deed from Brumagin, administrator of the estate of Beideman, to Hess, dated March 13, 1868; deed from Hess to Muhlendorf, dated March 31, 1868; deed from Simon, executor of the will of Muhlendorf, to the plaintiff, dated August 12, 1874. Plaintiff produced as a witness J. W. Brumagin, who testified as follows: "I was administrator of the Beideman estate. I qualified as special administrator on the 16th of March, 1866. I qualified as general administrator with the will annexed on the 30th of April of the same year, 1866, and continued such administrator until the estate was closed. I know the lot in controversy on the corner of Van Ness avenue and Turk street. I had some connection with that lot as administrator of that estate. I had possession of all the property of the estate. That lot was fenced when I had charge of the estate. I retained the men that were employed by Mr. Beideman in his life-time, and by Mr. Parker, who preceded me as the executor. Those men were in my constant employ, as they had been before in Parker's. They were retained for the purpose of keeping up the fences, and keeping possession of all the property. The fences were boards and posts,—three boards, I believe." Witness was allowed, under objection, to testify that, while he was administrator of the estate of Mr. Beideman, he paid the taxes on the lot in suit, and no one was in actual possession. Frederick Hess testified that he purchased the lot in 1867 through Mr. Brumagin, as administrator of the Beideman estate; that the lot was fenced in, but there was no cross-fence, and no one living on the lot; that he sold it to Muhlendorf in 1868. Plaintiff testified as follows: "I have lived in San Francisco since 1852. I knew Mr. Muhlendorf in his life-time. I have known the lot in question as early as 1868 or 1869,—thereabouts. I lived about four blocks from this lot. Mr. Muhlendorf showed me this lot a good many times. I noticed the condition of the lot when I visited it in company with Mr. Muhlendorf. It was a 50-vara lot, fenced in. There were no cross-fences within it. At the time I bought this lot, in 1874, it was fenced in the same manner. When I bought the lot I did not do anything within it in the way of improving it. I had the lot a couple of years before I saw the cross-fence. I was passing around there quite frequently." Plaintiff also testified that he paid the taxes on the lot. Daniel Rogers was produced as a witness on the part of defendant, and testified as follows: "I am a member of the bar. I acted as appraiser of the estate of Robert Muhlendorf, deceased." The inventory and appraisement in the estate of Robert Muhlendorf, deceased, was here shown to witness. Said inventory and appraisement was sworn to by Daniel Rogers, Bradford, and Hinchman, as appraisers, on the 13th day of August, 1873, and filed in said probate court on the 16th day of August, 1873. The witness then continued as follows: "I see by the inventory that I signed it together with the other appraisers, Mr. Bradford and Mr. Hinchman. As appraiser of that estate, I appraised the lot at the south-east corner of Turk and Van Ness avenue. I have no recollection of the condition of the lot at that time as to occupation or inclosure. I am certain of this: that at the time I had a moral conviction from inspection of the lot or information from sources. I must have seen the lot at the time, and I have seen it long before that time, and many times since. When I made this appraisement, this matter was fresh in my memory. I would not have written that there unless I had at that time a knowledge of it. I observe that is in my hand-writing. The words, 'Valued at $8,000 with a good title, but in its present condition valued at $5,000,' on the fourth page of the inventory, are in my handwriting. I will state that very often I am called to sign my name to a will, and, when called into court to prove that, I have no recollection of anything at the time except seeing my name there. I know all the facts existed at the time of my signing that, knowing my care and particularity in these matters, although I may at the time have no recollection of it." Counsel for defendant then offered in evidence said inventory and appraisement in the estate of Robert Muhlendorf, deceased. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the evidence as irrelevant and incompetent. The court sustained the objection, and counsel for defendant excepted. Defendant's counsel then offered to prove by the witness Rogers that he knew, and, when the matter was fresh in his mind, made a memorandum as to, the possession of the property in the year 1873; and defendant's counsel placed in the hands of the witness the inventory and appraisement which he stated to have been signed by him; and thereupon the court excluded the said evidence, and defendant's counsel excepted.

[1] Rehearing granted.

J. M. Seawell, for appellant. Jarboe & Harrison and J. Naphtaly, for respondent.

Per Curiam. This is an action of ejectment to recover a lot of land situate on the south-east corner of Van Ness avenue and Turk street, in the city and county of San Francisco. The answer denies plaintiff's alleged ownership and right of possession of a certain portion of the lot described in the complaint, and sets up the statute of limitations, (sections 318,[1] 319, Code Civil Proc.) There was a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and a judgment was entered thereon, from which the defendant has appealed.

The basis of plaintiff's title is the prior possession of himself and his grantors. It is claimed by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to show that either the plaintiff or any of his grantors ever had the actual possession of the land. We have carefully examined the evidence in the record, and think there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

We do not think the court erred in excluding the inventory, or in rejecting the proffered testimony of the witness Rogers. The inventory was admissible in evidence only as memoranda to refresh the memory of the witness. It was not competent evidence to prove the facts stated in the inventory itself. The defendant was not injured by the rejection of the testimony, because the witness had already been permitted to testify to all he could have testified to, using the inventory as a memorandum.

Exceptions were taken to some of the instructions of the court to the jury; but we think, taken as a whole, they are fair and correct.

It is claimed that the court erred in charging that the plaintiff had made out a record title. It is true that the court did say that "the plaintiff has made out a record title to the land in controversy;" but later on, when attention was called by an exception to that portion of the charge, the court said: "I do not remember my exact words. I say I have decided here, as the deeds were offered in evidence, that the record title was complete from Mr. Beideman's time down to the plaintiff in this case. Whatever title Beideman had at the time of his death, the records show that the plaintiff has acquired whatever title Mr. Beideman had." This latter statement was strictly correct, and must have been understood by the jury.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 318, provides: "No action for the recovery of real property, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, can be maintained, unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action."

We do not think the court erred in permitting the plaintiff to prove payment of taxes by Brumagin. The evidence was admissible to show the nature and character of the claim, and that it had not been abandoned. The instructions of the court on the subject of taxes were correct.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Mr. Justice HARRISON, being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing opinion, and Justice MCFARLAND acted in his place.

BYERS v. LOCKE. (No. 14,616.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—AGREEMENTS RELATING TO LAND.

An agreement providing that defendant should advance the necessary money, and redeem the property of plaintiff, which had been sold under a decree of foreclosure, and that, for the purpose of enabling defendant to do so, plaintiff would convey the premises to defendant, to be held by him until such time as they might be sold, is not an agreement "for the sale of real property or of an interest therein," which Civil Code, §§ 1624, 1741, declare "invalid, unless in writing."

Department 1. Appeal from supreme court, San Joaquin county; ANSEL SMITH, Judge.

Action by Byers against Locke. From a judgment entered on a verdict for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Green and A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Wilkes & Rutherford, J. G. Swinnerton, and John C. Byers, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff, being the owner of certain real estate which had been sold under a decree of foreclosure, made an agreement with the defendant just prior to the expiration of the time for redemption from said sale that the defendant should advance the money necessary therefor and redeem the property from said sale, and, for the purpose of enabling him to do so, he would convey the premises to the defendant, and that the defendant should hold the same until such time as they might be sold, and in the mean time advance such moneys as might be necessary for the payment of taxes and assessments thereon, and that upon the sale of said premises he would, after deducting from the proceeds therefrom the moneys so advanced, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, pay the balance of said proceeds to the plaintiff; that thereupon he did, on the 10th day of July, 1888, convey the premises to the defendant, who immediately redeemed the same from the foreclosure sale, and held them until April 12, 1890, on which day, with the consent of the plaintiff, he sold them for $12,160, paying, in the mean time, certain amounts for taxes, street assessments, and other charges; that after deducting the amounts so paid, with interest thereon, from the amount received upon the sale, there remained $2,021.87, for which he asked judgment against the defendant. The defendant denied that any such agreement had been made, and alleged that at the time of the conveyance to him he had purchased from the party his equity of redemption in the premises for the sum of $150, which he then paid him, and that thereafter, until the sale by him, he had been the absolute owner thereof. The cause was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed by him, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed. The jury has determined, upon the contradictory evidence before it, that the agreement between the parties was as is alleged by the plaintiff, and its determination thereon is conclusive upon an appeal to this court. The errors of law urged by the appellant are based upon his contention that it was not competent to prove this agreement by oral testimony, for the reason that it was an agreement relating to the sale of land. The contract or agreement upon which the action is brought is not, however, an agreement for the sale of land, or for the creation of any interest therein. The action is merely for the payment of the money agreed upon as the consideration for which the plaintiff executed to the defendant the conveyance of the land. It is not every agreement relating to the sale of lands that is within the statute of frauds, but only such agreements as are intended to create an interest in lands. The provision of the Code is that an agreement "for the sale of real property, or of an interest therein, is invalid unless in writing," (Civil Code, §§ 1624, 1741,) and that "all contracts may be oral except such as are specially required by the statute to be in writing," (Id. § 1622;) and it is only when the agreement is required by the statute to be in writing that evidence of the agreement cannot be received without the writing, (Code Civil Proc. § 1973.) An agreement by the vendee to pay for the land sold and conveyed to him is not within the statute of frauds, (Thomas v. Dickinson, 12 N. Y. 364;) and the vendor, after the contract on his part has been executed by a conveyance of the land, may maintain an action upon such agreement, and establish it by oral testimony. The recital in the deed that the consideration has been paid is not conclusive, (Shephard v. Little, 14 Johns. 210,) nor is the vendor thereby estopped from maintaining an action for its price, (White v. Miller, 22 Vt. 380;) and it may be shown that the real consideration was of a different amount from that expressed in the deed, (Bowen v. Bell, 20 Johns. 338; Belden v. Seymour, 8 Conn. 304,) or of an entirely different character, (McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460,) and that the vendee agreed to pay an additional amount, contingent upon some future event or transaction, as that upon a resale by him he would pay a portion of the proceeds that might be received in excess of the amount then paid by him, (Miller v. Kendig, 55 Iowa, 174, 7 N. W. Rep. 500; Michael v. Foil, 100 N. C. 178, 6 S. E. Rep. 264;) or the whole of said proceeds, (Hall v. Hall, 8 N. H. 129;) or the excess above the advances then made by him, (Linscott v. McIntire, 15 Me. 201.) In Collins v Tillou, 26 Conn. 368, the plaintiff had conveyed certain land to the defendant by an absolute deed, upon the verbal agreement by the defendant that he would sell the same, and turn over the proceeds to the plaintiff, and it was held that this agreement of the defendant was not within the statute of frauds, and that, after a sale by him, the plaintiff could maintain assumpsit for the proceeds, and prove the agreement by oral testimony. In Hess v. Fox, 10 Wend. 436, the mortgagor conveyed the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, and the mortgage was canceled upon the verbal agreement of the mortgagee that he would sell the premises for the best price that could be got, and, after deducting the amount of the mortgage debt, pay over the surplus of the sales to the mortgagor, and the transaction was held not to be within the statute of frauds, and that assumpsit would lie for the surplus proceeds. See, also, Reyman v. Mosher, 71 Ind. 596; Hodges v. Green, 28 Vt. 358; Goodspeed v. Fuller, 46 Me. 141; Trowbridge v. Wetherbee, 11 Allen, 361; Price v. Sturgis, 44 Cal. 591; McCarthy v. Pope, 52 Cal. 561. The other rulings complained of were without error, and as the court did not err in receiving oral evidence of the agreement under which the property was conveyed to the defendant, and as the jury have found from such evidence that the defendant made the agreement as claimed by the plaintiff, judgment was properly rendered in accordance with such verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

RIX v. HORSTMANN et al. (No. 14,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1892.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to quiet title claimed by adverse possession, it was shown that R. obtained possession of a certain lot as early as 1870; that S. acquired title to the lot in 1871; that R. continued to rent out the property, and make necessary repairs, down to 1889, when he deeded the lot to plaintiff, his son, without consideration; that, during such period, R. paid all taxes assessed on the lot, though assessed to S., and also paid the taxes assessed to a bank on a mortgage on the lot executed by S. to the bank; that in 1879 a mortgage on the lot was executed by S. to secure a creditor of R.; that no one ever heard R. claim that he owned the property; and that, as R. was in possession, S. just let him use it, and did not object. Held, that the possession of R. was not adverse.

2. The admission of the testimony of certain persons that plaintiff brought to their office an abstract showing S.'s title, and that he urged the sufficiency of the security for the mortgage to secure R.'s creditor, was harmless error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by William Rix against John Horstmann, Aaron G. Spencer, and Mary Spencer, to quiet title. From an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Rix, in pro. per. Geo. A. Rankin, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from an order refusing a new trial. The action is to quiet title to a lot of land fronting 19 feet on Pine street, in the city of San Francisco. Horstmann is the only defendant who answered, and he claims to have acquired title through A. G. Spencer, under a proceeding for the foreclosure of two mortgages executed by him. It was admitted at the trial that the legal title is in Horstmann, unless the plaintiff has title by the adverse possession of himself or his grantor. Since 1870 Alfred Rix, plaintiff's father, has owned a lot on the corner of Pine and Powell streets, in San Francisco, and upon it there has been a large boarding-house, which has been kept by Rix, his wife superintending and managing it. It was known as "743 Pine Street." Adjoining, being 739 Pine street, on the property in dispute, was a two-story house, of which it seems Alfred Rix had possession as early as 1870. How he became possessed, the record does not show. This property has a frontage on Pine street of 19 feet. Next to it, easterly, at 737 Pine street, was the residence of A. G. Spencer for three or four years, beginning with 1870. After that he lived in the boarding-house at 743 Pine street. Mrs. Spencer was a sister of Mrs. Alfred Rix, and seems to have assisted her in managing the boarding-house. There is some evidence tending to show that the boarding-house business included the three buildings above mentioned. A. G. Spencer acquired title to lot 739 in 1871, but Alfred Rix continued to rent the property, and to collect rents, and make such repairs as were required, down to May, 1889, at which time plaintiff received his deed. Rix also paid all taxes assessed on the property during that period. It was always assessed to A. G. Spencer. Spencer mortgaged the property soon after his purchase to secure a loan of $1,500 from the Hibernia Bank. Afterwards, he mortgaged the property to the Clay-Street Bank to secure a loan of the same amount, and then to the French Bank. The last-named mortgage was in existence on and after 1880, and the mortgage tax, as the law required, was assessed to the bank. Alfred Rix paid not only the tax assessed on the property to A. G. Spencer, but the tax on the mortgage assessed to the bank, for the interest acquired through its mortgage from Spencer. This mortgage was given before the new constitution took effect, and provided that the mortgagor should pay the taxes. Rix continued to pay them until 1886. In 1879 the furniture in the boarding-house was attached, and Mrs. Rix, settling an indebtedness which must have been her husband's, compromised the claims, and one of the conditions of the compromise was that the payment of $2,000 should be secured by a mortgage upon the property in dispute. It was so secured by a mortgage executed by A. G. Spencer. It is one of the mortgages under the foreclosure of which defendant Horstmann claims to have acquired title. Alfred Rix was not called as a witness by the plaintiff, who is his son. No one ever heard him say that he claimed the property as his own. His brother-in-law, Spencer, testified: "Mr. Alfred Rix never claimed to me to own the property. No one, except myself, ever claimed to own it, so far as I know." Plaintiff tells how he acquired his title: "No consideration actually passed. I wrote to my father, and told him I wanted the piece of property. I made out the deed, and sent it to him, and he executed it." Spencer was a witness for defendant. He is plaintiff's uncle, and his interest in the property had been foreclosed and sold. He does not seem to know how Rix came to keep possession of the property. He says: "I knew who was occupying it,—tenants of Mrs. Rix. She kept a boarding-house. I never gave her permission to use the property." "Question. Well, how did she come to use it? Answer. Well, she had possession of the premises. She never requested my permission. Q. Well, did you ever make any objection to her using them? A. I did not. Q. Just let her use them? A. She had possession. She might as well use it, anyway." His deposition was taken before the trial. Being asked in regard to improvements, he testified: "Question. Didn't you know the front of the place was different; that is, the front steps? Answer. Perhaps Mr. Rix did that; I never told him. It might have been for his own benefit. He said he ought to do something for the use of it." At the trial he testified that this answer was a mistake; that Rix did not make the remark attributed to him. The court may have believed the first statement. We think the trial court correctly held that the possession of Rix was not adverse.

The alleged error in allowing Freeman and Bates to testify that plaintiff brought to their office the abstract showing Spencer's title, and that he urged the sufficiency of the security for the $2,000 mortgage, conceding it to have been error, was harmless. So far as there was any point in it, the evidence was already in, without objection, in the testimony of plaintiff himself. We advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

ROSENTHAL v. McMANN et al. (No. 13,614.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 27, 1892.)

CONVERSION—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—JUDGMENT OF DISMISSAL—RES JUDICATA—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

1. In an action for conversion, a complaint which alleges that plaintiff is entitled to possession is sufficient, when not objected to, to support a judgment for plaintiff, though it fails to aver ownership in plaintiff.

2. A judgment dismissing an action by a non-resident for failure to furnish security for costs, as allowed by Code Civil Proc. § 1037, though within the class of cases in which section 582 provides that judgment "must" be rendered on the merits, is not a judgment on the merits, and therefore is not a bar to a subsequent suit on the same cause of action, since section 1908, subd. 2, provides that a judgment in such case is conclusive only "in respect to the matter directly adjudged."

3. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the material facts, the evidence will not be reviewed on appeal.

4. Code Civil Proc. § 581, providing that an action "may" be dismissed by the court when, after verdict or final submission, the party entitled to judgment neglects to have the same entered for more than six months, is not mandatory; and a motion to dismiss, made five days after the expiration of the six months, was properly denied, where the unsuccessful party was not injured by the delay, and the attorney for the other party testified that he paid the clerk the fee for the entry of judgment, which, under the rules, was equivalent to an order to enter judgment, and that he informed the clerk of the opposing attorney that he would not proceed on the judgment until the motion for new trial was disposed of.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action for conversion by Jennie Rosenthal against William McMann and Ben Schloss. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. J. Platshek, Frank Eisner, and Mitchell & McPike, for appellants. M. C. Hassett and Jas. F. Tevlin, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This record presents three appeals,—from the judgment, from the order refusing a new trial, and from an order made after judgment refusing to dismiss the action because judgment was not entered within six months after its rendition. The action was brought to recover damages for the conversion of $500, and it is averred in the complaint "that on the 14th day of June, A. D. 1887, plaintiff was possessed of five hundred ($500) dollars in gold coin of the United States, and that she then was, and ever since has been, and now is, entitled to the possession thereof." Conversion and damage are then charged, but there is no averment of ownership. The defendants did not demur, but answered by a general denial and plea of a former judgment in bar. On the trial no objection was made to the sufficiency of the complaint, but the issue of fact was whether the money belonged to plaintiff or her husband, whose creditors had attached it. It is now claimed that the complaint is insufficient to support the judgment, which was for the plaintiff, because it does not aver ownership or title in the plaintiff. To enable a plaintiff to recover for property taken by a wrong-doer, he must have the general ownership or a special ownership in the goods, and one having the possession, merely, is the owner as against a wrong-doer. But it is said that possession is merely probative. One may recover against a wrong-doer upon a complaint averring ownership although he prove possession only, because, as against a mere trespasser, that proves ownership; but here it is claimed the question is not one of evidence, but of pleading. But even on that theory the facts necessary to show a cause of action in the plaintiff are all contained in the complaint, although some essential fact may appear only by inevitable inference. If the findings had included the facts averred, and had gone further, and stated that the property was not plaintiff's, but belonged to some third person whose bailee she was, it would have supported the judgment. In fact, the allegation formerly deemed requisite, or at least held to be sufficient, "was lawfully possessed as of his own property," contained nothing more. The possession would be presumed lawful, and, as against a trespasser, even one who obtained possession wrongfully was deemed to have been lawfully possessed.

It is claimed that the judgment is not sustained by the findings. Finding No. 3 shows that the plaintiff, July 21, 1887, commenced an action against these defendants for the same cause of action set up in the complaint herein; that the defendants appeared and answered in that action; that afterwards, November 5, 1887, a notice demanding from plaintiff security for costs, on the ground that she resided out of the state, was served on plaintiff's attorney in that suit, and thereafter, to-wit, December 7, 1887, no undertaking having been given, the court ordered said action to be dismissed, and judgment was accordingly duly made, given, and entered, dismissing said action. The proceedings which resulted in that judgment were under sections 1036 and 1037 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is contended that the judgment so entered dismissing the action was a judgment on the merits, and therefore a bar to any other action founded upon the same cause of action. It is not denied that this suit is identical in that respect with the first suit. The argument in support of this position is as follows: Section 581, Code Civil Proc., enumerates six different cases in which judgment of dismissal or nonsuit may be entered. Judgment of dismissal for failure to give security for costs, as authorized by section 1037, is plainly not one of the cases provided for in section 581. The next section (582) reads: "In every case, other than those mentioned in the last section, judgment must be rendered on the merits." This case is not one of those mentioned, and therefore it is a judgment on the merits. This contention may be summarily disposed of by reference to the second subdivision of section 1908, Code Civil Proc., by virtue of which the judgment is made a bar, if it be one: "The judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive," etc. The matter directly adjudged here was that plaintiff had failed to give security for costs, and therefore could not be heard, and not that she had no cause of action, or that defendants had a valid defense. A judgment upon the merits is one which determines, either upon an issue of law or fact, which party is right. A judgment that a party cannot be heard can only conclude as to that question. It could not determine the merits of the action, which the court refused to consider at all. Although not on the merits, should it preclude an absent plaintiff, after becoming a resident here, or after he is able to give security, from bringing another suit? Not being a bar under the statute, we see no reason why it should.

There is nothing in the objection to the admission in evidence of certain statements of plaintiff, and the matter seems utterly harmless if admitted to have been erroneous. There was a substantial conflict in the testimony, and we cannot review it. The alleged discrepancies in plaintiff's testimony are too obvious. When speaking of her lack of means, she must refer to means furnished by her husband. She speaks of her lack of money and her $500 in bank almost in the same breath. She was not asked to explain. Her evidence, however, does not seem very satisfactory, but she positively states the essential facts of her case, and the court may have concluded from the appearance and bearing of defendants' witnesses that they were unworthy of belief. At any rate, under the well-established rules, this court cannot interfere.

The appeal is from the order refusing to dismiss the case because judgment was not entered within six months after its rendition. The findings were filed March 11, 1889. Notice of motion to dismiss was served September 17th, and judgment was recorded September 19th. The notice was given, therefore, five days after the six months had expired, and the judgment was entered seven days after the expiration of that period. Two excuses were given for the neglect: One, that plaintiff's attorney paid four dollars, which he avers the rules of the court required as a fee for the entry of judgment, but did not tell the clerk to enter or to forbear entering the judgment. He claims that this was equivalent to an order to enter it. Appellants deny the existence of the rule, and the rules are not brought up. We still have, however, the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney that he paid four dollars to the clerk as a fee for recording the judgment. The other excuse is that he informed the clerk of defendants' attorney that he would not proceed on the judgment until the motion for a new trial was disposed of. This fact is denied by appellants' attorney, and it seems a little inconsistent with other reasons given for the delay. It appears that appellants were not injured by the delay. The affidavit of the attorney shows that he did not know that judgment had not been entered. But appellants claim that section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure is mandatory, and that the court had no discretion in the matter. Plaintiff had neglected to have the judgment entered for more than six months, and defendants were absolutely entitled to the order. The first clause of section 581 reads: "An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases." Then follow six subdivisions specifying the cases, in all of which it is claimed the right of a party to a dismissal is absolute. Therefore "may" in the first clause, which applies to all the subdivisions, should be read "must." But this is a mistaken assumption. The two first cases are where the parties "may" dismiss. These subdivisions are not addressed to the clerk, as appellants assume. Under the first, the plaintiff "may" dismiss; under the second, either party. It is evident that the word cannot be read "must," as applied to either of these cases. The third applies to the court, and authorizes a dismissal when the plaintiff fails to appear at the trial. This has never been regarded as mandatory, and, if it were, the party in default could apply for relief under section 473, when his neglect may be excused. The fourth provides for the right to have a case dismissed when the plaintiff abandons it. This seems a natural right of the defendant, and may be therefore considered as mandatory. The fifth is the ordinary motion of nonsuit, and is not mandatory in any other sense than that every judicial determination should be correct. It is really a judgment upon the evidence as to the rights of the parties, not conclusive, because the statute so ordains. The only remaining subdivision is the one in question. We have seen the argument that the language is mandatory, because the right is absolute in the other subdivisions, cannot be maintained. The authorities cited do not apply; they are merely to the effect that a public officer cannot decline to do an act which is enjoined upon him by law, or to perform an official duty. The judge cannot decline to try a case properly pending in his court, or to hear an application for an order he has the power to make, nor can the clerk decline to file papers which parties have a right to have filed. To suppose that they apply to this case is to assume the very point in debate,—that the right is absolute. But, if the right were absolute, the party in default would have the right to apply to be relieved from the order, if made through his excusable neglect, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, that being so, it seems trifling to say the excuse cannot be heard when the order is applied for. Considering that no harm has occurred through the delay, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in making the order. We advise that the judgment and the orders be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and the orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SCOTT. (No. 20,842.)

CRIMINAL LAW—REJECTION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Defendant, on trial for assault with intent to kill, was not allowed to ask the prosecuting witness if he had not stated to various parties (naming them) that he (witness) would use his shotgun on defendant, or words to that effect. Subsequently defendant was allowed to prove by these "various parties" the statements made by the prosecuting witness. Held, that the refusal, if error, was harmless.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. HAM, Judge.

J. W. Scott was convicted of assault with intent to commit murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. S. Harker, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendant was convicted of an assault with intent to commit murder, and now prosecutes an appeal to this court. The instructions asked by defendant, and refused, were substantially given in the charge of the court. Neither do we think the evidence was of the character upon which to predicate an instruction that the defendant could be convicted of a simple assault. He was either justifiable, or guilty of a graver offense. People v. Madden, 76 Cal. 521, 18 Pac. Rep. 402. Again, if counsel desired such an instruction to be given, he should have requested the court to that effect.

It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to ask the prosecuting witness, on cross-examination, questions concerning alleged threats made by said witness against defendant prior to the day of the shooting. These matters were not adverted to in the examination in chief, and could only be proper in cross-examination for the purpose of indicating the prejudice and bias of the witness upon the stand, and thereby tending to weaken the effect of his testimony. Inasmuch as the witness was then testifying in the role of a prosecuting witness against the defendant upon an accusation charging the defendant with assault to murder him, it would seem that the presentation of evidence upon the part of the counsel tending to show the bias of the witness against the defendant was a waste of energy. The record recites: "Counsel for defendant then inquired fully into a quarrel defendant and the witness had on the 21st and 22d days of January, and as to witness' feelings towards defendant; all of which said inquiries were fully answered by the witness." It would seem from this disclosure in the record that the court allowed defendant quite a wide latitude in exhibiting the animus of the witness' mind to the jury. The main point in defendant's contention appears to be that the error was committed in not allowing him to ask the witness if he had not stated to various parties (naming them) that he (witness) would use his shotgun upon the defendant, or words to that effect. Counsel insists that these questions were proper for the purpose of laying a foundation for impeachment. Conceding such to be the fact, the error of the court rejecting the offered testimony was entirely harmless; for the defendant, in presenting his own case to the jury, proved by these various parties the statements made by the witness, and being the same matters upon which the court refused to allow the witness to be interrogated. There could be no error in refusing to allow defendant to lay a foundation for impeachment, when the court subsequently admitted the impeaching testimony without a foundation. The statements were admitted in evidence before the jury, and that was all the defendant could ask. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

KIRMAN et al. v. HUNNEWILL et al. (No. 14,463.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—WATER-RIGHTS—ABANDONMENT.

1. The insufficiency of findings to support a judgment cannot be considered on an appeal from an order denying a new trial.

2. Defendants claimed title to a water-right through a company that had absolutely abandoned the right for more than 20 years immediately prior to the time when defendants attempted to assert ownership. During all this time plaintiff had the rights of riparian owner, and most of the time appropriated it to particular uses. Held, that abandonment had destroyed the right claimed by defendants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mono county; O. F. HAKES, Judge.

Action by Kirman and others against Hunnewill and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. O. Parker, C. A. Schuman, James E. Goodal, and Fox, Kellog & King, for appellants. Richard S. Miner, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to enjoin defendants from diverting the waters of a natural water-course, and to recover damages for past diversion thereof. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs; and defendants, having made a motion for a new trial, and the court having denied the same, appeal from the order denying said motion. There is no appeal from the judgment.

1. Nearly the whole force of the arguments of appellants' counsel is directed to the point that the findings do not support the judgment. In their final brief, after having referred to Dedmon v. Moffitt, (Cal.) 26 Pac. Rep. 800, they say: "We are not asking here, as was asked there, to reverse the judgment for want of a particular finding; but our contention is that this judgment should be reversed because it is not supported by the findings made." But it is definitely settled that the insufficiency of the findings to support the judgment cannot be considered on an appeal from an order denying a new trial. That point can be raised only on an appeal from the judgment. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. Rep. 186; In re Doyle, 73 Cal. 567, 15 Pac. Rep. 125; Martin v. Matfield, 49 Cal. 45. Counsel for appellants say, among other things, that certain general findings are inconsistent with certain special findings, that therefore the special findings should prevail, and that upon the special findings the judgment should have been for appellants. But that is nothing more than saying that the findings do not support the judgment,—a position which, as we have seen, cannot be taken on this appeal. If a court, upon an issue essential to the decision of the case, should make two findings directly contradictory of each other, the point might possibly be made, on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, that there was no finding upon such essential issue, and therefore a mistrial. Such point, however, is not made here; and, moreover, we find in this case no such contradictory findings.

2. There is some contention, apparently not much relied on, that the evidence is insufficient to support some of the findings. There are about 600 pages of evidence in the printed transcript. Most of it consists of the testimony of witnesses by question and answer, apparently taken bodily from the reporter's notes. It could hardly be expected that this court would critically examine this mass of matter, which ought to have been condensed to one-sixth of its present volume. We have looked through it, however, and have seen no reason for disturbing the findings for want of support in the evidence.

3. It is contended by appellants that the court erred in sustaining objections to certain deeds, bills of sale, and records offered by appellants as tending to prove paper title in them to a certain ditch and water-right claimed by them. It appears from the findings that as early as 1862 plaintiffs' grantors settled upon lands through which a natural water-course runs, called "Dogtown Creek;" and since then plaintiffs and their grantors have continuously used the water of said stream to irrigate said lands, and for general farming and domestic purposes. The said lands were then public lands, and they afterwards commenced to obtain title thereto. They first perfected their title to part of the land, through a United States patent, in 1871, and gradually, through the next few years, perfected their title to the whole. It is not necessary to accurately determine what rights plaintiffs had to the use of the water during the period when they were taking steps to acquire the title of the government, because after they received the first patent in 1871 they had all the rights of riparian proprietors, and the decision of the case would be the same if their rights are held as commencing only from that date. Dogtown creek runs in a southerly direction to and over plaintiffs' land, and has a fork or tributary, called "West Fork of Dogtown Creek," and also another tributary, further to the east, called "Virginia Creek," both of which empty into the main creek above the land of plaintiffs. In the fall of 1860 an association of miners working mines at Monoville, which is east of and beyond the water-shed of said Dogtown creek and its said tributaries, built a ditch from said West Fork across said Virginia creek to said Monoville, and thus conveyed all the water of said West Fork, except about 40 inches, to said Monoville, for the purpose of working mines at said latter place. This unincorporated, and apparently unorganized, association, composed of about 200 persons, was called, as the findings show, the "New Ditch Company;" but as early as 1862 it began to disband, and the members of it began to scatter and go to other localities, but "various persons and strangers" continued to use the ditch until some time in 1864. The ditch then fell into disuse, and was abandoned, except a small part of it running from said West Fork of Dogtown creek to a point called "Outlet," between said West Fork and said Virginia creek. The rest of it, from 1864 to 1886,—more than 20 years,—"was absolutely abandoned, and no person or persons whatever exercised any ownership over or used the same for any purpose whatever." From 1864 to 1886 the water either ran directly down the said West Fork and upon plaintiffs' land, or it was carried during the mining seasons through the remnant of the ditch to said "Outlet," and was used "by various persons" to mine some gravel diggings in the neighborhood, from whence it ran down to and upon plaintiffs' land. It does not appear that this use of the water at said gravel diggings impaired its value to plaintiffs. They do not complain of it, and such use is not affected by the judgment herein. And during said period, from 1864 to 1886, all of said water continuously flowed down to the land of plaintiffs, and was used by them to irrigate their land, and for domestic and general farming purposes. But in 1886 and 1887 the defendants diverted all the water of said West Fork of Dogtown creek, and carried it entirely beyond the said water-shed, so that it could not flow back to plaintiffs' land. Now the defendants sought to connect themselves with the right of said old disbanded association of miners of 1860–62, and for this purpose offered the papers which the court ruled out. The first was a money judgment in the district court in favor of one Shaw against the "United Water-Ditch Company" for $11,500. The next paper offered was a deed to said Shaw from a constable, purporting to have been made in pursuance of a sale upon an execution issued out of a justice's court on a money judgment in favor of one Phelps against the United Water-Ditch Company, nothing having been offered except the deed itself. The next was a deed from Shaw to a grantor of the defendants. The said judgment was rendered and said two deeds were executed in 1862 and 1863. The other papers offered were bills of sale, dependent for their value upon said deed by Shaw. There are some apparent objections to the evidence offered, even if it had been material. It is difficult, for instance, to see how a valid judgment could have been obtained against such a body as said "association of miners." But, as their name was the "New Ditch Company," how could they or their property be affected by a judgment against the "United Water-Ditch Company?" And how could a mere money judgment be evidence of title to real property? As to the constable's deed, there was no basis for its introduction. But, if the offered evidence had been admitted, it would not have changed the aspect of the case at all. The court found that the old ditch and water-right, by which the water had for a short time been carried beyond the water-shed of Dogtown creek, had been abandoned for more than 20 years next preceding the time when, in 1886–87, the defendants undertook to again carry it beyond said water-shed; and that during most of that time plaintiffs not only had the right to it as riparian owners, but had also appropriated it to particular uses. If, therefore, the old "association of miners" could now be materialized, and made a present legal entity, it could not maintain the right which appellants sought to assert under it. Decisions are cited to the proposition that a water-right may be changed both as to the point of diversion and the place of use; but after it has been destroyed by abandonment there is nothing left to change. See Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 27. The order appealed from is affirmed.

COSTS ON APPEAL—AUTHORITY OF CLERK—INSERTION OF COSTS IN REMITTITUR.

Where, in an action of claim and delivery, verdict is for plaintiff for the return of the property, or for the value thereof, but the clerk enters judgment for the value, and not in the alternative, and, on appeal by defendant, the supreme court affirm the judgment, but order it to be amended to conform to the verdict, the clerk properly inserted costs in the remittitur in favor of defendant, under supreme court rule 24, which provides that, in all cases in which the judgment appealed from is reversed, or modification contains no direction as to costs, the clerk will insert in the remittitur a judgment that the appellants recover the costs of appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

In the case of Meads v. Lasar, 28 Pac. Rep. 935, an amendment of the judgment was ordered, and the clerk inserted in the remittitur the words "with costs." Motion of plaintiffs to recall the remittitur. Denied.

S. F. Geil, H. V. Morehouse, and J. M. Wilcoxen, for appellants. N. A. Dorn, W. M. R. Parker, and G. W. Webster, for respondents.

MCFARLAND J. This is a motion of respondent for an order recalling the remittitur hereinbefore issued, because, as is contended, the clerk of this court inadvertently or improperly inserted in the judgment the words "with costs." The action was "claim and delivery," and the verdict of the jury was in favor of the plaintiffs for the property sued for, or its value, which was found to be $1,000. The clerk of the trial court, however, entered judgment against defendants for $1,000, and not in the alternative. The defendants appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial; and this court, in its opinion in deciding the appeal, after holding that the judgment should have been in the alternative, said, "This error, however, can be corrected by an amendment of the judgment," and ordered judgment in these words: "The order denying a new trial is affirmed, but the court below is directed to correct the judgment as entered by making it conform to the verdict, and, as so corrected, it will stand affirmed." This was a clear and quite important modification of the judgment; and the clerk of this court properly included costs in the judgment entered in this court, under rule 24, which provides that, "in all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed, or modification contains no direction as to costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the appellants recover the costs of the appeal." There is therefore no ground for granting the motion here made, assuming that this court has the power to recall the remittitur under certain contingencies. The motion is denied.

People v. Arthur et al. (No. 20,894.)

Burglary—Evidence—Sufficiency.

1. Evidence that, early on the morning after a burglary, footsteps were traced from the barber-shop burglarized to a building in which the two defendants were found, apparently asleep; that part of the stolen goods were concealed in the building; that goods stolen from a store at the same time were concealed near the entrance of the building; that chisels were concealed therein, one of which fitted the marks made by forcing open the door of the barber shop; that within two days before the burglary one of the defendants inquired of a bootblack of the barber-shop where he kept his money; and that on the day after the burglary one of the defendants told his young brother to go to a place where a part of the goods were afterwards found, and see if they were still there,—was sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. Where defendants introduced a part of the written testimony of a certain witness, taken at the preliminary examination, it was proper for the prosecution to explain such testimony by introducing the preceding part thereof, which related to substantially the same subject.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

James Arthur and Frank Stewart were convicted of burglary, and appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Devel, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFarland, J. The defendants were convicted of burglary in the first degree, and appeal from the judgment, and an order denying a new trial. There are a great many points formally made in the bill of exceptions, and merely alluded to in appellants' brief, which it would serve no valuable purpose to notice in detail. We see no material error of law committed by the trial court, and the real question in the case is whether this court should grant a new trial because the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. There was evidence showing, or tending to show, among other things, that, early on the morning after the burglary, footsteps were traced from the barber-shop burglarized to a vacant building near by, in which the defendants were found, apparently asleep; that goods taken from the barber-shop were found concealed under sawdust in said building, within a few feet of the place where defendants were sleeping; that other goods taken from a store adjoining the barber-shop, which store had also been burglarized on the same occasion, were found concealed near the entrance of said vacant building beneath some old pipe and barrels; that some chisels were found concealed in said building, one of which fitted the marks on the door of the barber-shop, which had been evidently forced open by the use of some hard instrument; that, within one or two days before the commission of the burglary, one of the defendants inquired of a bootblack connected with the barber-shop how much money he was making, and where he kept it; and that the day after the burglary one of the defendants was heard telling his young brother to go to the spot where a part of the goods were afterwards found, and see if they were still there. No doubt the evidence left room for a plausible argument to the jury that the guilt of the defendants had not been sufficiently established; but it so presented an issue of fact as to place the determination of such issue entirely within the proper province of the jury. There was no error in the instructions given by the court on its own motion or at the request of the prosecution, and all the instructions asked by defendants were allowed. The defendants introduced a part of the written testimony of the witness James Wilson, which had been taken at the preliminary examination; and it was not error for the court to allow the prosecution to introduce a preceding part of that testimony, as it was substantially upon the same subject, and explanatory and illustrative of the part introduced by the defendants. The point sought to be made as to the cross-examination of defendants' witness Henry Arthur does not properly appear in the record. There are no other points which need special notice. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

Marysville Electric Light & Power Co. v. Johnson. (No. 14,478.)

Corporations—Subscription to Stock—Assessments—Pleading.

1. Defendant and others, for the purpose of forming a corporation, agreed to "subscribe for stock to the amount set opposite to our respective names; amounts to be due and payable on the formation of the company and the issuance of the stock." Held, that the corporation, when formed, could sue on such agreement as a contract made for its benefit.

2. Civil Code, § 332, providing for the recovery of assessments on the subscribed stock of a corporation, does not apply; the action having been brought on the agreement. Manufacturing Co. v. Schafer, 57 Cal. 396, distinguished.

3. Where the complaint does not show that the articles of incorporation failed to state that defendant was a subscriber to the capital stock, or the amount of such subscription, it is good against a general demurrer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; John C. Gray, Judge.

C. A. Webb and Wm. G. Murphy, for appellant. W. H. Carlin, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant upon the following agreement, alleged to have been signed by him and others: "For the purpose of forming a corporation to have for its object the furnishing of the incandescent system of electric lighting to those who may desire the same, and to provide the funds for the purchase of the necessary plant, we, the undersigned, hereby subscribe for stock to the amount set opposite to our respective names; amounts to be due and payable upon the formation of the company and the issuance of the stock." The complaint alleges that the agreement was made and signed in contemplation of incorporating the plaintiff for the purpose of carrying on the business therein stated, and that thereafter it was duly incorporated under the laws of this state by the defendant and the other persons signing said agreement. It is further alleged "that said corporation, this plaintiff, succeeded to and acquired all the rights of said subscribers, and each of them, to the amounts so subscribed" under the said agreement, and that plaintiff has issued its stock to the subscribers, and tendered to the defendant the amount of stock subscribed for by him, and that he has refused to pay for the same. It is also alleged that plaintiff "duly made," at different times, calls for 15, 60, and 25 per cent. of the amounts so subscribed by the defendant and others. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that the facts therein stated are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This ruling of the court presents the only question to be considered by us at this time.

1. The agreement above set out is certainly valid. The corresponding promises of the other signers, and the common object sought to be accomplished by all the parties to it, constitute a sufficient consideration for the promise of defendant; and upon the formation of the plaintiff corporation by the persons signing the agreement, and plaintiff's acceptance of the agreement, the defendant became bound to take and pay for the number of shares subscribed for by him. Music-Hall Co. v. Carey, 116 Mass. 471; Hotel Co. v. Friedrich, 26 Minn. 112, 1 N. W. Rep. 827; Hughes v. Manufacturing Co., 34 Md. 316; Association v. Walker, (Mich.) 47 N. W. Rep. 338. And it is not material to the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action that it is not expressly named in such agreement as the promisee. The agreement is to be construed according to the evident intention of the parties to it. It just as clearly appears that it was the intention of all the parties that the promise of each should inure to the benefit of the corporation when formed, as if such intention were expressly declared; and therefore, in legal effect, the promise of defendant was to pay to the plaintiff corporation when organized. The corporation really represents the parties to the agreement. It was brought into existence by them as an agent to carry on the business named in the agreement, and through which they were to secure the benefits to arise from their mutual and corresponding promises. There is no difference in principle between the above contract, signed by the defendant, in this case, and that construed by the supreme court of Massachusetts in the case of Music-Hall Co. v. Carey, 116 Mass. 471. In that case the agreement was that the parties signing it would form a corporation, and "pay to the treasurer of the corporation the amount of the several shares" subscribed for; and, in speaking of such an agreement, the court said: "In agreements of this nature, entered into before the organization is formed, or the agent constituted to receive the amounts subscribed, the difficulty is to ascertain the promisee, in whose name alone suit can be brought. The promise of each subscriber, 'to and with each other,' is not a contract capable of being enforced, or intended to operate literally as a contract to be enforced, between each subscriber and each other who may have signed previously, or who should sign afterwards, nor between each subscriber and all the others collectively as individuals. The undertaking is inchoate and incomplete as a contract until the contemplated organization is effected, or the mutual agent constituted to represent the association of individual rights in accepting and acting upon the proposition offered by the several subscriptions. When thus accepted, the promise may be construed to have legal effect according to its purpose and intent, and the practical necessity of the case, to-wit, as a contract with the common representative of the several associates." In Shoe Co. v. Hoit, 56 N. H. 548, certain persons signed the following paper: "The undersigned mutually agree that they will take and pay for the number of shares set against their respective names in the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the general statute of New Hampshire for the purpose of manufacturing boots," etc. Immediately following the names of those signing this agreement, the defendants in that action signed the following: "We, the undersigned, agree to pay in cash a gratuity of one thousand dollars." The plaintiff in that case was subsequently incorporated by the persons who had subscribed the above agreement to take its stock, and brought the action to recover the gratuity of $1,000 agreed to be paid by the defendants therein; and the court held that the action could be maintained, although the plaintiff was not named in the written promise of defendants to pay such gratuity, nor was it in existence when defendants signed the same. The court said: "The agreement was, on the one part, by the subscribers to the stock, of whom the plaintiffs are the successors, or, rather, with the plaintiff,—for the understanding and agreement was that the subscribers to the stock should unite and form the plaintiff corporation,—and, on the other part, by the defendants." So, in this case, the agreement between the parties signing it was, in legal effect, that they would form the plaintiff corporation, and pay to it, as their common representative, the amount by them subscribed for its stock; and the plaintiff is therefore authorized to sue upon such agreement as a contract made for its benefit.

2. The averments of the complaint in regard to the assessments or calls made by plaintiff upon those signing the agreement do not add any strength to it, and may be disregarded as surplusage. There is in the complaint an entire failure to state any facts showing that the plaintiff had the right, under the statute, to make assessments or calls in the amounts named; and it is evident that the action is not to recover assessments upon the subscribed capital stock of the plaintiff, but upon the agreement above set out. Section 332 of the Civil Code, so far as the same applies to corporations like the plaintiff, declares: "No one assessment must exceed ten per cent. of the amount of the capital stock named in the articles of incorporation, except in the cases in this section otherwise provided for, as follows: (1) If the whole capital of a corporation has not been paid up, and the corporation is unable to meet its liabilities or to satisfy the claims of its creditors, the assessment may be for the full amount unpaid upon the capital stock; or if a less amount is sufficient, then it may be for such a percentage as will raise that amount." The respondent insists that if plaintiff is entitled to recover upon defendant's subscription to its capital stock, as contained in the agreement under consideration, it cannot demand the full amount subscribed, unless the same is presently needed to meet its liabilities, or to satisfy the claims of its creditors; and that as the complaint fails to show such a necessity, or that the plaintiff corporation is making an equal demand upon all the subscribers, the demurrer was properly sustained. This action, however, as we have seen, is not one brought under the statute to recover assessments upon the subscribed capital stock of the plaintiff, but is upon the agreement above set out, and that provides that the amount subscribed is "to be due and payable upon the formation of the company and the issuance of the stock;" and in this respect the agreement is similar to that considered by this court in West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 Pac. Rep. 1123, and in relation to which the court, in its opinion by WORKS, J., said: "Here is a positive agreement on the part of the parties who subscribed to this stock to pay a fixed and certain sum of money at a certain time to a certain party. It is clear from the contract itself that it was not the intention that the liability to pay the sum of money named should in any way depend upon an assessment being made by the corporation after its organization. This is quite clear from the fact that the payment is fixed so soon after the organization of the company that such an assessment and its enforcement would have been impossible." So, in this case, the agreement of defendant was to pay the amount of his subscription upon the formation of the company and the issuance of its stock, and not as the same might be called for under section 332 of the Civil Code above quoted; and the agreement being a valid one, and this action being one to enforce it, the measure of defendant's liability is fixed by its terms, and not by the section of the Code referred to. The case of Manufacturing Co. v. Schafer, 57 Cal. 396, (cited by respondent,) is not in conflict with the conclusion we have reached upon this point. There the agreement was to take shares at $5 each; "$1 per share to be paid at the time of subscribing, and $1 more per share every thirty days thereafter until the whole $5 shall be paid into the treasury, in case it is required." The agreement was made after the plaintiff in that case was incorporated. The promise to pay the balance remaining after the first payment was not absolute, as is that of defendant here, but was conditional, and necessarily contemplated that calls should be made upon all alike, and no more should be collected from any one than his proportion; and the court construed the same as having been made with reference to the statute, which declares the circumstances under which corporations may, by assessment, call for payment of the full amount of their subscribed capital stock.

3. It is lastly claimed by the respondent that the complaint does not show that the defendant was named in the articles of incorporation as a subscriber for the stock of plaintiff, and that therefore the complaint is insufficient, under the rule announced in Railroad Co. v. Hildreth, 53 Cal. 123. It is sufficient to say upon this point that the complaint does not show that plaintiff's articles of incorporation failed to state that defendant was a subscriber to or the amount of his subscription to its capital stock. It is therefore good as against a general demurrer. If, in the articles of incorporation, the offer of defendant to subscribe for shares of its stock, as contained in the agreement sued upon, was rejected, and the defendant thereby excluded as a shareholder, the fact must be shown by answer. Such a defense, if it exists, does not arise upon the face of the complaint.

Kirsch v. Derby. (No. 14,576.)

Appeal by Executor—Necessity of Bond.

A complaint alleged that defendant, as executor of a certain estate, received money belonging to plaintiff, and that plaintiff made a demand therefor, which was refused. It also asked that a personal judgment be rendered against defendant for such money, which was done on defendant's failure to appear. Afterwards, on defendant's motion, the court below dispensed with the undertaking on appeal. Held, that under Code Civil Proc. § 946, providing that when an appellant is an executor the court may in its discretion dispense with a bond on appeal, it not appearing that the rights of the estate were not involved, the appeal would not be dismissed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Nye & Richardson, for appellant. Dodge & Fay, for respondent.

De Haven, J. Motion to dismiss an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant. The ground of the motion is that no undertaking on appeal has been filed. In the complaint it is averred that the defendant is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting executor of the estate of Julia Kirsch, deceased, and also "that on or about the 22d of May, 1890, the defendant, as such executor as aforesaid, received the sum of $3,725 from the German Savings and Loan Society, (a corporation,) to and for the use and belonging to plaintiff." The complaint further alleges plaintiff's demand upon defendant for the money, and his refusal to pay, and asks for a personal judgment against him for the amount named. The defendant did not answer, and judgment by default was rendered against him personally, as prayed for in the complaint. The court below, upon motion of defendant's attorneys, made an order under section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure dispensing with the undertaking on appeal, which order also recites that it appeared that the defendant was an executor, and about to appeal from the judgment. We cannot say from the record that this order was made in a case to which section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply. That section provides that when the appellant is an executor, or other person acting in another's right, the court may in its discretion dispense with the security required by the chapter of the Code in which that section is found. It is not indispensably necessary, in order to bring a case within this section, that a judgment should have been rendered against the appellant in his representative capacity. It is sufficient if it is made to appear to the court that the matter in litigation really involves the rights of the estate, and that, if the judgment is unreversed, the property rights of such estate will be affected and its assets diminished. Thus, in this case, if the defendant had answered, and claimed the right to retain as funds of the estate of which he is executor the money sued for in this action, and this issue had been found against him, and judgment thereupon rendered against him, personally, as here, it would seem clear that in appealing from such judgment he would be really acting for the estate. Such appeal would be a continued assertion by him of the right of the estate to the fund in controversy; and it makes no difference that in this case no such answer has been filed by the appellant. As we construe the complaint, it in effect charges that the defendant collected the money sued for in his capacity as executor, and claims the right as such executor to retain it, and not otherwise. If this be so, and he is allowed to retain it, he would be compelled to charge himself with such money in his account as executor, and the same would be subject to distribution as assets of the estate. If, however, the money sued for rightfully belongs to plaintiff, and not to the estate of which defendant is executor,—and this is what the judgment appealed from determines,—then, if already charged with it, the defendant would be entitled to a credit therefor, upon showing this fact, and that he had been compelled, without fault on his part, to pay it to plaintiff under such judgment. Whether a personal judgment against the defendant was proper under the complaint is a question which involves the merits of the appeal, and upon which we express no opinion at this time. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

CAMPBELL v. WEST et al. (No. 14,501.)[1]

DEATH OF PARTY—SUBSTITUTION—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT—ALLEGATION OF REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 385, which provides, inter alia, that, "in case of the death or any disability of a party, the court, on motion, may allow the action or proceeding to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest," the substitution will be made on suggestion of the death of a party, and on ex parte motion showing the appointment and qualification of an executor or administrator.

2. An amended complaint alleged that the original plaintiff died testate, and that D. was "duly appointed and qualified as executor of the last will and testament of said deceased, and ever since has been and now is the duly acting and qualified executor of the estate of said deceased." Held that, while the allegation of representative capacity would have been insufficient if the action had been originally brought by the executor, it served the purpose where the amended complaint was filed by leave of court, in connection with a decree, for the purpose of showing that the action was continued in the name of plaintiff as executor.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Victor Montgomery, for appellants. Ray Billingsley, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an appeal, upon the judgment roll, from a decree foreclosing a mortgage executed by defendants. It appears that the original plaintiff died while this case was pending here on a former appeal, (86 Cal. 197, 24 Pac. Rep. 1000,) and that the present plaintiff was thereupon substituted as administrator of the estate of said deceased upon the suggestion and motion of plaintiff's attorney. After the reversal of the judgment and the filing of the remittitur in the court below, plaintiff moved for and obtained leave to file an amended complaint, in which, among other things, he alleges "that on or about the —— day of April, 1890, Robert Campbell, the original plaintiff in said action, died testate in the county of Los Angeles, Cal., and that subsequently, to-wit, on or about the 12th day of June, 1890, said David F. Campbell was duly appointed and qualified as executor of the last will and testament of said deceased, and ever since has been and now is the duly acting and qualified executor of the estate of said deceased." The amended complaint was duly filed, and a copy thereof personally served on each of the defendants, but no copy was served on their attorney. Defendants having failed to appear and answer or demur to the amended complaint within the time allowed by law, no further time having been granted by the court, the default of the defendants was duly entered.

It is claimed, with some show of seriousness, that "the facts upon which the present plaintiff's cause of action depends are the death of the original plaintiff, and his appointment as executor of the estate of said deceased, and substitution as such executor in place and stead of said deceased. These facts could not be set forth by amended complaint," but should have been pleaded by supplemental complaint. Section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that "in case of the death or any disability of a party the court, on motion, may allow the action or proceeding to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest;" and the practice in this state is well settled, in such cases, for courts to allow the substitution to be made upon suggestion of the death of a party, and on ex parte motion showing the appointment and qualification of the executor or administrator of the estate of the deceased party. The other provisions of this section relating to substitution "in case of any other transfer of interest," when set in motion by plaintiff or the person to whom the transfer is made, or by defendant, if for any reason he desires to avail himself of such transfer for any purpose, must be made by supplemental complaint or answer.

It is further claimed that the amended complaint is insufficient because it fails to properly allege plaintiff's appointment as executor. If this action had been originally brought by plaintiff as executor, etc., there would be some force in the suggestion, for in that case the complaint should allege the death of the testator, "his leaving a last will and testament, the appointment therein of plaintiff as executor, the probate of the will, the issuance of letters testamentary thereon to plaintiff, and his qualification and entry upon the discharge of his duties as executor;" and while the allegation of representative capacity, objected to, is insufficient, it was not essential, but it serves the purpose, having been filed by leave of court, in connection with the decree of foreclosure, of showing that this action was continued in the name of the plaintiff as executor, which must have been preceded by the suggestion of the death of the original plaintiff, and satisfactory proof on an ex parte motion in the court below, after the case was reversed, of the appointment and qualification of plaintiff as executor. Nor is this presumption inconsistent with plaintiff's substitution as administrator by order of this court, while the case was pending here on a former appeal, which we are satisfied was a clerical error. But admitting that it was not a clerical error, and that the substitution here was the only one made, the powers and duties of executors and administrators, under our statute in relation to actions of this character, are in all respects the same. In either case, he is permitted to continue the action as the representative or successor in interest of the deceased plaintiff, and whatever may be recovered therein are assets of the estate of which he is the legal representative; and the misnomer or misdescription of the plaintiff's representative capacity is immaterial, for the reason that the object was to continue the action in the name of the legal representative of the deceased, and, as the powers and duties of executors and administrators are the same with respect to actions of this character, the mistake of the clerk (if it was a mistake) in confounding these representative titles was one which a person in his position would be liable to make, and one that could not by any possibility have operated to the injury of the defendant.

SICHLER v. LOOK et al. (No. 14,472.)

Foreclosure of Mortgage—Jurisdiction—Record on Appeal—Judgment Roll—Presumptions—Effect of Foreclosure—Pleading—Decree.

1. On appeal from a judgment on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, the verity of all matters in the record which are essential to show jurisdiction will be conclusively presumed.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 415, provides that proof of service of summons and complaint in case of publication must be the affidavit of the printer, and an affidavit of a deposit of a copy in the post-office, if the same has been deposited. Section 670 declares that the judgment roll, in case the complaint be not answered by any defendant, consists of the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service, and the complaint, with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment. Held, that since the judgment roll can alone be looked to on appeal, in determining whether the court had jurisdiction, the fact that the order of publication was made three days after the first publication cannot be shown by the order of publication, but only by a bill of exceptions.

3. Under section 670, providing that the judgment roll must contain the affidavit or proof of service, the record is not defective, though it contains only a copy of such affidavit, since it will be presumed that the original was lost, and that a copy was substituted by order of the court, as allowed by section 1045.

4. The indorsement on the complaint of the default of the defendant, as required by section 670, will be presumed to have been made upon proper proof of the mailing of the complaint, though such indorsement is prior to the date of the affidavit of mailing.

5. In an action to foreclose a mortgage an averment of the complaint that defendant "has or claims to have some interest or claim upon said premises, which interest is subsequent to and subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage," is sufficient to show that defendant is a proper party. The character of defendant's interest need not be set forth.

6. In California a mortgage is only a lien on the land, and the effect of a sale under a decree of foreclosure is to extinguish the rights of all defendants acquired subsequently to the date of the mortgage. Therefore a provision of the decree that defendant, and all persons claiming or to claim under him, "be forever barred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption and claim in and to said mortgaged premises," is mere surplusage, and adds nothing to the effect of the sale.

7. The omission from the decree of the name of a defendant who has been summoned does not affect his rights.

8. A mortgagee need not, before bringing suit to foreclose the mortgage, give notice of his election to consider the whole debt due, either to the mortgagor or to persons claiming under him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action to foreclose a mortgage by Philip Sichler against P. H. Look and D. A. Arrasmith. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Arrasmith appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Hayford, I. N. Everett, and Frank C. Prescott, for appellant. I. E. Messmore, for respondent.

Harrison, J. Action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment by default was entered against all of the defendants. The defendant Arrasmith has appealed upon the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment against him, and that the judgment as entered exceeds the allegations of the complaint. The service upon the appellant was by the publication of the summons. It is recited in the judgment "that P. H. Look * * * and D. A. Arrasmith, the above-named defendants, have been duly and regularly summoned to answer unto the plaintiff's complaint herein, and that the said defendants, and each of them, have made default in that behalf," etc., and in the judgment roll is found an affidavit which was filed December 29, 1890, sufficient in form and substance, of a publication of the summons in the Santa Ana Standard, commencing September 20, 1890. The judgment roll also contains a document which was filed March 4, 1891, which purports to be a copy of an affidavit made January 5, 1891, of the deposit on the 19th of September, 1890, "pursuant to an order of the court," of a copy of the summons and complaint in the post-office, directed to the appellant at Keokuk, Iowa. A memorandum of the default of the appellant, bearing date December 29, 1890, is attached to the complaint, and the judgment was rendered January 8, 1891. There is printed in the transcript, after the judgment roll and notice of appeal, a document which purports to be an order for the service of the summons upon the appellant by publication in the Santa Ana Standard for two calendar months from the 19th day of September, 1890. This order bears the date of September 23, 1890, and was filed on that day, and is authenticated by a certificate of the county clerk that it is a "correct copy of the original on file in my office."

1. It is contended by the appellant that the constructive service shown by this record was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction over him for the reason that the deposit in the post-office and the first publication of the summons, having been made prior to the date of the order therefor, were of no effect, and that the publication after the date of the order was not for the period of time therein directed; also, that the only evidence of mailing a copy of the summons is a copy of an affidavit made after the memorandum of the default had been attached to the complaint, and not filed until after the entry of judgment. The presumption of verity which attaches to the record of a domestic judgment is the same upon a direct appeal therefrom as exists in a collateral attack; the only difference being that, upon a direct appeal, it is essential for the party seeking to sustain the judgment to show by the record itself that the court had jurisdiction of the defendant, whereas in a collateral attack the entry of the judgment is itself conclusive of such jurisdiction. Upon a direct attack, there is no presumption in favor of the existence of any fact essential to the jurisdiction of the court over the defendant, but, in all matters of which the judgment contains a record, its verity, in the absence of any contradictory evidence, will be presumed as fully as upon a collateral attack. The defendant may upon a direct appeal, by bill of exceptions, present evidence outside of the record for the purpose of showing that the court did not have jurisdiction over him, while in a collateral attack such objection is available only when it appears from the record itself. In both cases the record is conclusive as to all matters as to which it speaks, unless impeached in the foregoing manner. As was said by Mr. Justice McFarland in Lyons v. Roach, 84 Cal. 30, 23 Pac. Rep. 1026: "The main difference between collateral and direct attacks is that in the former the record alone can be inspected, and is conclusively presumed to be correct, while on direct attack the true facts may be shown, and thus the judgment itself on appeal may be reversed or modified." The recitals in a judgment are the court's record of its own acts, and although upon a direct appeal the jurisdiction of the court is not to be established by its mere assertion in the judgment that it had acquired jurisdiction, yet, if such recital finds support in other portions of the record, which under any condition of facts could exist, it will be presumed, in the absence of any contradictory showing, that such condition of facts existed.

The "record" of the judgment is the judgment roll. The documents which shall constitute this record are specified in section 670, Code Civil Proc., to be, "in case the complaint be not answered by any defendant, the summons, with the affidavit or proof of service, and the complaint, with a memorandum indorsed thereon that the default of the defendant in not answering was entered, and a copy of the judgment;" and section 415, Id., provides that "proof of service of summons and complaint must be (3) in case of publication, the affidavit of the printer or his foreman or principal clerk, showing the same, and an affidavit of a deposit of a copy of the summons in the post-office, if the same has been deposited." Under these provisions, we must hold that the record of the judgment in the present case affirmatively shows that the court had jurisdiction of the appellant. It is recited therein that he had been "duly and regularly summoned;" and there is found in the judgment roll, in support of this recital in the judgment, an affidavit of publication of the summons, and of a deposit of a copy thereof as required by the statute. The statute has provided that under certain circumstances the court may obtain jurisdiction of a defendant by a service of the summons by publication, and what shall be the proof of such service; and, in support of the judgment of the court, it will be presumed upon a direct appeal, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that this mode of service was made under a proper order of the court therefor, and that a sufficient affidavit for such order was presented to the court before making the order. The order of publication bearing date September 23, 1890, cannot be considered for the purpose of impeaching the record of the judgment, and cannot be used in contradiction of such record any more than any other order or minute of the court made in the action. Upon an appeal from a final judgment the only papers that can be considered, where there is no bill of exceptions, are the notice of appeal and judgment roll. Spinetti v. Brignardello, 53 Cal. 283. If the appellant had desired to show that no order for publication was made until September 23d, and that the publication and mailing of the summons were premature and unauthorized, he should have presented such facts in a bill of exceptions by which the proofs upon which he would rely would be properly authenticated.

Under the same rule, it must be intended that the original affidavit of mailing had been lost, and that the copy found in the judgment roll was substituted therefor by the order of the court upon a proper showing, (Code Civil Proc. § 1045;) also, that the indorsement upon the complaint of the default of the defendant prior to the date of the affidavit was made upon proper proof of such mailing, even though the same does not now appear in the record. The jurisdiction of the court did not depend upon the preservation of the proof of the service, but upon the fact that the service had been made, (Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 220, 16 Pac. Rep. 887; Mason v. Messenger, 17 Iowa, 263;) and the entry of the default was not a step in acquiring jurisdiction, but an act of the court after jurisdiction had been acquired. When jurisdiction has once been acquired, it is not lost by a failure to preserve a record of the acts by which it was acquired; and the acts of the court in exercising its inherent power to amend its record or to supply a lost record will be presumed to have been properly exercised. It appears from the record of the judgment that at the date of this memorandum of default the service upon the appellant was complete, and that the time for his appearance had expired.

2. The averment in the complaint that the appellant "has or claims to have some interest or claim upon said premises, which interest or claim is subsequent to and subject to the lien of the plaintiff's mortgage," was for the purpose of showing that the appellant is a proper party defendant, and is sufficient therefor. The character of his interest is immaterial to the plaintiff, and need not be set forth in the complaint. Poett v. Stearns, 28 Cal. 226; Anthony v. Nye, 30 Cal. 401. Such an averment is not an issuable fact. Elder v. Spinks, 53 Cal. 293. If the appellant had desired to protect such interest, he should have appeared and presented it to the court, with the grounds upon which he claimed its protection. If he has any interest in the mortgaged premises paramount to the mortgage, it will not be affected by the judgment or the sale thereunder. A sale of the mortgaged premises under the judgment entered against him by default will be limited in its effect to the rights acquired therein by him subsequent to the mortgage, irrespective of the character of the averment. McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 Pac. Rep. 347; Payn v. Grant, 23 Hun, 134; Frost v. Koon, 30 N. Y. 428; Bank v. Goldman, 75 N. Y. 127; Smith v. Roberts, 91 N. Y. 477; Jones, Mortg. § 1589.

3. The provision in the judgment foreclosing all persons claiming under the defendant Look must be construed under the foregoing rule, which limits the effect of a sale under the ordinary decree of foreclosure to a transfer of the title of the mortgagor as it existed in him at the date of the mortgage. The omission of the name of the appellant from the decree does not affect his rights; nor does the provision therein, "that the defendant Look, and all persons claiming or to claim under him, * * * be forever barred and foreclosed of and from all equity of redemption and claim in and to said mortgaged premises," add in any respect to the effect of a sale under the decree, beyond what it would have had if the provision had been omitted. This provision, although generally found in judgments of foreclosure, does not in reality, under our system of procedure, add anything to the effect of the judgment. Its insertion is due to the conservatism of the profession, which hesitates to adopt a reform in procedure, and prefers to adhere to the forms which were used under a different system. Under the old chancery system, where it was considered that a mortgage was a conveyance of the title to the land, courts of equity permitted the mortgagor to redeem his land from the mortgage notwithstanding the law-day of the mortgage had passed. In order to cut off this equity of redemption, the mortgagee presented his bill for a strict foreclosure of the mortgage, and in the decree upon that bill the court named a day prior to which the mortgagor might redeem, and that upon his failure to do so he should thereafter be forever foreclosed of his equity of redemption, and all right and title in the lands. This procedure continued to prevail in those states in which courts of equity were distinct from courts of law after it had been determined that a mortgage was only a lien, and did not convey the title. Under the system of procedure in this state, where the mortgage is held to be only a lien upon the land, to be enforced by its sale under the judgment of a court, the effect of such sale is of itself to extinguish the right and claim of all the defendants in the action acquired subsequent to the date of the mortgage, and to vest in the purchaser the title of the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage, discharged of all such right and claim. Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465; Montgomery v. Middlemis, 21 Cal. 103. There are instances in which rights of defendants acquired prior to the date of the mortgage may be adjudicated and determined by the judgment, but these are exceptional and well recognized in practice. In the ordinary action of foreclosure the judgment need only determine the amount of the debt, the defendant who is personally liable therefor, and direct a sale of the mortgaged lands, and an application of their proceeds to satisfy this amount, with such provision for the rights of the defendants between themselves may be presented in the case. Leviston v. Swan, 33 Cal. 480. For the purpose of procuring a writ of assistance without delay, in case it may be required, it is expedient to include a provision that it may issue without further notice, as this is but a part of the execution of a judgment for foreclosure. Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190; Montgomery v. Middlemis, 21 Cal. 103. Whether the interest of the defendants in the lands is set forth by them in their answer, or whether they suffer default, the effect of the sale under the judgment is in itself to foreclose and extinguish whatever rights they have acquired in the lands subsequent to the mortgage. The term "foreclosure" has itself acquired a modern significance, corresponding with the change in the procedure. Instead of being effected by the judgment itself, it is effected by the sale under the judgment; and therefore a provision in the judgment for the foreclosure becomes meaningless and redundant. Goldtree v. McAlister, 86 Cal. 105, 24 Pac. Rep. 801.

4. It was not necessary for the plaintiff, before bringing suit, to give to the mortgagor or to the appellant any notice of his election to consider the whole of the debt due. Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5, 27 Pac. Rep. 423. The judgment is affirmed.

Mortgages—Foreclosure—Litigation of Paramount Title.

Where one of the defendants in a mortgage foreclosure, other than the mortgagor, answers and sets up a title paramount to that of the mortgagor and mortgagee, such title cannot be litigated in the foreclosure suit, and the judgment will be so modified as not to prejudice the rights of the claimant of such paramount title.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mono county; O. F. Hakes, Judge.

Action by M. J. Cody against A. E. Bean and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Sturgeon appeals. Judgment modified and affirmed.

Chas. L. Hayes, Richard S. Miner, and H. M. Eddy, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

McFarland, J. The defendants Bean and Brown executed a mortgage to the assignor of plaintiff upon two adjoining mines, one of which is called the "Rattlesnake Extension Mine." Several other persons were made defendants as claiming some interest in the mortgaged premises. All the defendants made default except James H. Sturgeon, who answered, setting up, in brief, that plaintiff acquired no interest in the undivided two-thirds of said Rattlesnake Extension by said mortgage made by Bean and Brown; that the latter had no right or title to or in said two-thirds; and that at the time of the execution of said mortgage, and ever since, said Sturgeon was and has been "the sole, lawful, and exclusive owner" thereof; and the prayer of the answer is that he (Sturgeon) "be adjudged and decreed the sole exclusive owner of" said two-thirds, and that plaintiff be enjoined from asserting any interest therein. His answer contains no denial of any of the averments of the complaint which are material in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and said defendant Sturgeon appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial.

The title to a portion of the mortgaged premises thus asserted in appellant's answer was paramount and hostile to the title of the mortgagors and mortgagee; and it has been held here, uniformly and repeatedly, that such a title cannot be litigated in an action to foreclose a mortgage. Ord v. Bartlett, 83 Cal. 428, 23 Pac. Rep. 705, and cases there cited; McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 Pac. Rep. 347; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 474; Sichler v. Look, 29 Pac. Rep. 220, (No. 14,472, filed March 11, 1892,) and cases there cited. In Ord v. Bartlett, supra, it was held that a demurrer to such a complaint was properly sustained. In the case at bar, when the appellant commenced offering his evidence to show his paramount title, respondent objected to it because it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and tends to prove no issue in the case." The objection should have been sustained, but it was erroneously overruled. After that the trial proceeded upon no very well defined theory, but it is probable that the court undertook to try and determine appellant's said paramount title. If the issue as to that title had been properly before the court, we are not prepared to say that its conclusion about it was erroneous; but we shall not examine that question, for to allow such issues to be litigated in an action to foreclose a mortgage when the sale under the decree carries to the purchaser merely such title as the mortgagor had, would be to sanction a condemned practice and confuse litigation. Titles like that asserted by appellant "must be settled in a different action, giving rise, as they generally do, to questions of purely legal cognizance." San Francisco v. Lawton, supra. As to the general averment in the complaint that the defendants named "have or claim to have some interest" in the mortgaged premises which were "subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage," and when it is an issuable averment, see Sichler v. Look, supra. Whether or not a judgment rendered in a foreclosure suit which determined an issue of paramount title thus improperly presented could afterwards be collaterally attacked, is a question not arising here. We do not think that the judgment in the case at bar really affects the title which appellant sets up in his answer; but, to make that point clear, we have considered it proper to follow the precedent of Ord v. Bartlett, and modify the judgment in that respect. It is ordered that the judgment of the superior court herein be modified by adding thereto, immediately before the words "done in open court," the following: "Provided, that nothing in this judgment shall be construed or held to prejudice or affect any right or title of the defendant James H. Sturgeon to any part of the said mortgaged premises which he may have had prior to and at the time of the execution of the mortgage set forth in the complaint herein, and which he asserts adversely to the title of the mortgagors therein." And as thus modified the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed, without costs to respondent.

Dismissal of Appeal—Failure to File Bill of Exceptions.

Though rule 2 of the supreme court requires an appellant to file his bill of exceptions within 40 days after perfecting his appeal, failure to file such bill within more than a year after perfecting an appeal is no ground for dismissal, where appellant has been trying, in good faith, to secure a settlement of her bill of exceptions, and a mandate of the court has issued to compel the settlement thereof.

Appeal of Maggie Leach from an order allowing attorney's fees in the matter of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased. Motion to dismiss denied.

Per Curiam. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of San Diego county, allowing an attorney's fee to J. S. Callen, attorney for the absent heirs of said estate. Respondents move to dismiss the appeal upon the clerk's certificate that no transcript has been certified, and no bill of exceptions or statement of the case has been settled. Notice of appeal was filed and served March 2, 1891, and an undertaking on appeal in due form was also filed on said day. Under rule 2 of this court the appellant has 40 days after the appeal is perfected, and the bill of exceptions and statement (if there be any) are settled, to file the transcript. Since appellant perfected her appeal, it appears she has been endeavoring, in good faith, to secure a settlement of the bill of exceptions; and upon the 12th day of March, 1892, this court issued a writ of mandate, etc., to the judge of the superior court of San Diego county, requiring him to settle a bill of exceptions upon the appeal in this case. For these reasons the motion to dismiss will be denied. McGrath v. Hyde, 71 Cal. 454, 12 Pac. Rep. 497.

People v. Turnbull. (No. 20,838.)

Bribery—Indictment.

Under Pen. Code, § 165, inflicting a penalty for offering bribes "to any member of a common council, board of supervisors, or board of trustees of any county, city, or corporation," etc., an indictment charging defendant with having offered a bribe "to one G., a member of the board of directors of a corporation, to-wit, 'Alta Irrigation District,'" etc., and failing to allege that such corporation is a public corporation, is fatally defective, as the section applies only to public and quasi public corporations.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; William W. Cross, Judge.

Walter Turnbull was indicted for offering a bribe. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the people appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart and Maurice E. Power, Dist. Atty., for the People. Brown & Daggett and Geo. A. Knight, for respondent.

Per Curiam. This is an appeal by the people from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment. The indictment is based upon an alleged violation of section 165 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Every person who gives or offers a bribe to any member of a common council, board of supervisors, or board of trustees of any county, city, or corporation, with intent to corruptly influence such member in his action on any matter or subject pending before the body of which he is member, * * * is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison for a term not less than one year nor more than fourteen years, and is disqualified from holding any office in this state." The defendant, by the indictment, is charged with offering a bribe "to one E. E. Giddings, a member of the board of directors of a corporation, to-wit, 'Alta Irrigation District,' with intent to corruptly influence," etc. It is insisted that the words "member of a board of trustees of a corporation" are not broad enough to include a member of a board of directors of a corporation. Section 4 of the Penal Code reads: "The rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice." Section 958 of the Penal Code is as follows: "Words used in a statute to define a public offense need not be strictly pursued in the indictment or information, but other words conveying the same meaning may be used." Construed in the light of the foregoing provisions of the statute, it necessarily follows that in the use of the word "trustee" in said section the legislature intended that it should be applied in its widest and broadest sense. In Bank v. Downey, 53 Cal. 468, it was decided that the directors of a corporation were its trustees, and the decision is supported by abundant authority. It is insisted that the word "corporation," as used in the section, has no reference to private corporations, but refers solely to public and quasi public corporations. If such be the fact the indictment is fatally defective, for there is nothing alleged to indicate that the Alta irrigation district is even a quasi public corporation. An irrigation district organized under the "Wright act" is a public corporation. Crall v. Irrigation Dist., 87 Cal. 145, 26 Pac. Rep. 797. But there is nothing in this accusation to indicate that the Alta irrigation district was organized under the Wright act. While this court will take judicial notice of the Wright act, and that a corporation organized under its provisions would be a public corporation, there are no such allegations. There is nothing in the indictment to contradict the fact that the Alta irrigation district may have been a purely private corporation, created under and controlled by the general corporation laws of the state. We have nothing here but its name, and the name of a corporation is not always a true index of its objects and purposes. It follows that the indictment does not charge the Alta irrigation district to be a public corporation, and it is therefore subject to a demurrer; for it is quite clear that the section of the Penal Code defining the offense relied upon by the prosecution was not intended to include private corporations. The chapter of the Code including this section treats of "offenses against public justice," and the section itself, taken as a whole, leads to the conclusion that it is only applicable to public and quasi public corporations. Let the judgment be affirmed.

Bonds—Construction—Sales—Breach by Buyer—Liability.

1. Where a bond is conditioned to pay plaintiffs the amounts due or to become due for labels sold or to be sold to the principal under existing contracts, and the manufacture of the labels requires the making of plates, which are useful for no other purpose, the principal and sureties are liable, after the principal orders that the labels be not printed, for the expense already incurred by plaintiff in making the plates.

2. A mere offer of delivery of the labels, without actual delivery, was sufficient to satisfy the terms of the bond, and fix the liability of the principal and sureties therefor.

3. Where a person contracts to buy labels, the manufacture of which requires the making of special plates, useful for no other purpose, and subsequently notifies the seller not to print the labels, such buyer is liable for the cost already incurred of making the plates.

Action on a bond, by H. S. Crocker and another, against the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company and others. Verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Martin, R. Percy Wright, and Theo. Brodley, for appellants. John H. Dickinson and Henry E. Monroe, for respondents.

Foote, C. This action is upon a bond for $2,500, executed by the Field's Biscuit & Cracker Company as principals, and R. Percy Wright and William Collins as sureties. Judgment passed for the plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken.

The defendant corporation had contracted with the plaintiffs for the sale and delivery to it of certain show-cards, labels, and linings for boxes, and had failed to pay for them as agreed upon, and the plaintiffs had levied an attachment upon the defendant's property. In order to obtain a release of that attachment, the bond was entered into by the corporation as principal and Wright and Collins as sureties. The condition of the bond is "that if the said Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company shall pay to said H. S. Crocker & Company the amount due and to become due to them for goods sold and delivered to said Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company, or to be sold and delivered to said company, according to the terms of the contracts between said H. S. Crocker & Company and said Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company respecting the same, and shall fulfill said contract, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect." The corporation, it is alleged, failed to pay what it owed for goods sold and delivered under its contracts, and this action was then brought to recover what was claimed to be due the plaintiffs. There seems to be no question, from the defendant corporation's answer, but what at least $1,960.50 was due the plaintiffs for goods sold and delivered, so that the real matter for determination is whether the court improperly allowed evidence to go to the jury as to the cost of certain plates from which labels contracted for by the defendant corporation were to be printed, and in refusing to grant, as asked for, two instructions of the defendants. It is insisted that there was no contract to furnish plates, no claim made in the complaint for their value, and no responsibility on the bond as to them. The contract, with reference to which the bond was made, was for the sale and delivery of certain labels, among other things, and it appears that, as a necessity for the printing of these labels, and their delivery to the defendant corporation under the contracts, the plates had to be made at a certain expense to the plaintiffs, and that, after they were thus made, and the expense incurred, by the plaintiffs, one of the defendants, R. Percy Wright, the agent and attorney for the other parties, ordered that the labels contracted for should not be printed and should not be delivered. To deliver the labels under the contract it was as much a necessity to have the plates as the paper on which to print them, and Wright knew that the plates were to be charged for before the bond was executed if the goods ordered were not taken, as agreed. Therefore we do not see how the defendants can successfully contend that, as a part of their contract, they are not responsible for the expense of making the plates, now useless to the plaintiffs. Defendants refused to let the contract be carried out. They caused the expense which was essential to enable the delivery of the labels contracted for, and that expense was necessarily intended, under the contract which the bond referred to; and, besides that, it was claimed by plaintiffs to be due under the contract, which fact Wright knew when he signed the bond.

The instructions to be considered, asked by defendants, were these: (1) "The jury must leave out of consideration all evidence respecting goods sold by plaintiffs to the defendant Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company, which are not shown to have been actually delivered." (2) "The jury must leave out of consideration all evidence respecting goods sold or delivered by plaintiffs to the defendant Field's Biscuit and Cracker Company, except show-cards, labels, and manilla linings for boxes." The court qualified the first instruction by reading to the jury section 1141 of the Civil Code, which is as follows: "Title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale or exchange of personal property only when the buyer has accepted the thing, or when the seller has completed it, prepared it for delivery, and offered it to the buyer, with intent to transfer the title thereto, in the manner prescribed by the chapter upon 'Offer of Performance.'" The court then said: "Now, of course, if in this case the plaintiffs prepared these labels on the order of defendant, and it was defendant's place, as part of its contract, to call for them, and did not do it, then the fact that they were not actually delivered is of no consequence." The defendants contended that nothing but manual delivery will satisfy the terms of the bond. The record shows that certain labels contracted for were prepared and offered for delivery to the defendant corporation, which it did not take, but left them in the hands of plaintiffs. The corporation was responsible for the payment of the contract price for them, and the court committed no error in the course pursued. The second instruction, not given as asked, was not proper under the facts of the case. The price of the plates was as much included in the contract, if the defendant refused, after the expense was incurred at its request, to allow the labels to be printed and delivered, as if the labels had been printed and refused by the defendant when offered for delivery. The plates were a necessary ingredient in printing and delivering the labels, and the fault of having them made and left as useless in the hands of plaintiffs was that of the defendant corporation. The instruction excluded all compensation on this head to be taken into consideration by the jury. The contract and bond were both made with reference to the law governing such sales of goods, and we see nothing in the admission of evidence or the action of the court as to instructions in the least degree prejudicial to the defendants. Upstone v. Weir, 54 Cal. 126. The appeal has no merit, as we think, and the judgment and order should be affirmed.

WILCOX et al. v. LATTIN. (No. 14,528.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—WAIVER OF RIGHT.

1. Defendant agreed to convey to plaintiff a tract of land for a fixed sum, secured by plaintiff's notes. The contract provided that plaintiff should plat and sell the land in small tracts, defendant agreeing to make conveyances to the purchasers as requested by the plaintiff, as fast as sales were made, and credit the moneys arising therefrom on plaintiff's notes. Plaintiff, relying on defendant's express representations that his title was perfect, did not cause it to be examined before purchasing. After the sale of a number of lots, an adverse claim was asserted to an undivided half of the land, and adjudged to be good, by reason of which plaintiff was precluded from making any further sales. Held, that the inability of defendant to make conveyances was such a failure of consideration as to entitle plaintiff to rescind the contract, under Civil Code, § 1689, subd. 4, providing that a party to a contract may rescind the same if the consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in a material respect from any cause.

2. Such right of rescission was not waived by plaintiff's delay in asserting it until the court determined the adverse claim good, he having a right to assume that the title was as represented by defendant until such final adjudication to the contrary.

3. The tender of a deed by defendant subsequent to the rescission by plaintiff, even if such deed had been sufficient to transfer title, did not revive the contract, it having been extinguished by its rescission, under Civil Code, § 1688.

4. In an action to enforce the rescission of the contract, a judgment that plaintiff was entitled to exercise his right of rescission confirms the extinguishment of the contract as of the date when the rescission was made.

HARRISON, J. Action for the rescission of an agreement for the purchase of certain real estate. The plaintiffs and the defendant made an agreement August 29, 1887, by which the defendant agreed to convey to the plaintiffs a tract of 100 acres of land in the county of Los Angeles for the sum of $80,000, of which the plaintiffs were to pay $20,000 on or before the expiration of six months, $20,000 on or before the expiration of one year, and $40,000 on or before the expiration of eighteen months from the date of the said agreement; and the plaintiffs executed to the defendants their several promissory notes for these amounts. The agreement also contained the following clause: "This contract is subject to an understanding and agreement between all the parties that the parties of the second part are to plat, subdivide, and place all the said land in the market within thirty days from and after the execution of these presents;" and it was also provided therein "that, as fast as any of said land is sold by the said second parties, said B. C. Lattin shall convey the land so sold to the purchasers, and all the moneys arising from such sales, or any sale, shall be paid to said Lattin, and applied by him on the aforesaid notes of said Wilcox and said Shaw in their orders of payment." Under this agreement the plaintiffs, within the 30 days therein specified, caused the land to be platted and subdivided in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and placed the land in the market, and made sales of portions thereof, amounting in value to about $25,000, for which the defendant executed deeds and contracts to the respective purchasers, and received the amounts for which the lands were sold, applying them upon the notes of the plaintiffs. In January, 1888, an adverse claim was made by certain parties to an undivided half of the entire tract, and an action was commenced by them in the superior court for the county of Los Angeles against the defendant and the plaintiffs for the purpose of establishing their claim; and on the 7th of June, 1888, judgment was rendered in said action, by which it was adjudged that they were the owners in fee-simple of an undivided half of said land. It is alleged in the complaint, and also found by the court, that "by reason of said defect in the title of the defendant, and the said adverse claim, the plaintiffs were absolutely prevented from making any further sales of the said lands." Upon the institution of that suit the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that there was nothing in the claim, and that he would establish his title in the suit; and, after the judgment had been rendered, he represented to them that he would appeal therefrom, and thus settle and establish his title. On the 12th of September, 1888, the plaintiffs notified the defendant that on account of the failure of title they rescinded the contract, and at the same time tendered him a deed of conveyance, conveying him all right, title, and interest in and to the said lands, and in and to all moneys and contracts of every character arising from sales made by them under said contract, and demanded a surrender to them of their notes. The defendant refused to accept the deed, or to consent to the rescission, or to surrender the notes. Thereupon the plaintiffs brought this action for the purpose of enforcing a rescission of the contract, and for a surrender of the notes. Judgment was rendered in their favor, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant has appealed.

The agreement between the parties is not merely an executory agreement for the sale of land which is to be conveyed at a future day, designated in the agreement, in which the vendor would satisfy his obligation by being able to make the conveyance at the date fixed in the agreement. It is very evident from the terms of this contract that it was not contemplated by the parties that the vendor should be allowed until the expiration of 18 months from its date within which he might execute the conveyance. The provision therein that the plaintiffs should, within 30 days from its date, place the land on the market, and that, as fast as they should sell it, the defendant should convey the parcels so sold to the respective purchasers, and that he should receive the proceeds of such sales in part payment of the notes of the plaintiffs, clearly indicates an agreement on his part that he would make such conveyance upon the demand of the plaintiffs, and by necessary implication that such conveyance should transfer title to the land to be conveyed. The vendor in any executory agreement for the sale of land impliedly represents that he has a good title thereto as one of the considerations for inducing the vendee to enter into the contract, and that the conveyance therein agreed to be made by him will transfer such title. In the present case the court finds that the defendant made express representations to the plaintiffs that his title to the land was perfect, and that the plaintiffs, relying upon such representations, did not cause the title to be examined by any attorney. When the adverse claim to one-half of the land was made, it naturally had the effect to impair the ability of the plaintiffs to make immediate sales thereof, as was the purpose for which they had entered into the agreement; and the subsequent judgment, affirming the validity of such adverse claim, established the inability of the defendant to convey the title of any parcel they might sell; and the court finds that "by reason of said defect in the title of the defendant and the said adverse claim the plaintiffs were absolutely prevented from making any further sales of the said lands." The court also found that the plaintiffs entered into the contract for the sole purpose of immediately putting the land upon the market, and selling the same in small tracts, and that that purpose was well known to the defendant. In consideration of these facts it is manifest that the provision in the agreement that the defendant would make conveyance of the land as he should be requested by the plaintiffs was an essential part of the consideration upon which the plaintiffs entered into the agreement, and that the refusal or inability on the part of the defendant to make such conveyance was such a failure of consideration as to entitle the plaintiffs to a rescission of their agreement. Civil Code, § 1689, subd. 4.[1] The objection that this right of rescission was waived by the plaintiffs by their delay in asserting it cannot be maintained. They were at liberty to consider that the title of the defendant was as he had represented it until it was determined otherwise by the court. The mere assertion of an adverse claim by a stranger would not justify them in pronouncing the title bad, and thereupon rescinding their agreement. Even after the action had been brought upon the adverse claim, the defendant assured them that there was nothing in the claim, and that it would be soon disposed of by the judgment, and requested them not to make any further sales until he could ascertain what could be done; and after the judgment he made the same representations, and gave them to understand that he would appeal therefrom, and upon such appeal establish his title. The judgment was entered on the 7th of June, 1888, and on the 12th of September thereafter they gave the notice of rescission. We think that, under the circumstances shown, they used reasonable diligence in exercising their right of rescission. The objection that the plaintiffs did not, at the time of their rescission, offer to restore to the defendant everything of value which they had received from him, is not sustained by the facts of the case. The specific objection is that the conveyance which they tendered to the defendant did not include all of the land embraced in the agreement. But the defendant, in pursuance of the terms of the agreement, had himself executed the deeds by which portions of the land had been conveyed, and had himself received all of the consideration for which the conveyances had been made; so that there was nothing which the plaintiffs had received out of the agreement which they could restore to him. The tender of a deed by the defendant to the plaintiffs subsequent to the commencement of the action, even if such deed had been sufficient to transfer the title, did not revive the contract. By their rescission the contract had been "extinguished," (Civil Code, § 1688;[2]) and the judgment that the plaintiffs were entitled to exercise their right of rescission confirmed the extinguishment of the contract as of the date when the rescission was made. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Lattin and others against Wilcox and another for specific performance. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dooner & Burdette and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellants. A. M. Stephens, Smith, Howard & Smith, T. L. Winder, and Hutton & Swanwick, for respondents.

Per Curiam. This action arises out of the same facts as are presented in the action of Wilcox v. Lattin, 29 Pac. Rep. 226, (No. 14,528,) and is an action to enforce a specific performance by the defendants of the contract of sale therein presented. The two actions were tried by the court below at the same time, and upon the same evidence, and the appeals therein have been presented together in this court. The judgment of the court below that the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce their rescission of the contract was necessarily followed by a judgment in this action denying the right of a specific performance of the contract; and the judgment of this court, affirming the judgment in Wilcox v. Lattin, requires us to affirm the judgment and order in the present case. This makes it unnecessary to pass upon the motion to dismiss the appeal. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Criminal Law—Instructions—Credibility of Witness.

1. On a trial for murder it is proper to exclude testimony as to the reputation for "truth, honesty, and integrity" of defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf, where those traits of character were not questioned by the prosecution.

2. Where special requests to charge are fully covered by the general instructions given, there is no error in refusing them.

3. On a trial for murder defendant testified in his own behalf, and then requested the court to charge that "defendant is a competent witness in this case, and it is the duty of the jury to weigh, examine, and take into consideration the testimony of defendant, and give it due consideration; the same as it does the testimony of all the other witnesses in the case. If consistent and convincing, act upon it. If it raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, he is entitled to the benefit of the doubt." The court gave the charge, after striking out the words, "the same as it does the testimony of all the other witnesses in the case." Held, that there was no error in thus modifying the charge.

4. In such case, an instruction that, "unless you disbelieve the testimony of defendant, the weight of the testimony tends to prove that the act of defendant was not criminal," was properly refused, as an instruction on the weight of evidence.

5. In such case, a request to charge stated that "the testimony shows that defendant and deceased were old and particular friends for many years," and then directed what weight this friendship should have with the jury. Held, that the request was properly refused, as the court had already charged the jury that, "if the evidence shows that defendant and deceased were warm, personal friends, this fact may be considered by you in connection with the other evidence in the case."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. PREWITT, Judge.

Elisha Cowgill was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Jo. Hamilton and G. W. Hamilton, for appellant. A. K. Robinson and L. L. Chamberlain, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. One of the points made for reversal relates to a ruling made by the trial court with respect to the admissibility of certain evidence, and the others relate to instructions given and refused.

1. It appears from the statement that at a certain stage in the trial the appellant, "in the absence of the jury," offered to introduce before the jury, "upon their return into court," certain named witnesses, and "to prove by each of said witnesses that he is well acquainted with defendant, and has known him intimately for many years; that each of them is well acquainted with his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity, and that it is good; that they would give him full faith and credit upon his oath in any case." The court, upon objection, "excluded said testimony, and refused to permit the jury to hear the same," and appellant excepted. Assuming that there was anything before the court to rule on, the ruling was clearly right. Appellant did not offer to prove good reputation for the traits of character involved in the crime charged. It is true that appellant was a witness in his own behalf; but evidence is not admissible to prove that the character of a witness for truthfulness is good, unless the opposite party has tried to impeach him by showing that his general reputation is bad.

2. The points made with respect to instructions to the jury all relate to instructions asked by defendant and refused or modified by the court. The instructions so asked, and numbered 2, 3, 4, and 16, deal with the subject of "reasonable doubt," and were refused because "given elsewhere;" and, upon turning to the general charge of the court to the jury, we find that it sufficiently covers that vexed subject, and contains all that is correct in the said instructions asked by appellant. It seems that the court, for some reason, struck out of said second instruction the word "entirely" before refusing it; but, as it was properly refused with that word either in or out, striking it out was of no consequence. The ninth instruction asked by appellant was as follows: "The defendant has offered himself in his own behalf. The court charges you that the defendant is a competent witness in this case, and it is the duty of the jury to weigh, examine, and take into consideration the testimony of the defendant, and give it due consideration; the same as it does the testimony of all the other witnesses in the case. If consistent and convincing, act upon it. If it raises in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, he is entitled to the benefit of the reasonable doubt." The court struck out the words, "the same as it does the testimony of all the other witnesses in the case," and then gave the instruction as thus modified. We see no error in this for which the judgment should be reversed. The instruction as given is as favorable to appellant as he was entitled to have it. It has been held here frequently (and it is too late now to reopen the question) that it is not improper for the court to call the attention of the jury, as was done in this case, to the circumstances under which a defendant in a criminal case testifies,—the inducements, temptations, etc., which surround him; but nothing of that kind is suggested in the said instruction asked by appellant, and the words stricken out were inconsistent with the general charge on the subject, and would probably have tended towards leading the jury to believe that they were not to consider his surroundings, but were to receive his testimony as if he occupied exactly "the same" position as that of disinterested witnesses. The eleventh instruction asked was properly refused. It contains this clause: "The court instructs you that, unless you disbelieve the testimony of the defendant, the weight of the testimony tends to prove that the act of the defendant was not criminal;" and such an instruction would have been erroneous, for, under our system, it is not the province of the court to instruct about the weight of evidence. The thirteenth instruction asked was also properly refused. It contains a conclusion of the court that "the testimony in the case does show that the defendant and deceased were old and particular friends of many years;" and is thus objectionable as stating a result of evidence which it was the duty of the jury, and not of the court, to arrive at. It then directs the jury as to what "bearing on the case" this friendship should have,—that is, in effect, what weight it should have with the jury. Now, if this was a legitimate subject for instruction at all, the court, in its general charge, had already said all that was proper to be said on the subject in this language: "If the evidence shows that the defendant and the deceased were warm personal friends, this fact may be considered by you, in connection with the other evidence in the case, in deliberating on your verdict." But courts are to instruct only as to matters of law; and it is difficult to see how the questions whether a man is less likely to murder his friend than his enemy, or whether, on the other hand, it is more reprehensible to murder a friend than an enemy, etc., are questions of law.

The foregoing are all the points argued by appellant. We have examined the evidence, and find that it justified the verdict; and there are no reasons for disturbing the judgment. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

KELLOGG et al. v. HOWES et al. (No. 14,543.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—BOND—ATTORNEY'S FEES COSTS—COLLECTION.

1. The supersedeas bond, on the removal by writ of error of a cause from the state supreme court to the United States supreme court, conditioned that appellant "shall prosecute his writ to effect, and answer all costs and damages if he shall fail to make good his plea," does not require the payment of appellee's attorney fee, where the writ was dismissed by the federal court for want of jurisdiction.

2. An action for the collection of costs will not lie before they have been taxed as such.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action on a bond by Levi M. Kellogg and others against F. C. Howes and others. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Johnston & Borden, for appellants. Thomas Mitchell and M. T. Allen, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The judgment in the case of Kellogg v. Howes, (No. 13,324,) was affirmed here in November, 1889. 81 Cal. 170, 22 Pac. Rep. 509. Howes, the appellant therein, procured a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States, and gave a supersedeas bond in the sum of $8,000, with respondents Bonebrake and Bryson as sureties. The condition of the bond is that "if the above-named F. C. Howes shall prosecute his said writ of error with effect, and answer all costs and damages if he shall fail to make good his plea, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise," etc. A citation was issued requiring the defendants in error to show cause before the supreme court at Washington, on the second Monday in October, 1890, why the judgment should not be corrected. On May 22, 1890, said court, upon motion of defendants in error, dismissed the writ on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the action. The clerk of the supreme court of the United States attached to the mandate dismissing the writ a memorandum of costs, including the cost of printing the transcript, amounting to $160.50; and, as soon as the mandate was filed here, Howes paid the amount of the judgment, with interest thereon, and also paid the bill of costs attached to the mandate, but refused to pay other items of costs and damages claimed by plaintiff. Thereupon, and after demand was made upon the sureties, this action was commenced to recover the sum of $700.30, being the sum of the following items claimed by plaintiff as costs and damages: Certificate of clerk of the supreme court to transcript, $33; transmitting papers to Washington, $4.90; telegram giving notice of appearance, $3.40; printing briefs on motion to dismiss, $59; counsel fees in United States supreme court, $600. The court below gave judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs have appealed.

The condition of the bond quoted above is prescribed by rule 29 of the supreme court of the United States, and rules 23 and 24 of the court prescribe what damages and costs may be allowed. Curtis' Fed. St. Ann. 163. It is conceded that, if the bond had been given on appeal from a judgment of the circuit court of the United States, plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover attorney's fees. Supervisors v. Kennicott, 103 U. S. 554. We think the condition named in the bond should be given the same construction by this court that is placed upon it by the supreme court of the United States,—the court that framed it. The parties who executed the bond presumably entered into the undertaking with a knowledge of the construction which had been placed upon it by the national courts, and in the belief that their obligation would be measured by such construction. The fact that the supreme court held no federal question was involved cannot change the obligation of the sureties. A writ of error had been allowed by the chief justice of this court, a supersedeas bond was required, and the liability of the sureties depended upon the question whether Howes would be able to prosecute his writ "with effect" and "make good his plea;" it did not depend upon the reasons which might be given for holding the writ to be without effect. If the court had held that a federal question was involved, and had affirmed the judgment, the damages claimed could not have been recovered. The dismissal of the writ had the same effect as to costs and damages. By the dismissal the plaintiff in error simply failed to "prosecute his said writ of error with effect," or "to make good his plea." The cost of the clerk's certificate, printing briefs, sending transcript to Washington, and telegraphing the appearance of attorneys, if proper items of cost to be allowed at all, should have been taxed up as such. The term "costs" has a well-known meaning, and whatever costs are claimed and recovered must be taxed in the action in which they are allowed. Until taxed they cannot be recovered as damages in an independent action on the undertaking on appeal. Judgment affirmed.

HENRY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF NEVADA COUNTY. (No. 14,769.)

PROBATE PROCEEDINGS—COSTS.

1. An order allowing costs to counsel in a probate proceeding is void. Sharon v. Sharon, 16 Pac. Rep. 345, 75 Cal. 1, followed.

2. The superior court cannot empower a special administrator to defray the expenses of a probate proceeding unless expressly authorized to do so by statute.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1720, providing that in probate proceedings the superior court may, in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceeding, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require," the court has no power to appropriate the funds of the estate to aid either party until the will has been admitted to, or denied, probate.

In bank.

Certiorari to superior court, Nevada county, JOHN CALDWELL, Judge, to review an order to pay counsel fees to the attorneys of S. M. McKay, executor, under the will of Elle Ellen, deceased. Order annulled.

Thomas S. Ford, for petitioner. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

Paterson, J. On May 1, 1891, Elle Ellen died, leaving a will in which W. H. Kruger and S. M. McKay were named as executors. On May 9, 1891, P. Henry, petitioner herein, was appointed special administrator, and on the same day the persons named as executors filed a petition asking that the will be admitted to probate. The hearing of the petition was fixed for the 8th day of June, 1891, and due notice thereof was given. Before the day set for hearing, James Ellen Henry and Joseph Henry Saunders, grandsons of the decedent, filed an opposition, alleging that the will was executed under undue influence, and while the testator was wanting in capacity. Thereafter Kruger died, and on September 12, 1891, the court, on application of McKay, supported by affidavit, made an order that the special administrator pay to the attorneys of McKay, out of the funds of the estate in his hands, the sum of $600 for counsel fees, witness fees, and other expenses to be incurred in the trial of the issues pending. Thereupon the special administrator applied to the court for an order revoking the order referred to, on the grounds that it was made without notice, and that the court had no jurisdiction to appropriate the funds of the estate to such a purpose. The motion was denied, and the administrator has sued out this writ of review to annul the order.

1. In Re Aaron, 5 Dem. Sur. 362, the court held that costs in a probate proceeding could not be allowed to counsel; if allowed at all, they must be awarded directly to the parties themselves. And in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. Rep. 345, we held that "suit money" must be paid to the party for whose benefit it is awarded, and that an order directing payment to counsel who are not parties to the action is void.

2. Section 2557 of the New York Code of Civil Procedure provides that costs in probate proceedings "may be made payable by the party personally, or out of the estate or fund, as justice requires." The powers conferred upon special administrators in that state by the provisions of the Code are identical with those conferred upon special administrators in this state. In Re Aaron, supra, it was held that it was the duty of a special administrator simply to collect and preserve the estate; that he had no authority to pay debts; and that the court could not empower him to defray the expenses of a controversy over probate, unless expressly authorized to do so by the statute. In Re Parish, 29 Barb. 627, the court held that contestants, either for or against a will, have no claim for costs or expenses which can be paid out of the estate by the special administrator until after a decision has been made in the contest.

3. There are additional reasons, however, for declaring the order void; and we prefer to rest our decision upon other and broader grounds than those stated. The superior court, acting in probate proceedings, obtains its authority to award costs from the statute, and not by virtue of its general probate jurisdiction, as claimed by respondent. In re Parish, supra. Section 1720, Code Civil Proc., provides that the superior court "may, in its discretion, order costs to be paid by any party to the proceeding, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require. Execution for the costs may issue out of the superior court." If there is any authority upon which the order in question can be supported, it must be found in this section of the Code. The general rule is stated in section 1021, which provides that the compensation of attorneys is left to the agreement of the parties, but that parties to actions or proceedings are entitled to costs and disbursements, as provided in other sections of the Code. Even if it be conceded that counsel fees for services rendered the executor in probating the will may be regarded as "costs," within the meaning of section 1720, we do not think that they can be allowed, except as incident to some judgment or order of the court. The probate judge is clothed with discretion to order costs to be paid "by any party to the proceedings, or out of the assets of the estate, as justice may require." This discretion cannot be exercised until there is something upon which it may be based. In construing a similar provision conferring discretionary power upon the surrogate's court to award costs, the New York court of appeals said: "It means the party whose behavior in the circumstances provoking the litigation, whose situation in relation to the estate, or the particular subject in controversy is such as that it is equitable and just that he be remunerated for his expenses in the litigation. The surrogate may also charge the costs of one party upon another, or upon the estate." Noyes v. Aid Society, 70 N. Y. 484. It is impossible for the court to say from the mere allegations of a party, and before any evidence taken, whether he is acting in good faith or not, and whether it is just and equitable that he should be aided in prosecuting or defending his suit. All the provisions of the Code bearing upon the subject of probate contests indicate that good faith and reasonable cause are the things to be inquired into by the court in the exercise of its discretion. Hicox v. Graham, 6 Cal. 169; sections 1031, 1332, and 1509, Code Civil Proc. Until the court has heard the evidence of the parties, it is impossible for it to determine whether they or any of them have claims which are made in good faith, and which are based upon reasonable grounds. If the court has power, upon the initiation of contests, to make arbitrary allowances out of the estate to proponents and contestants, then disappointed next of kin and claimants without the shadow of a just cause may deprive the beneficiaries under the will, by prolonged and expensive litigation, of the property given to them by the testator. Unless the language of the statute imperatively demands such construction, it should not be placed upon it. Some wholesome remarks as to the object and benefit of the statute, and the cases in which it should be applied by the court, will be found in Re Whelan, 2 N. Y. Supp. 635. It is no argument to say that because the constitution clothes the superior court with "original jurisdiction over matters at probate," and provides that "a judge of the superior court may at any time make and issue all necessary orders and writs, enforce the production of wills and the attendance of witnesses," the court of its own motion is bound to see that all necessary proceedings are taken, and witnesses called to probate every document filed and which is claimed to be a will. It is safe to assume that parties interested as devisees and legatees will always take the necessary steps, and provide necessary funds, to procure the attendance of witnesses to establish the validity of the will, if it is worthy of probate. Our conclusion is that until the will has been admitted to probate, or probate had been denied, the court has no power to appropriate the funds of the estate to aid either proponent or contestant. This view, we think, is supported by the principles laid down in Estate of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. Rep. 896; Estate of Parsons, 65 Cal. 240, 3 Pac. Rep. 817; and Estate of Jessup, 80 Cal. 625, 22 Pac. Rep. 260. The order of the court below is annulled.

Limitation of Actions—Relief against Fraud.

1. A complaint alleged that defendant, by fraudulent representations as to her ownership of certain land, induced plaintiff to loan her $4,000 on her note, secured by a mortgage on such land, and that plaintiff did not discover the fraud until within three years before suit; that defendant was executrix of an estate, and used the money to pay a claim against the estate. The complaint asked judgment against defendant for $4,000, with interest, and to be subrogated to the claim so paid. The action was commenced more than four years after the maturity of such note and mortgage. Held, that it came within Code Civil Proc. § 337, which provides that an action founded on a written instrument is barred, unless commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues.

2. The action was not one for relief on the ground of fraud, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 338, which allows an action to be commenced within three years from the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Clausen against Fredericka Meister and others to recover on a note and mortgage. Judgment for defendant on demurrer to the complaint. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Morgenthal and George Lamont, for appellant. J. L. Rogers, for respondents.

De Haven, J. The court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint in this action, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appeals, and the question for decision is whether the ruling of the court upon the demurrer was correct. The material facts shown by the complaint are: On March 1, 1882, plaintiff was induced by representations of the defendant Fredericka Meister, to the effect that she was the owner of a certain unincumbered piece of land in Solano county, to loan her $4,000 upon her note, secured by a mortgage upon said land, which note and mortgage are fully set out. It is further alleged that these representations were false, and made in the presence and with the approval of the other defendants; that the land was at that time, and still is, part of the estate of one Millard Meister, deceased, and was not only subject to a prior mortgage of $4,500, but also to the payment of the debts of said estate, and expenses of administration; and the said defendant Fredericka Meister was and is entitled, upon the settlement and distribution of said estate, to only one-fourth thereof, and the other defendants to the remaining three-fourths. At the date of the execution of plaintiff's note and mortgage, the defendant Fredericka Meister was the executrix of said estate, and there had been presented and approved as a claim against said estate, a certain note, held by one Margaret Bolle, for the sum of $4,000, and interest, and the said defendant Fredericka Meister, as executrix of said estate, paid that claim with the money loaned to her by plaintiff. It is further alleged that the plaintiff did not discover the fraud practiced upon him, in inducing him to make said loan upon the security of the note and mortgage of the defendant Fredericka Meister, until within three years before the commencement of this action. The plaintiff further alleged that, upon discovery of the falsity of the representations by which he was induced to loan his money, he informed the defendants of the fact, "and offered said note and mortgage given him by Fredericka Meister, herein set forth, for cancellation, and requested them to subrogate him in place of Margaret Bolle, whose claim against the estate of said Millard Meister" had been paid with plaintiff's money, "or to give plaintiff a new note secured by their interest as heirs to the estate of Millard Meister; yet they refused, and still refuse to do so." The complaint also states "that said note and mortgage herein set forth are worthless, and plaintiff hereby offers the same to this court for cancellation."

The action was commenced more than four years after the maturity of plaintiff's note and mortgage, and the relief demanded in the complaint is "for judgment against the defendant for the sum of four thousand dollars, with legal interest thereon from the first day of September, 1885, and that said judgment be declared a valid claim against the estate of Millard Meister, deceased, and the plaintiff's claim be subrogated in place and stead of said claim of Margaret Bolle, * * * and that the note and mortgage herein set forth be canceled," and for general relief.

1. The defendants demurred to this complaint upon the ground, among others, that the action is barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action upon a contract founded on a written instrument is barred unless commenced within four years after the cause of action accrues. The demurrer was properly sustained. Plaintiff's right to recover upon the note and mortgage executed to him by the defendant Fredericka Meister was barred by this section of the Code at the date of the commencement of this action, and whatever equitable right he might otherwise have had to be subrogated to the position of Margaret Bolle, as a creditor of the estate of Millard Meister, and thus to enforce the payment of such note and mortgage, was lost to him when the bar of the statute attached to said note and mortgage.

This is not an action for relief upon the ground of fraud, within the meaning of subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which gives to a party aggrieved three years after the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud within which to bring an action to obtain relief therefrom, but it is substantially one to compel the payment of the indebtedness which is evidenced by the note and mortgage executed by the defendant Fredericka Meister to the plaintiff; and the character of the action is not changed by the fact that the plaintiff asks the court, on account of the other matters stated in the complaint, to apply the equitable principle of subrogation, and, by this means, cause the defendants to satisfy, out of their property, the indebtedness, to secure which said note and mortgage was given to him. The real cause of action is for the recovery of the money loaned by plaintiff, and the other relief demanded is but incidental to this, and the time allowed by the statute within which to commence an action for the recovery of this money cannot be extended by alleging the discovery, within three years, of facts which in equity would have entitled him to look for its repayment to other security than the mortgage which accompanied the note received by him at the time of the loan.

Fresno Nat. Bank v. Hawkins. (No. 14,442.)

Fraud of Agent—Liability of Principal—Forged School Warrants.

In an action to recover the amount of certain orders forged by defendant's deputy and sold to plaintiff, the complaint alleged that defendant was the "county superintendent of schools," and that one B. was his deputy; that plaintiff purchased, at the instance and request of defendant, by B., his deputy, certain school warrants; that said warrants were purchased solely on the faith and credit of the indorsements thereon by defendant; that the warrants, except the indorsements of filing, were forged by said B., and were void. The "warrants" were orders on defendant, as county superintendent of schools, by the trustees of the various school-districts for requisitions to the county auditor; and the indorsements, alleged to have been genuine, and on the faith of which plaintiff purchased them, were the memoranda of the date of filing in defendant's office, as required by law. Held, that the only alleged act of B., in the line of his official duty, was the filing, and the filing of such orders is not a guaranty that the orders are genuine, or that they will be paid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by the Fresno National Bank against B. A. Hawkins to recover the amount of certain orders forged and sold to plaintiff by defendant's deputy. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Church & Cory, for appellant. W. D. Tupper, H. H. Welsh, and Webb & Strother, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This appeal is before us upon the judgment roll, and involves the sufficiency of the complaint. The complaint alleges that respondent was at all the times mentioned the county superintendent of schools of Fresno county, and that W. R. Bibby was the regularly appointed deputy of such superintendent; that appellant, as was its custom, purchased at the instance and request of respondent, by his deputy, certain school warrants; that said warrants were purchased solely on the faith and credit of the indorsements thereon by the respondent; that said warrants, except the indorsement of filing, were forged by the said Bibby, deputy, and were void and of no effect; and appellant claims to be damaged to the extent of the money paid out for such forged warrants. As appears by the exhibits attached to the complaint, these forged warrants were orders on the county superintendent, by the trustees of the various school-districts, for requisitions to the county auditor; and the word "warrants," as used in the complaint, is somewhat of a misnomer. The indorsement made upon these orders, which appellant alleges to be genuine, and upon the sole faith of which it expended its money, was the memorandum of the date of filing in the county superintendent's office. Neither the forgery of the orders by Bibby, nor his presentation and sale of them to the bank, created any liability against respondent; for in those matters he was not acting in the line of his official duty, and by virtue of his appointment as deputy was not clothed with any such power. Respondent could only clothe his deputy with such power as the statute conferred upon himself, and those powers were not conferred. The bank knew the measure of respondent's power, and the limitation of his official duties. If not, it should have known them, for all persons are held to know the law. It follows that the only act done by the deputy, in the line of his official duty, towards consummating the fraud alleged, was the indorsement of the date of filing upon the orders. The law requires these orders to be filed in the order in which they are presented, so that the requisitions upon the auditor will follow in the same order of time. The filing of the order in the office of the county superintendent is not a guaranty by such officer that such order is genuine and will be paid in due course of time. The filing marks do not warrant that it is not forged, but simply indicate to the world that such a paper was filed in the office at a time named. Manifestly, such fact can create no personal liability against respondent in favor of a purchaser of such orders. Appellant alleges that he purchased the orders on the sole faith and credit of the genuine indorsement thereon; but, as we have already seen, such indorsement neither gave them negotiability, validity, nor additional value, aside from fixing the date of their filing in the superintendent's office. Let the judgment be affirmed.

Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co. (No. 14,373.)

Torts of Servant—Liability of Master.

In a suit for damages against defendant railroad, the court instructed the jury that if defendant's engineer, for the purpose of frightening the passengers in a street-car that was crossing defendant's track, unnecessarily and wantonly started his locomotive towards such street-car, thereby frightening the occupants, among which was plaintiff, who believed and had reason to believe that a collision was imminent, and, to save herself, jumped out and was injured, defendant was liable. Held, that the instruction was error, the alleged injury having resulted from an act of the engineer which was not within the scope of his employment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Stephenson against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

John D. Bicknell, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

De Haven, J. The action is to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff, through the negligence of defendant. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was a passenger upon a street-car, in the city of Los Angeles, the track of which crosses that of defendant at or near its depot, and that, upon the occasion of the injury, the street-car approached the crossing, and stopped long enough to ascertain that a locomotive engine on the track of defendant, and within about 25 feet of the crossing, was not in motion, and then proceeded to cross the track; that when the street-car was about to cross the track of defendant, the engineer in charge of defendant's engine negligently and carelessly gave his engine steam, and commenced to back the said locomotive upon the track towards and upon the street-car in which plaintiff was riding, and that plaintiff, being in imminent danger of injury from the anticipated collision, jumped from the street-car, as did other passengers, and was injured. The answer contained a sufficient denial of any negligence upon the part of defendant and of its employes, and also charged that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The trial was by jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiff for $5,000. The defendant appeals.

The evidence tended to show that the street-car was stopped before attempting to cross the track of defendant, as alleged in the complaint; that the locomotive was not then in motion, but proceeded to back down towards the crossing as the street-car was crossing the track, but did not, in fact, come in collision with the street-car. The locomotive engine was upon the depot grounds, for the purpose of being used in switching cars. The court, at the request of plaintiff, gave to the jury the following, among other, instructions: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that the defendant's engineer, with intent to frighten and scare the passengers riding upon said street-car upon which plaintiff was a passenger, while the said horse-car was in close proximity on the track of said defendant, unnecessarily and wantonly let the engine take steam, and started said locomotive to move towards and upon said street-car, with the intention thereby to frighten the said passengers, of which plaintiff was one, and did thereby frighten said passengers and plaintiff, so that she, seeing said engine, and believing and having reasonable cause to believe that the same was about to collide with said street-car, in order to save herself from accident, jumped off of said car, and thereby the plaintiff was injured, then the defendant is guilty of negligence, and the jury should find for the plaintiff." In giving this instruction the court committed an error. The rule is, of course, well settled that the master is civilly liable for the wrongful or negligent act of the servant, committed while in his service, and within the scope of his employment,—that is, in the transaction of the master's business; and the converse of the rule is equally well settled, that when a servant acts without any reference to the service for which he is employed, and not for the purpose of performing the work of his employer, but to effect some independent purpose of his own, the master is not responsible in that case for either the act or omission of the servant. Mott v. Ice Co., 73 N. Y. 543; Rounds v. Railroad Co., 64 N. Y. 129; Aycrigg v. Railroad Co., 30 N. J. Law, 460; Snyder v. Railroad Co., 60 Mo. 413; Cosgrove v. Ogden, 49 N. Y. 257; Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49; Railroad Co. v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 110. "The test of the master's responsibility for the act of the servant," said Grover, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in Cosgrove v. Ogden, supra, "is not whether such act was done according to the instructions of the master to the servant, but whether it was done in the prosecution of the business that the servant was employed by the master to do." In Howe v. Newmarch, supra, as the final conclusion of an elaborate opinion, in which many cases bearing upon the subject are considered, the test of the master's responsibility for the act of his servant is thus stated: "And in an action of tort in the nature of an action on the case, the master is not responsible if the wrong done by his servant is done without his authority, and not for the purpose of executing his orders, or doing his work; so that if the servant, wholly for a purpose of his own, disregarding the object for which he was employed, and not intending by his act to execute it, does an injury to another, not within the scope of his employment, the master is not liable; but if the act be done in the execution of the authority given him by his master, and for the purpose of performing what the master has directed, the master will be responsible, whether the wrong done be occasioned by negligence, or by a wanton or reckless purpose to accomplish the master's business in an unlawful manner."

The instruction given by the court below, and now under consideration, is in conflict with the rule of law as above stated. The engineer was not acting within the scope of his employment, as assumed in this instruction, if his object in moving the engine was simply to frighten the passengers in the street-car. Such an act, done for such a purpose, was entirely foreign to the objects of his employment. The work which the engineer was to perform for defendant was to manage the engine while it was engaged in switching cars, and if he started the engine, not for the purpose of employing it in the service of the defendant, but to accomplish an independent purpose of his own, of the character stated in the instruction, the relation of master and servant, as to that particular act, did not exist, and the defendant would not be liable for any damage resulting therefrom, and it is immaterial that he used the engine of defendant in order to accomplish his unlawful purpose. Whart. Neg. § 168; Railroad Co. v. Wetmore, 19 Ohio St. 110. It would not be contended that one who employs another to sprinkle his garden, and places in his hands a hose to be used for that purpose, would be civilly responsible in damages if, stepping aside from that employment, the servant should, either in sport or from malice, turn the same upon a person quietly passing along the street. In the commission of such an assault the servant would not be acting within the scope of his employment, nor would the hose be used in the transaction of the business of his employer; and yet the act of the servant in the illustration just given would not be more foreign to the purpose of his employment than was that of the engineer in this case, if committed under the circumstances stated in the instruction. The rule of law which makes the master liable to respond in damages for the act or omission of the "servant implies that the master will not, in any case, be liable for wrongs committed by the servant while not acting within the scope of his authority. This rule is so reasonable that the grounds on which it rests need scarcely be suggested. In all the affairs of life men are constantly obliged to act by others; but no one could venture to so act if the mere circumstance that he employed another to act for him about any general or particular business made him an insurer against all wrongs which such persons might possibly commit during the period of such employment. * * * In other words, if the servant steps aside from his master's business, for how short a time soever, to commit a wrong not connected with such business, the relation of master and servant will be for the time suspended." 2 Thomp. Neg. pp. 885, 886.

The evidence in this case tending to show the facts referred to in the instruction under consideration is very slight, and that part of it consisting of the opinion of one of the witnesses that the intention of the engineer was only to frighten the passengers on the street-car is not competent for the purpose of proving such fact. The case was, however, tried upon the theory that there was sufficient evidence upon which to base the instruction, and we are not able to say that there was such an entire want of evidence upon that point that the instruction was without prejudice to the defendant.

Judgment and order reversed.

LEACH v. PIERCE, Judge. (No. 14,930.)

ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW—NEW TRIAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT—LACHES.

1. Where, on a widow's petition for an allowance, written objections were filed, and after a hearing the allowance was granted, the Code does not authorize a new trial.

2. Where the petitioner's proposed bill of exceptions on the motion for a new trial was accompanied by a general notice that the bill was intended to be used in the matter of the widow's claim for allowance, "filed by her in the matter of said estate," petitioner was entitled to have the bill settled as a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the order granting such allowance.

3. Ten days was a reasonable time within which to file such bill of exceptions after the entry of an order granting such allowance; and where the court, within such 10 days, granted petitioner 20 days' extension of time to serve the bill, service during those 20 days was in time.

4. Where the respondent's answer to a petition for a writ of mandate to compel him to settle a bill of exceptions alleged facts showing that petitioner had actual notice of the granting of the order for such allowance, and for more than 10 days thereafter neglected to present her bill of exceptions, but did not show that she had notice of the entry of such order, the answer failed to present a material issue.

5. The petitioner served her bill of exceptions on February 10, 1891. March 10th the administrator procured an order extending his time to serve objections and proposed amendments. The appeal was taken March 12th, and on the 14th the proposed bill and amendments were presented to the clerk. April 11th the matter of the settlement of the bill was heard. On June 10th her application was made for a writ of mandate to compel A., who was then judge, to settle her bill of exceptions; and no decision was reached till October 12th, when the petition was dismissed by the supreme court because A.'s term of office had expired. October 17th the application to settle the bill was made to P., A.'s successor in office, and his decision was not made until November 11th. Held, that she had not been guilty of laches in the settlement of the bill.

In bank.

Wellborn, Parker & Stevens and Haines & Ward, for petitioner. Luce & McDonald and Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel respondent to consider petitioner's proposed bill of exceptions and the proposed amendments thereto attached, and to settle the same. An alternative writ was issued, and the respondent has appeared and objected to the sufficiency of the petition; has orally demurred to it on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to entitle petitioner to the relief sought by her.

The facts alleged, and upon which the petitioner claims the right to have a bill of exceptions settled, are as follows: In November, 1886, Maria A. Burton, widow of H. S. Burton, deceased, filed a petition asking for an allowance of $250 a month out of the funds of the estate. The petitioner, who is interested in the estate of Burton, filed written objections to the granting of said petition. The issues were tried by Judge AITKEN, who at that time was presiding judge of the superior court in which the matter of said estate was pending; and on January 3, 1891, he made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of Mrs. Burton. But it is alleged that the order granting family allowance was not entered until some time after January 5, and prior to February 10, 1891. No notice was ever given petitioner of the entry of the order, but on March 2, 1891, she appealed to the supreme court, and the appeal is still pending. On January 12, 1891, the petitioner served upon the administrator, Mrs. Burton, and others a notice of intention to move for a new trial. On January 21st the court made an order granting the petitioner herein 20 days from that date to serve and file affidavits and a bill of exceptions. The proposed bill of exceptions was served February 10th. Within due time thereafter the administrator served upon the attorneys for petitioner written objections to the settlement of the bill, and at the same time proposed certain amendments, not waiving his right to insist upon the objections made. On March 14th the bill and the proposed amendments and objections were presented to the clerk. On April 11, 1891, the matter of the settlement of the bill came on for hearing before Judge AITKEN, and he refused to settle the bill; but his reasons therefor do not appear. On June 10, 1891, petitioner herein applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel Judge AITKEN to settle the bill. The judge appeared and filed a demurrer to the petition, which on October 12th was sustained, and the petition was dismissed, on the ground that the respondent therein, being no longer in office, could not be compelled to settle the bill. Leach v. Aitken, 28 Pac. Rep. 777. On June 26, 1891, the petitioner applied to Judge PIERCE, who had succeeded Judge AITKEN, for a settlement of the bill, and caused notice to be given to the parties interested. The matter came on for hearing on July 17th, and the judge declined to settle the bill on the ground that an application for a writ of mandate to compel Judge AITKEN was at that time pending in the supreme court. The order was made without prejudice to a renewal of the application. On October 17, 1891, the petitioner renewed her application to Judge PIERCE to settle the bill, and the same came on regularly for hearing on November 11th, when the judge made an order refusing to settle the bill on the ground "that the question was res judicata by reason of the action of Ex-Judge AITKEN." The order recites that "the other grounds of objection were not argued or passed upon."

1. It is claimed by counsel for respondent that, the latter having exercised his discretion and passed upon the objections made to the settlement of the bill, mandamus will not lie to review his action. Of course, the exercise of respondent's discretion cannot be controlled or reviewed in this proceeding. He cannot be compelled to settle any particular bill, or to insert or exclude any particular facts; but, if the petitioner is entitled to move for a new trial, and has taken the proper steps within time, or if she has tendered a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the order within the time allowed by law, respondent cannot refuse to settle and sign a bill containing a record of the proceedings. It is an act which the law requires him to perform,—a duty resulting from his office, (Landers v. Landers, 82 Cal. 481, 23 Pac. Rep. 126;) and the remedy by appeal, if it exist, is inadequate, (Careaga v. Fernald, 66 Cal. 351, 5 Pac. Rep. 615; In re Herteman, 73 Cal. 547, 15 Pac. Rep. 121.)

2. Does the Code authorize a motion for a new trial in a proceeding of this kind? Prior to the adoption of the Code, issues of fact were authorized in nearly every probate proceeding, and there was a general provision that either party might move for a new trial on account of any error committed by the probate court in settling or determining issues of fact. It is now provided that only those provisions of the Code relative to new trials and appeals, which are consistent with the provisions of the probate act, shall apply to probate proceedings. It was evidently the intention of those who framed and adopted the provisions of the Code, relative to probate proceedings, to curtail dilatory proceedings in the settlement of estates. Section 1714, Code Civil Proc. It is the duty of the superior court, when a person dies, leaving a widow or minor children, to make "such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family, according to their circumstances, during the progress of the settlement of the estate." Id. § 1466. No notice of the application is required. The court may make the order "on its own motion, or on petition therefor." Id. § 1465. There is no provision for the framing of issues with respect to the matter of family allowance. It is made the duty of the court, with or without a petition, to set apart sufficient property for the support of the widow and children. "A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact in the same court after a trial and decision by a jury or court or by referees." Id. § 656. "Issues arise upon the pleadings when a act or conclusion of law is maintained by the one party, and is controverted by the other." Id. § 588. "The former verdict or other decision may be vacated and a new trial granted, on the application of the party aggrieved, for any of the following causes," etc. Id. § 657. These provisions clearly do not apply to every order which may be made ex parte, or by the court on its own motion, simply because the court has permitted written objections to be filed. In Re Moore it was suggested that the operation of these sections should be confined "to those cases in which the Code has expressly authorized issues of fact to be framed." 72 Cal. 340, 13 Pac. Rep. 880. See, also, In re Herteman, supra. It is not necessary, however, in this case, to lay down a rule of universal application; and all we decide is that, in the matter before us, proceedings for a new trial were not authorized. It is better, perhaps, to follow the suggestion of Mr. Justice MILLER in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 104, to ascertain the intent and proper application of the provisions bearing upon the subject "by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require." The proceeding in Re Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, 26 Pac. Rep. 178, 532, cited by petitioner, was a contest based upon written objections to the application for letters testamentary of the person named as executrix in the will. In such a proceeding the Code provides for notice and for the framing of issues of fact. It expressly provides what facts the petition must show, and that the objections thereto must be stated in writing. Sections 1299, 1300, 1303, 1351, Code Civil Proc. The views expressed by the court in that case are entirely in harmony with the views expressed herein. It is unnecessary to refer to other cases cited by petitioner, further than to say that in none of them was the exact question we are considering involved. Some of the cases referred to were cases involving motions for new trial in matters of probate homesteads; but the question whether a motion for a new trial was proper was not raised or considered, and we are not called upon now to say whether or not proceedings for a new trial are authorized in homestead matters.

3. It is claimed by petitioner that she is entitled to have the bill settled as a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the order. Counsel for respondent contend that the judge properly refused to settle the bill for that purpose on the grounds: (1) Because it was proposed as a bill of exceptions to be used on the motion for a new trial, and can be used, if at all, only for that purpose; and (2) because it was not presented in time. We do not think that either of these objections is well taken. The proposed bill was accompanied by a general notice to the attorneys for the objectors that the bill was intended to be used as a bill of exceptions "in the matter of the petition of Maria A. Burton for maintenance, filed by her in the matter of said estate;" and objections were made to the settlement of the bill upon the grounds that "it had not been served in time to entitle it to settlement as a bill of exceptions to the original order granting such allowance, and upon the further ground that a motion for a new trial in respect of a widow's allowance during the administration of an estate was not a proper or admissible proceeding." Notwithstanding the references in the notices and objections to the proceedings for a new trial, we think the bill was one which the petitioner was entitled to use on direct appeal from the order. Was the bill presented within the time allowed by law? Our rule provides that in cases of appeal from orders like the one under consideration the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law. Prior to the adoption of this rule, there was nothing in the law or the rules of this court requiring a bill of exceptions on appeal from such orders, and no rule has been made prescribing the time. The Code does not prescribe the time within which a bill of exceptions to an order of family allowance must be prepared and served. Section 650 provides that a party desiring to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions must prepare and serve the same within 10 days after entry of the judgment, if the action were tried with a jury, or after receiving notice of the entry of judgment, if the action were tried without a jury. But this provision is inapplicable to the case before us. Section 1715, Code Civil Proc., provides that the appeal must be taken within 60 days after entry of the order. As stated before, no notice of the application for a family allowance is required. The court may make the order on its own motion. Any person interested, whether he has had actual notice of the entry of the order or not, may appeal at any time within 60 days. Those who have had only constructive notice certainly should have a reasonable time within which to prepare and serve their bill of exceptions. What is a reasonable time is a question to be determined by the judge upon all the facts and circumstances. As to those who have been parties to the contest, we think it safe and right to hold, following the analogies found in provisions of the Code relating to civil actions, that they are entitled to actual notice of the entry of the order, and that the time within which to move for a new trial, when proceedings therefor are proper, or to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions to be used on appeal from the order, does not begin to run until such notice has been given. Where the written claims or objections of interested parties are filed, the prevailing party will have no difficulty in knowing whom to serve, and the notice will set running the time within which the adverse party must move. Applying this construction of the statute and rule to the proceeding before us, we think that the bill was prepared in time, and should have been settled. Admitting that petitioner had actual notice of the entry of the order on January 12, 1891, her bill was presented in time, because within 10 days thereafter the court made an order granting her 20 days from January 21st to prepare and serve affidavits and a bill of exceptions. The bill was served on February 10th.

Respondent has filed an answer to the petition, setting forth in substance that the petitioner and her attorneys were in court on the 3d day of January, 1891, when the court filed its decision and made the order referred to, and had actual knowledge of the delivery of said decision and the rendition of said order by the court; that there was some doubt entertained by all the parties as to whether Judge AITKEN would have jurisdiction in the premises on the next judicial day of the court, which was Monday, the 5th day of January, that being the first Monday of January next succeeding the election and qualification of his successor; and, to avoid all question of jurisdiction, it was agreed by and between all of the attorneys that the decisions and orders made on that day should be given and made on the afternoon of Saturday, the said 3d day of January, 1891; that, in pursuance of such agreement, all parties appeared in court, and the decisions and orders in the Estate of Burton were then made and signed by Judge AITKEN, and delivered to the clerk for filing and record; that, after the findings and orders were filed, an order was made and entered by the court, directing that all the costs of the hearing and determination of the matters should be charged against and paid by the estate, and the respective parties should file their cost bills in the usual form and manner; that, on the 8th day of January, petitioner served and filed a verified statement of her costs and disbursements in resisting the application of Mrs. Burton for widow's allowance; that Judge AITKEN refused to settle the bill because it had not been served in time to entitle it to settlement as a bill of exceptions to the order, and because a motion for a new trial in the matter of the widow's allowance was not a proper proceeding, and that consequently no bill of exceptions in support of such a motion could be allowed. The issues thus raised by the answer are immaterial. They show that the petitioner had full notice of the decision, and that an order had been made, but do not show that she had notice of the entry of the order; and that is the material matter. An appeal may be taken at any time with 60 days after the order is entered. Section 1713, Code Civil Proc. The time fixed by section 650, Id., in which to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions, is 10 days after notice of the entry of the judgment. The reasons stated as the grounds upon which Judge AITKEN refused to settle the bill are not sound; and, if his term of office had not expired, the writ of mandate applied for would have been granted. We do not think that the petitioner can be charged with laches in the matter of the settlement of her proposed bill. The bill was served on February 10th. On March 10th the administrator procured an order extending his time to serve objections and proposed amendments. The appeal was taken on March 12th, and on March 14th the proposed bill and amendments were presented to the clerk. On April 11th the matter of the settlement of the bill came on regularly for hearing. On June 10th her application was made to this court for a writ of mandate, and no decision was reached until October 12th following. Five days thereafter, petitioner renewed her application to Judge PIERCE to settle the bill, and his decision was not rendered until November 11th. It appears, therefore, that the petitioner has done all in her power to secure a settlement of the bill, and that the delay has been occasioned by the objections of the administrator, and the rulings of the respondent and Judge AITKEN in sustaining the same. The objections to the sufficiency of the petition are overruled, the objections to the sufficiency of the answer are sustained, and it is ordered that a writ issue, directing respondent to consider the proposed bill and the amendments proposed thereto, and to settle the same in accordance with the facts.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; McFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. In my opinion the petitioner was entitled to a settlement of her bill of exceptions, without respect to her right to move for a new trial in the matter of the decree for a family allowance. As the question is immaterial to the determination of this proceeding, I do not desire to express any opinion as to the right to move for a new trial in such cases.

LEACH v. PIERCE, Judge. (No. 14,931.)

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REFUSAL TO SETTLE—MANDAMUS—SALE OF DECEDENT'S ESTATE—NEW TRIAL.

1. A petition for mandamus to compel P., a judge, to settle a bill of exceptions, alleged that the administrator of an estate, on September 6, 1889, applied to A., then judge, for an order for the sale of a portion of the estate; that petitioner filed objections; that on January 3, 1891, the order was granted; that no notice of the decision or entry of judgment was given the petitioner, but on March 2, 1891, she appealed from the judgment; that on January 12, 1891, she served a notice of intention to move for a new trial; that A. granted 20 days from January 21st in which to serve her bill of exceptions to be used on the motion for a new trial; that the proposed bill was served on February 10, 1891; that the administrator filed objections and proposed amendments to said bill, which were given to the clerk of the court on March 14th; that A. heard the matter on April 11th, and refused to settle the bill; that on June 10th she applied to the supreme court to compel A. to settle the bill; that the application was dismissed because the respondent was no longer in office; that on June 26, 1891, she applied to P., his successor, for a settlement of the bill; that P. refused to settle the bill because the application for the writ to A. was at that time pending in the supreme court; that the order was made without prejudice to a renewal of the application; that on October 17th she renewed her application, when P. refused to settle the bill on the ground that the question was res adjudicata by reason of A.'s action. Held, that she was entitled to have had the bill settled by A., and mandamus would issue to P.

2. Under the Code, which provides that "any person interested in the estate may file his written objections, which must be heard and determined," the motion for a new trial was proper to review the decision of the court.

Petition of Maggie Leach for a writ of mandate to compel W. L. Pierce, judge of the superior court of San Diego county, to settle a bill of exceptions. Writ granted.

Wellborn, Parker & Stevens and Haines & Ward, for petitioner. Luce & McDonald and Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to settle a bill of exceptions. The petitioner alleges that the administrator of the estate of Henry Burton, deceased, filed a petition in the superior court on September 6, 1889, praying for an order for the sale of a portion of the estate of said decedent; that petitioner in due time filed written objections to the granting of said petition; that the issues were tried without a jury by Judge AITKEN, who on the 3d day of January filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered a judgment thereon granting the petition of the administrator; that no notice of the decision or entry of the judgment was ever given to the petitioner, but on March 2, 1891, she appealed from the judgment to the supreme court, and the appeal is still pending; that on January 12, 1891, petitioner served upon the administrator a notice of intention in due form to move for a new trial; that the court granted the petitioner 20 days from January 21st in which to prepare and serve affidavits and a bill of exceptions to be used on the motion for a new trial; that the proposed bill was served on February 10, 1891; that in due time the administrator served a document containing objections and proposed amendments to said proposed bill of exceptions; that the proposed bill, and the objections and proposed amendments, were given to the clerk on March 14th; that Judge AITKEN heard the parties in the matter of the settlement of said bill on April 11th, and refused to settle any bill. The petition then goes on to allege various matters which occurred thereafter, and which are in all respects the same as the facts stated in Leach v. Pierce, (No. 14,930,) 29 Pac. Rep. 235, this day filed, relating to an application to this court for a writ of mandate, its order thereon, and an application to Judge PIERCE for a settlement of the proposed bill, and his action thereon.

The provisions of the Code for the sale and conveyance of real estate of decedents require all petitions for orders to be in writing, setting forth the facts showing the sale to be necessary, and upon the hearing "any person interested in the estate may file his written objections, which must be heard and determined." Issues of fact, therefore, are expressly authorized by the Code, and a motion for a new trial is proper to review the decision of the court. Estate of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. Rep. 373; Leach v. Pierce, 29 Pac. Rep. 235, (No. 14,930.) The decision of the court was filed on January 3, 1891, and within 10 days thereafter notice of intention to move for a new trial was given, and a bill of exceptions was prepared and served within the time allowed by the statute and the order of the court. The refusal of the respondent to settle the bill because Judge AITKEN had refused to settle it is not based upon tenable ground. Upon the facts stated, the petitioner was entitled to a bill of exceptions; but this court could not compel Judge AITKEN to settle one because his term of office had expired, and for that reason only the application made by the petitioner for a writ of mandate was denied. The petitioner is entitled to have a bill of exceptions settled showing a correct record of the proceedings, if the facts be as stated in her petition. The objections to the petition are therefore overruled. Let the writ be made peremptory.

LEACH v. PIERCE, Judge. (No. 14,929.)

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATES—ATTORNEY'S FEES—NOTICE—FILING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1718, provides that the court may appoint an attorney to represent the devisees, legatees, heirs, or creditors of the decedent, who are minors and have no general guardian, or who are non-residents, and all others who are unrepresented; that the attorney may receive a fee, to be fixed by the court, payable out of the funds of the estate which on distribution may be charged to the party represented by the attorney. Held, that an order to pay such fees to an attorney may be made ex parte, and no notice of the entry thereof is required.

2. Where petitioner was interested in an estate, and objected to an order allowing fees to an attorney, and the court granted an extension of 20 days' time in which to file a bill of exceptions, this was an adjudication that 20 days was a reasonable time within which to perform; and filing the bill within that time entitled her to have it settled.

In bank.

Application of Maggie Leach for a writ of mandate to compel W. L. Pierce, judge of the superior court of San Diego county, to settle a bill of exceptions. Writ allowed.

Welborn, Parker & Stevens and Haines & Ward, for petitioner. Luce & McDonald and Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner alleges that on the 13th day of November, 1890, in the superior court of the county of San Diego, in Re Estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, Jim S. Callen, an attorney, in representing Elizabeth Cochrane and Richard Lull by appointment of the court, asked the court to allow him $3,000 fees in said matter as necessary expenses of administration; that on January 3d Judge

AITKEN allowed Callen $2,500, and directed the administrator to pay the same out of the funds of the estate, and upon distribution to be charged to the interest of Elizabeth Cochrane and Richard Lull; that no notice of the entry of the order was ever given to petitioner; that on February 10th petitioner served her bill of exceptions, to which no objections or amendments were ever served by Callen; that in due time petitioner delivered the proposed bill to Judge AITKEN; that at the time set for the settlement of the bill by the judge, namely, April 11, 1891, said judge refused to settle the bill. The petitioner then proceeds to allege matters similar to those contained in her petition filed in No. 14,930, (29 Pac. Rep. 235,) relating to her application to this court for a writ of mandate to compel Judge AITKEN to settle a bill of exceptions, the action of this court, her subsequent application to Judge PIERCE, and his refusal to settle the bill.

The question as to whether a new trial is a proper proceeding in a matter of this kind is not involved, there being no allegation that steps for a new trial were taken. The order is appealable, (Stuttmeister v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. 487, 14 Pac. Rep. 35;) and if the bill of exceptions was presented in time the petitioner is entitled to have it settled. Section 1718, Civil Code Proc., provides that the court may in its discretion appoint some competent attorney at law to represent in certain enumerated proceedings the devisees, legatees, heirs, or creditors of the decedent who are minors, and have no general guardian, or who are non-residents, and all others who are unrepresented. "The attorney may receive a fee, to be fixed by the court, for his services, which must be paid out of the funds of the estate, as necessary expenses of administration, and upon distribution may be charged to the party represented by the attorney." The order may be made ex parte, and no notice of the entry thereof is required.

It is not alleged in the petition that any objections were filed by petitioner to the granting of the application of Callen, but it is immaterial whether objections were filed or not. If written objections were filed, the petitioner was entitled to notice of the entry of the order; and, if the order was made without notice to petitioner, she was entitled to a reasonable time within which to prepare and serve her bill of exceptions. It appears that on January 25th the court granted the petitioner an extension of 20 days' time in which to serve the bill. This was an adjudication by the court that 20 days from January 25th was a reasonable time within which to perform the act required; and, as the bill was prepared and served within the 20 days allowed, petitioner was entitled to have it settled. The objections to the sufficiency of the petition are overruled. Let the writ be made peremptory.

PEOPLE v. WRIGHT. (No. 20,853.)

MAYHEM—PROOF OF MALICE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Pen. Code, § 203, provides that "every person who unlawfully and maliciously" disables or disfigures a member of a human being's body is guilty of mayhem. Section 7, subd. 4, provides that "the words 'malice' and 'maliciously' import a wish to * * * injure another, * * * or intent to do a wrongful act established either by proof or presumption of law." Section 20 provides that in every crime there must be a concurrence of act and intent, or criminal negligence. Section 188 limits "malice," as therein defined, to those cases (not including mayhem) wherein "malice aforethought" is made an essential element. Held, that "malice aforethought," or "malice," as defined in section 188, is not an essential element in the crime of mayhem, and proof of premeditation and deliberation is not required.

2. To show mayhem, the statutes are fully met by proof of the commission of the act, from which the law will presume, though it be done in pursuance of an intent formed during the conflict, that it was done unlawfully and maliciously, unless the evidence shows the contrary.

3. The prosecuting witness, who was friendly to defendant, while the latter engaged in a fight with another person, took hold of the combatants, tried to separate them, and urged them to quit fighting. Defendant thereupon threw his arm around the neck of the prosecuting witness, and bit off his ear. Held, that the atrocity of the act is presumptive of the intent to commit it.

4. The excuse that the act was done while engaged in a fight suddenly brought on by the interference of the prosecuting witness, and under the belief that such interference was hostile to defendant, is no defense.

5. Where the evidence showed that defendant was guilty of the crime charged or no offense, it was proper to charge the jury to convict of such crime or acquit.

6. The court properly disallowed a question to a witness by defendant, asking his opinion as to whether the interference of the prosecuting witness was such as to induce the defendant to think it was friendly, or likely to mislead defendant as to its object, such matter being within the peculiar province of the jury to determine.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county, JOHN CALDWELL, Judge.

Frank Wright was convicted of mayhem and appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of mayhem, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of three years. From the judgment of conviction, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

Section 203 of the Penal Code, upon which the information herein was founded, reads as follows: "Every person who unlawfully and maliciously deprives a human being of a member of his body, or disables, disfigures, or renders it useless, or cuts or disables the tongue, or puts out an eye, or slits the nose, ear, or lip, is guilty of mayhem." The evidence upon which he was convicted is, in substance, as follow: Defendant, while drinking in a saloon with several others, became involved in a quarrel with one of the party, named Crall, who challenged him for a fight, which he declined. Crall then left the saloon, and immediately thereafter defendant "threw off his overcoat," and walked up to one of the party named Trood, who, it appears, was very drunk, and addressing him in an angry manner, said: "Any one who says Crall was in this is a d—— liar." Trood responded, "I said it, and I am not a d—— liar." Defendant then struck at Trood, and they at once engaged in a fight. The prosecuting witness, Fuller, whose relations with the defendant were friendly, but not intimate, and who had taken no part in any of the previous quarrels referred to, was standing near by when the altercation occurred, and when the combatants clinched he stepped in between them, and, taking hold of both parties, separated them, telling them, in effect, as he did so, to quit fighting. Defendant thereupon, and while Fuller had hold of him, threw his arm around Fuller's neck, and, seizing his ear with his teeth, bit a part of it off. It is claimed by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, because there was no proof of premeditation or deliberation. "Malice," as defined by section 188 of the Penal Code[1] is expressly limited in its application to those cases in which malice aforethought is made an essential element, and is therefore not applicable to the case under consideration, as the definition of the word "maliciously," as herein employed, is to be found in subdivision 4 of section 7 of the Penal Code, and reads as follows: "The words 'malice' and 'maliciously' import a wish to * * * injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law." And section 20 of the same Code provides that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence." It will thus be seen that a concurrence of act and intent or criminal negligence are the only elements essential to constitute a crime or public offense within the meaning of this section, the only exception being in those cases where malice aforethought is made by section 188, referred to, a necessary and additional element. It therefore follows that, as malice aforethought is not an essential element in the crime of mayhem, proof of premeditation or deliberation is not required. But the requirements of the statute in such cases will be fully met by proof of the commission of the act, from which the law will presume, though it be done in pursuance of an intent formed during the conflict, that it was done unlawfully and maliciously, that is, "with a wish to * * * injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act," unless the evidence tends to show to the contrary; that is, that it was done in necessary self-defense, and under circumstances that were at the time unavoidable, in order to prevent the infliction, or attempted infliction, of some great bodily harm by the party injured. The cases of Godfrey v. People, 63 N. Y. 207, and Tully v. People, 67 N. Y. 15, cited by counsel for appellant, and relied on as authority, are founded on a statute which requires that the maiming must result from "a premeditated design, evinced by lying in wait," etc.; and the court, in construing this statute in Godfrey v. People, supra, and reaffirmed in Tully v. People, supra, held the design must precede the conflict, and not originate with or grow out of it. The reasoning of the court in these decisons upon the New York statute, which, as will be seen, is dissimilar to our own, can have no application to cases of mayhem arising under our Code. And under the views herein expressed it follows that the case of State v. Cody, 18 Or. 506, 23 Pac. Rep. 891, and 24 Pac. Rep. 895, also cited by appellant, is not authority.

A careful examination of numerous reported cases show that the crime of mayhem is generally committed in the midst of sudden altercations, without premeditation or deliberation, in view of which we are satisfied that the object of the legislature in the enactment of section 203 of the Penal Code was to suppress such shocking brutality in personal rencounters; and, if proof of premeditation or deliberation was required, as contended for by appellant, the statute would be unavailable for the accomplishment of the very purpose for which it was plainly intended. In the case before us the atrocity of the act itself creates the presumption that it was intended; and, as it does not appear to have been done under circumstances constituting a valid defense under the law, it follows that the defendant was properly convicted of the crime charged. The excuse that the act was done while engaged in a fight suddenly brought on by the interference of Fuller, and under the belief by defendant that such interference was hostile to him, constitutes no defense.

It is claimed that the court erred in charging the jury "that, if you find the defendant guilty, it must be of the offense charged in the information, and that you cannot find him guilty of any less offense. And if you do not believe him guilty of that charge,—the charge of mayhem,—then you should find him not guilty." Where a lesser offense is necessarily included in that which is charged, the jury may find the defendant guilty of such lesser offense. See section 1155, Pen. Code. But where, as is the case here, "the evidence tended to show that he was guilty of the crime charged or of no offense at all," People v. Barry, 90 Cal. 41, 27 Pac. Rep. 62, (People v. Madden, 76 Cal. 521, 18 Pac. Rep. 402;) such charge was entirely proper. The contention that the court erred in its modification of defendant's instructions numbered 1 and 8, and by its refusal to give them as requested, is not well founded, for the reason that the subject-matter of the instructions, as modified, is in accord with the views herein expressed, and correctly states the law. With reference to the charge of the court and the instructions, considered as a whole, it is sufficient to say that they are far more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to under the law. It is lastly insisted that the court erred in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to the following question: "Was it such an interference [referring to the interference of Fuller when he stepped in to separate defendant and Trood while they were engaged in fighting] as would carry the information to the defendant that this party was only interfering as a friend, or would it be likely to mislead the party as to his object?" The objection to this question was properly sustained, for the reason that it called for the opinion of the witness in relation to a matter which it was the peculiar province of the jury to determine, and of which they were the exclusive judges. We are of the opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

MERRILL v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN DIEGO et al. (No. 14,352.)

RELIEF AGAINST JUDGMENT—SURETY ON NOTE—RELEASE AND SETTLEMENT BY PRINCIPAL.

Plaintiff, the apparent maker of a note, was in fact the surety for H., the payee named therein, who indorsed it to defendant bank, receiving its face value therefor. After maturity H. conveyed to defendant property "in full payment of all claims and demands" against him and of his indebtedness for all money borrowed from said bank, and took a release reciting that all such claims were fully paid. Thereafter defendant recovered judgment on said note against H. and plaintiff, the former making default, and the latter being ignorant of the conveyance and release previously executed. Defendant had no knowledge that plaintiff was an accommodation maker, and always looked upon him as the principal, never having accepted H. as primarily liable. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to relief from the judgment, the settlement made by H. extinguishing all liability on the note.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. LEACH, Judge.

Action by Merrill against the First National Bank of San Diego and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Luce & McDonald and David L. Withington, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff seeks in this action to have declared satisfied, so far as he is concerned, a certain judgment obtained by the defendant national bank against plaintiff and one O. S. Hubbell, upon a non-negotiable note. The court finds that the plaintiff was the apparent maker of the note referred to, but was in fact the surety of Hubbell, the payee named therein; that the note was made for the accommodation of Hubbell; and it is alleged in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, that Hubbell, on the day of its execution, borrowed from the defendant national bank upon said note the full amount called for by it, and indorsed the same to said bank. It is further found that after the maturity of said note the defendant Hubbell and his wife conveyed to the defendant McClure "a large amount of real estate and personal property * * * for the benefit of said First National Bank, which property was received by said bank in full payment of all claims and demands held by said bank against O. S. Hubbell, and particularly in full settlement of his indebtedness for all sums of money borrowed from said bank;" and thereupon said bank executed to said Hubbell a release from all said claims and demands, which release recited that the same were fully paid. The property so conveyed was, in substance, the entire estate of said Hubbell and wife. Thereafter the defendant national bank commenced an action against the plaintiff and the said Hubbell upon the note above referred to, and recovered the judgment which the plaintiff now seeks to have declared satisfied. In said action Hubbell made default, and in this connection the court found that "the said First National Bank and said O. S. Hubbell did not inform the plaintiff that said release had been given, or that said property had been conveyed in payment of said indebtedness, and he was in ignorance thereof at the time of the rendition of the judgment against him." The findings further show that at the time of the execution of said note the defendant national bank had no knowledge of the fact that the plaintiff was an accommodation maker, but looked to him as the principal, and never received or accepted him as only a surety thereon, and never accepted or recognized Hubbell as the person primarily liable on said note. Upon these findings, and others not necessary to be here stated, the court below gave its judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. There is no bill of exceptions in the record, and the questions presented by this appeal arise upon the pleadings and findings of the court.

1. As before stated, the pleadings admit that the defendant national bank loaned to Hubbell, upon the note above referred to, money equal to its face value, and that the note was thereupon indorsed by him to said bank. This being so, the finding of the court that after the maturity of the note Hubbell conveyed property to the defendant bank, which was accepted by it "in full payment of all claims and demands held by said bank against said O. S. Hubbell, and particularly in full settlement of his indebtedness for all money borrowed from said bank," must be construed with reference to this admission, and is equivalent to a finding that Hubbell fully settled with and satisfied the bank for the money which he had theretofore borrowed from it on the security of this note. Upon the facts stated in this and the other findings before referred to, the court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant. The payment of the indebtedness represented by said note, or, rather, Hubbell's satisfaction of such indebtedness by the transfer of property accepted by its holder for that purpose, extinguished the obligation of the note, and would have been for plaintiff a complete defense to the action subsequently brought to recover upon the note thus fully satisfied; and, as the plaintiff was, without any negligence on his part, ignorant of the facts constituting such defense at the time of the rendition of the judgment against him, he may in this form of action obtain relief from the effect of such judgment. Wales v. Bank, Har. (Mich.) 308; Reed v. Harvey, 23 Ark. 44. The fact that the national bank did not know at the time of the execution of the note that Hubbell was the principal debtor, and that it looked solely to plaintiff as the principal, does not affect the question we are now considering. If, in point of fact, the note was paid or satisfied, the defendant national bank was not entitled to the judgment which it subsequently recovered thereon against the plaintiff. While it may be true that, if the bank did not consent to deal with plaintiff otherwise than as a principal upon said note, the mere release of Hubbell would not, of itself, operate as a release of plaintiff, still if, in order to secure such release, Hubbell paid anything upon said note, or delivered to the defendant national bank any property to secure its payment, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of such payment or security.

2. The evidence upon which the case was based is not in the record before us, and, as finding No. 11 leaves it somewhat doubtful whether the court below gave to its finding in regard to the settlement made by Hubbell with the respondent bank the same construction we have, and which we think it must bear, we deem it proper, under the rule declared in Schroeder v. Versicherungs Gesellschaft, 60 Cal. 467, to order a retrial, rather than to direct the entry of a judgment for the plaintiff upon the findings as they are. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. McNUTT. (No. 20,858.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO REQUEST—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—CONVICTION OF LESSER OFFENSE.

1. A person who is charged with an assault with intent to murder cannot complain of a failure to give instructions in regard to his good character for peace and quiet, or the right to convict as for simple assault, unless such instructions are specially requested.

2. Where the evidence of the prosecution, upon an information for an assault with intent to murder, discloses an assault with a pocket-knife, the blade of which is 3 or 3½ inches in length, and the defendant denies any assault, the court is justified in refusing an instruction that a conviction could be had as for a simple assault, under Pen. Code, § 1159, allowing a conviction for any offense which is included in the offense charged, since the said section contemplates a conviction for such an offense only when the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction for the greater offense.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Information against H. H. McNutt for assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder. From a judgment of conviction defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas F. Graber and E. M. Gibson, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Geo. W. Reed, Dist. Atty., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was charged with the offense of an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to commit murder, and was convicted of the lesser offense of an assault with a deadly weapon. For a reversal of the judgment he insists that the court erred in not instructing the jury upon the question of his good character for peace and quiet, he having introduced evidence to that point. It would be unfair and unjust to the people and the court to reverse a judgment and order a new trial because the court did not instruct the jury upon every conceivable phase or principle of law directly or indirectly involved in the case. We have so often held that, if a defendant desired an instruction as to the law upon any special branch of the case, he should direct the court's attention to the particular matter, and request an instruction to that effect, that a citation of authorities is not demanded. Appellant complains that the jury were not instructed that under the information they could convict him of a simple assault. As already suggested, he should have requested such an instruction to be given to the jury, if he desired the benefit of it. The evidence of the prosecution disclosed an assault upon the prosecutrix, with an open pocket-knife, the blade thereof being 3 or 3½ inches in length. The defendant denied any assault. Under the evidence he was either guilty of an offense more serious than a simple assault, or he was not guilty. The facts disclosed by the record would seem to justify a refusal by the court to give an instruction as to simple assault, even if it had been requested by the defendant. People v. Madden, 76 Cal. 521, 18 Pac. Rep. 402; People v. Scott, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 931. These decisions of the court are not in conflict with section 1159 of the Penal Code;[1] for that section contemplates the conviction of a defendant for the lesser offense, when the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction for the greater offense charged. The instructions given correctly state the law. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to concur with the majority in this case. The defendant testified that he made no assault with a knife; had no intention of doing so. The jury, therefore, if properly instructed, might have found him guilty of a simple assault. It is said that the defendant ought to have asked for an instruction on the subject if he desired one given to the jury. I think, however, that it is the duty of the court without request to tell the jury what verdicts may be rendered in cases like the one on trial, if warranted by evidence. "In charging the jury the court must state to them all matters of law necessary for their information." Section 1127, Pen. Code. The instructions, taken in connection with the fact that the court gave to the jury three forms of verdict,—one for not guilty, one for guilty of assault with a deadly weapon, and one for guilty as charged,—in effect told the jury that no other verdict could be rendered.

[1] This section provides that the jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged.

In re Kingsley's Estate. (No. 14,729.)

Allowance to Widow—Review on Appeal.

To justify the reversal of the opinion of the probate court fixing a family allowance, the appellant must show an erroneous ruling of such court, and not merely bad reasoning or mistaken views of the law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; John F. Ellinson, Judge.

Appeal by Henry Kingsley, brother and residuary legatee of George L. Kingsley, deceased, from an order refusing to reduce the family allowance as fixed by the probate court. Affirmed.

L. V. Hitchcock, for appellant. N. P. Chipman, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is taken by Henry Kingsley, brother and residuary legatee of the testator, from an order refusing to reduce the family allowance theretofore fixed by the court. The bill of exceptions states certain facts, but evidently nothing which would justify our interference with the discretion of the probate court, which in such cases must necessarily be nearly conclusive. In the bill of exceptions is what purports to be an opinion of the court, in which are recited many other matters which the judge assumed to be facts. But the bill of exceptions, as to this opinion, only settles the fact that such opinion was rendered and filed. It cannot be regarded as determining that the recitals contained in it are true. If they had been signed as findings, the respondent might have objected to them as not sustained by the evidence. The opinion might perhaps have been regarded as the findings of fact, but it does not seem to have been so considered by the parties, and the appellant asserts no such claim here. With the process of reasoning by which the court reached its conclusion, we have nothing to do. That may have been erroneous, and the ruling correct. To justify a reversal, it is incumbent upon the appellant to show an erroneous ruling, and not merely bad reasoning or mistaken views of the law. Had there been findings showing that $250 per month was a sufficient allowance, perhaps the question might have been raised here. It certainly could have been, had the ruling of the court been the other way. On this record we do not feel called upon to criticise the case of the Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. Rep. 379, or to say whether the intimation that an order of allowance is final can be sustained. Under the circumstances, the order appealed from should be affirmed.

Conflicting Evidence—Review on Appeal.

An appellate court will not disturb the judgment of a trial court, where the plaintiff and defendant were the principal witnesses at the trial, and their testimony was conflicting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by John Cross against F. C. Reed. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gibbon & Creighton and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an appeal from a judgment and order refusing a new trial, and the only ground urged for a reversal is that some of the material findings were not justified by the evidence. The action was brought to recover the sum of $8,000, with interest, and it was alleged that the money was furnished by plaintiff to defendant for investment on plaintiff's account in real property, and invested by defendant in a manner which was unauthorized and fraudulent. The plaintiff and defendant were the principal witnesses at the trial, and their testimony upon the material issues was substantially conflicting. No brief has been filed on behalf of respondent, but, after carefully reading all the evidence brought up in the record, we think it must be held, under the well-settled rule of this court, that the action of the trial court cannot be disturbed for the reason urged. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Temple, C.; Vanclief, C.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1379, providing that administration may be granted to one or more competent persons, although not otherwise entitled to the same, at the written request of the person entitled, filed in the court, is not inconsistent with the foregoing construction of sections 1365, 1369.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding for the appointment of an administrator of the estate of Cornelius Dorris, deceased. From an order appointing the nominee of a non-resident widow, the public administrator appeals. Order affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. A. Comte, Jr., for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is taken by the public administrator from an order granting letters of administration to the nominee of the non-resident widow of the deceased. The only question involved is as to the construction of sections 1365 and 1369 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and appellant contends that this question "has never been squarely presented to the supreme court, and that, therefore, Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 215, which has been the authority for the ruling of our courts, and upon which authority the supreme court has rendered its decision in Estate of Stevenson, in 72 Cal. 164, 13 Pac. Rep. 404, do not determine the abstract question of construction of provisions of the Code." If the question was not squarely presented in those cases, it is difficult to imagine how it could be so presented. In Estate of Cotter, no other question was involved; and it was discussed fully by the court, and squarely decided. The same is true as to the case of Estate of Stevenson. The first case was decided more than 12 years ago, and has been accepted and acted upon as correct ever since. It is not shown that it violates any principle of law or works injustice. Under such circumstances, we should not now feel at liberty to reverse the ruling, even if led to doubt its correctness. So far is this from being the case, however, that a careful reading of appellant's brief confirms us in the former view. We see no inconsistency between the provisions of the sections involved. If the person nominated by the surviving husband or wife be incompetent under section 1369, he should not be appointed. If the surviving husband or wife labor under any of the disabilities mentioned in that section they could not act; but it would not follow that they might not nominate a person who could.

Nor is section 1379[1] inconsistent with this construction. A surviving husband or wife is always interested in the estate, and generally immediately dependent upon it, and the policy of the law, plainly is that he or she shall have the administrative control, if desired. Therefore, such person, or his nominee, if a fit person, and not incompetent, has the absolute right. In general, there is not the same reason for favoring the other persons entitled to administer in certain cases. Some of them may not even be interested in the estate. Hence they are only entitled to nominate when they are the persons entitled to administer, and then the nomination is submitted to the discretion of the court, which may, if there is good reason for so doing, refuse to confirm the nominee, and appoint the person next entitled. We advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

New Trial—Cumulative Evidence.

Where the alleged newly-discovered evidence is cumulative, and it is apparent that if introduced on the former trial it would not have changed the result, the judgment and order denying a new trial will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

F. B. Burdick was convicted of concealment of his property to defraud his creditors, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Black, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Per Curiam. Appellant was convicted of the crime of fraudulent concealment of his property to defraud his creditors. The only points made on the appeal are insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict and newly-discovered evidence. No objection was made to the evidence offered by the prosecution, or to any ruling of the court, and it would be idle to say that the evidence introduced affords no warrant for the verdict. The alleged newly-discovered evidence is cumulative; and, moreover, it is quite apparent that, if it had been introduced at the trial, it would not have changed the result. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. March 22, 1892.)

GAMING—FARO—INDICTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—WITNESS—EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment charging that defendant "did deal, play, carry on, and conduct" the game of faro charges but one offense; Pen. Code, § 330, inflicting a penalty on "every person who deals, plays, or carries on, * * * or who conducts, * * * any game of faro," etc.

2. On trial for dealing, playing, etc., the game of faro, the court below properly refused to charge that "faro is a game played with a full deck of 52 cards."

3. It was error for the trial court, after charging that a mere preponderance of evidence was not sufficient to convict defendant, to add that "it is not required that the inculpatory facts shall be incompatible with the innocence of the accused," since, in order to convict an accused person, the facts proven must be inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of his innocence.

4. Where a witness, who saw defendant playing cards, testified that, before that time, he never saw the game of faro, and did not then know what the game was, and that all his knowledge on the subject was afterwards acquired from another person, it was error to permit him to testify that defendant was playing faro.

5. The book called "Modern Pocket Hoyle" is inadmissible as evidence of what constitutes the game of faro.

6. Dealing or conducting faro being forbidden by the Code, whether a banking game or not, an indictment therefor need not state that faro is a banking game.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; JOHN F. ELLINSON, Judge.

A. O. Gosset was convicted of dealing, playing, etc., the game of faro, and appeals. Reversed.

L. V. Hitchcock, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

MCFARLAND, J. Appellant was convicted of dealing, playing, etc., the game of faro, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. We do not think that the indictment charges more than one offense because it uses the words "did deal, play, carry on, and conduct" the said game.[1] "When a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately, or all together, may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count; for the reason that notwithstanding each act may, by itself, constitute the offense, all of them can do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense." People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 Pac. Rep. 106; People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 513; Ex parte McCarthy, 72 Cal. 384, 14 Pac. Rep. 96.

2. There was no error, under the circumstances of this case, in the refusal of the court to instruct the jury, at appellant's request, that "faro is a game played with a full deck of fifty-two cards." In the first place, there was no evidence that the game alleged to have been conducted by appellant was played with less than 52 cards; and therefore there was nothing in the case upon which to base the instruction. And, in the second place, when a prohibited game is played in all other respects in the usual way, and according to its established rules, the purpose of the law cannot be thwarted by the simple device of playing it with one or two cards less than the number usually employed. Otherwise no statute against a particular game would be of any value.

3. We see no objection to the instructions of the court to the jury except on the subject of reasonable doubt. The charge on that subject was generally correct and sufficient, because it employed language that has been repeatedly approved; but in one part of it the court, after telling the jury that a mere preponderance of evidence was not sufficient, said: "And, on the other hand, it is not required that the inculpatory facts shall be incompatible with the innocence of the accused." This was clearly erroneous. If the facts proven were compatible with the appellant's innocence, he should have been acquitted. It is a recognized principle of English and American law that, in order to convict a defendant, the facts proven must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of his guilt, but inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of his innocence. The only shadow of authority for the language used in the instruction which has been called to our attention is to be found in People v. Murray, 41 Cal. 66. In that case no such instruction had been given; but a very extreme instruction on the subject had been asked by the defendant, and had been refused, and the refusal was held not to have been erroneous. The instruction asked included the words "absolutely incompatible;" and the court seemed to think that these words "require proof of his guilt beyond the possibility of a doubt." The court says, however, in its opinion, that "the law requires that the facts shall not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion;" and it is difficult to see the difference between that language and the instruction asked by the defendant in that case, unless we view the court as attaching large significance to the word "absolutely." The opinion refers approvingly to People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 201, and People v. Dick, 32 Cal. 215; but in the Cronin Case only the general rule is expressed that the evidence must be "not only consistent with the guilt of the appellant, but inconsistent with any other rational conclusion;" and in the Dick Case the judgment was reversed because the trial court had refused to give instructions the exact opposite of the one given in the case at bar. With respect to instructions on this subject there is no substantial difference between "incompatible" and "inconsistent."

4. Stevenson, a witness for the prosecution, after having testified that he saw the defendant dealing a game of cards, was asked by the district attorney, "What

[1] Pen. Code, § 330, inflicts a penalty on "every person who deals, plays, or carries on, * * * or who conducts, * * * any game of faro," etc.

game was that?" Defendant's counsel asked that he be instructed not to answer unless he knew the game played, and the court denied the request. He was then asked "if at this time you know what game the defendant was then dealing;" and the defendant's objection having been overruled, and an exception taken, the witness answered, "He was playing faro." On the cross-examination the witness testified that at the time he saw the defendant playing he did not know what the game was, and that the only knowledge which he afterwards acquired on the subject had been gained from what a man told him. Thereupon appellant moved to strike out his testimony "upon the point of what game was being played, upon the ground that it was hearsay." The motion was denied, and appellant excepted. We think that the court erred in denying the motion. It appeared, further, that the witness had never seen faro played before the occasion referred to, and had never played it since. Leaving other considerations out of the question for the present, the testimony was pure hearsay, and there was nothing to make it an exception to the rule that hearsay testimony is not admissible. As the case, however, may be tried again, it is necessary to say something more as to the character of evidence admissible in this class of cases. We think that if a witness, of his own knowledge, knows what faro is, and saw a defendant dealing or conducting it, he may testify to the fact that he saw the defendant dealing faro,—leaving his knowledge on the subject to be tested by cross-examination. And, if he does not know what faro is, he may testify as to the acts which he saw defendant doing. But it is not admissible to allow one witness to testify that the acts testified to by another witness constituted the dealing or playing of faro. Nor can a witness be called for the sole purpose of defining or describing faro. If the jury are to be instructed as to what constitutes the crime charged, the instruction must come from the court. Of course, when a witness testifies that he saw a defendant playing faro, upon cross-examination his notion as to what faro is may be incidentally drawn out; but it is for the court to instruct the jury what constitutes the game charged to have been conducted. In People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 154, 22 Pac. Rep. 129,—the latest authority upon the subject,—this court says: "We do not concur in the view, however, that one witness can describe the game, and another be allowed to testify that, from that description, the game was a banking game, or any other. We think a person who knows the game may testify, in general, what the game he witnessed was. If not familiar with the game he may describe it, and the court should instruct the jury as to what constitutes the game charged to have been played, the jury to determine whether the game played was the one charged or not. To leave the question open to be proved in every case by experts would lead to great uncertainty in the administration of justice." In that case the offense charged was that of conducting a "banking game;" and, although a witness had been allowed to describe a banking game, this court judicially determined that his description was correct, and should have been given by the court as an instruction to the jury, and thereupon held that it "could have done the appellant no harm;" but it also held that the question was "one of law for the court."

5. Appellant's objections to the regularity of the formation of the grand jury were not sufficient basis for his motion to set aside the indictment or to strike it from the files.

6. The book called "Modern Pocket Hoyle" was not admissible in evidence; but, as we understand it, a page of that book, containing a pictorial representation of faro, was merely used as a diagram by which a witness illustrated his testimony. If that was clearly the only purpose for which it was used, there was probably no error committed; but no part of the book can be used as evidence, in itself, for what constitutes the game of faro. We see no other points requiring special notice. It may be remarked that the averment in the indictment that faro is a "banking game" was unnecessary. Faro, no doubt, is a banking game; but dealing or conducting it is an offense under the Code, whether a banking game or not. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

EJECTMENT—PARTIAL NONSUIT—RESTITUTION—VACATION OF ORDERS.

In ejectment against G. and the tenants of his grantee, T., plaintiff was nonsuited as to all but G., against whom there was judgment by default. Over seven years thereafter execution issued thereon without notice, and the sheriff, finding no one on the premises, formally delivered them to plaintiff. Thereafter, on an order requiring T.'s tenants to show cause, they, after being defended by T. as his tenants, were adjudged in contempt for re-entering, and an alias writ of restitution issued. Held that, it appearing that at the commencement of the action of ejectment T. was in possession, claiming under a deed from G., and there being no evidence of collusion between G. and T., the order granting execution should be set aside on application, and with it the order adjudging defendants in contempt, and granting an alias writ, the hearing on the matter of contempt being no bar to such application.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Ejectment by Henry C. Hyde, assignee of William Ford, in bankruptcy, against Robert Boyle and others. Plaintiff was nonsuited by all the defendants except Benjamin S. Green, and against him judgment was entered by default. Seven years later a writ of restitution was issued, and subsequently an alias writ was issued, and certain of defendants fined for contempt. Defendants appeal from an order overruling their motion to vacate the previous orders issuing the writs and fining certain of them for contempt. Order reversed.

Geo. H. Buck, for appellants. T. S. Osmont, for respondent.

Temple, C. In effect this case has already been before this court three times. The first—83 Cal. 83, 23 Pac. Rep. 126—was a petition asking this court to settle exceptions on the ground that the judge of the trial court refused to do so. This court held, after argument, that the defendants had the right to be heard on appeal, but they must compel the trial court to settle the statement if it refused, and could not ask this court to do so. The second time—86 Cal. 352, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059—was an application for leave to prove an exception, which, under the circumstances, this court declined to do. The last—89 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. Rep. 1092—was a motion to correct the bill of exceptions by striking out certain matters which appellants contended were not heard or considered in the court below. The court also refused this relief, but said: "We do not wish to be understood as holding that everything that is contained in a bill of exceptions is always to be considered by this court in reviewing the action of the court below. It may frequently happen that irrelevant matters are incorporated into the bill, and the bill itself may show upon its face that the matters therein recited were not presented to the court at the time it made its rulings, or could not have any weight in determining the correctness of such ruling. This court will consider only such matters as by the bill of exceptions itself purport to be pertinent, and to have been considered by the court below."

This appeal is from an order refusing to vacate two previous orders of the superior court; one made November 21, 1888, allowing a writ of restitution on a judgment in favor of Hyde as assignee of Ford v. Boyle et al., and one made March 11, 1889, adjudging certain of the defendants to be in contempt, and awarding an alias writ. The bill of exceptions, after giving a brief history of the case, proceeds to relate the facts in regard to the proceedings had in the matter of the contempt. It recites that proper affidavits were filed; that all of the parties appeared; that Thornton, who now claims to have been the owner, was a witness; and then proceeds to state what "the evidence adduced in said proceeding and upon said hearing showed," narrating the facts at considerable length, but not setting out the evidence from which the conclusions are drawn. It does not appear that any witnesses were sworn or testified at the hearing of the motion, from the refusal to grant which this appeal is taken, nor that the papers of proceedings in the contempt case were put in evidence, read, or in any way referred to. Rejecting that portion of the bill of exceptions which sets out facts not shown at the hearing or properly considered by the court in determining the motion, the case is greatly simplified. Most of the alleged facts upon which respondent relies disappear from the case. It then appears that on August 12, 1873, William Ford brought suit to recover the land in question against Robert Boyle, Benjamin S. Green, and five others. That all answered, through Tully R. Wise, as their attorney. That Henry C. Hyde, assignee in bankruptcy, was substituted for Ford as plaintiff. That prior to the commencement of the action Thornton had become the owner of the property through a conveyance from Green, and Ford, the plaintiff, knew that fact. That the defendants other than Green were tenants of Thornton, who, although not appearing as a party, defended the action in the name of his tenants. That upon the trial of the case Thornton succeeded in nonsuiting the plaintiff as to all his tenants. Upon the record it seems that the trial was between the plaintiff and all the defendants, but the nonsuit was not granted as to Green, but the trial then seems to have stopped. A few days after, upon suggestion that Green had not answered, judgment by default was rendered against him. This was August 22, 1881. November 21, 1881, on motion of Osmont, as plaintiff's attorney, although he was not the attorney of record, the court ordered an execution to issue on the judgment against Green. This order was made without notice to any one. The sheriff went upon the premises with the execution, and, finding no one there, and no personal property, formally delivered the same to Osmont. That one C. P. Robinson had acquired plaintiff's title to the property before the issuance of the execution, and Osmont acted in the matter as his representative. That on the 18th of January, 1889, upon the application of Robinson, claiming to be the successor in interest of plaintiff, supported by proper affidavits, an order was made requiring appellants, other than Thornton, to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt for wrongfully re-entering upon the premises after having been dispossessed by the sheriff, and an alias writ of restitution issued. That upon the hearing under that order appellant Thornton was a witness, and defended the other appellants as his tenants. That, after a full hearing, the court adjudged said parties to be guilty of a contempt in re-entering upon the premises, and awarded an alias writ.

It may be that respondent made a fatal mistake in not formally putting in evidence, upon the hearing of this motion, the same proofs which were heard in the matter of the contempt. Such evidence was not read or referred to, and, if it had been, it should have been brought up instead of the judge's conclusions from it. In re Moore, 78 Cal. 242, 20 Pac. Rep. 558; Hyde v. Boyle, 89 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. Rep. 1092. As the record stands, the orders must be reversed if the appeal is well taken, as seems to have been held in Hyde v. Thornton, 83 Cal. 83, 23 Pac. Rep. 126. Respondent contends that the proper remedy of appellants, if improperly ejected, would have been to ask the court to restore them to the possession. In this case appellants deny that they have been dispossessed under the writ, and on that point the proof was conflicting. The issues upon such an application would have been precisely the same, in all respects, as upon the motion actually made. We cannot see how respondent has been injured by the course adopted. It was a motion to set aside an order allowing an execution upon a judgment more than seven years after its rendition, made without notice to any one. Upon the hearing the court might properly consider such matters as should have been examined into before the original order was made. It is true the statute does not expressly require notice, but the court may, and generally should, require notice to the parties in possession before reviving an old judgment. The hearing upon the matter of the contempt is not a bar to the appellants' right to make this application. The court having found that the writ had been served, and that the appellants afterwards re-entered, properly adjudged them guilty of contempt, and this order for the alias writ followed as matter of course. If upon this application it should be determined that the first writ was improperly issued, all the consequences of that act should be corrected so far as possible. There is no real conflict upon the question whether Thornton was in possession at the time of the commencement of the action of ejectment. Osmont's affidavit shows upon its face that it purports to be hearsay testimony, and therefore not competent, while Thornton swears positively that he was in the exclusive, open, notorious, and peaceable possession, claiming the same in his own right, adversely to the whole world. That he had been the absolute owner and in possession since August 17, 1872. And the original plaintiff in the action of ejectment, after he brought that suit, and the defendants had appeared, but before the trial, to-wit, June 8, 1874, in a sworn complaint in an action brought against Thornton, states that Thornton, through his tenants, had been since August 2, 1872, in possession, receiving the rents, issues, and profits, and refused to deliver or surrender possession to him, Ford. From this complaint it appears that Green had been a pre-emptioner upon this land, and had purchased from the government, and had received a patent; that, intermediate the purchase and the patent, an execution had been levied upon the land, and plaintiff, Ford, claimed title under a sale made under this levy; that afterwards, upon the issuance of a patent, Green conveyed to Thornton, who had since been in possession. It here appears that Thornton has been claiming to own these lands. There may be collusion between himself and Green. The learned judge below, drawing upon his memory of the evidence in the matter of the contempt, so held; but there was no evidence of such collusion upon the hearing of this motion. We think the order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to vacate and set aside the previous orders referred to in appellants' motion.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to vacate and set aside the previous orders referred to in appellants' motion.

In re SWEET'S ESTATE. (No. 15,000.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF MOTION.

A motion to dismiss an appeal, on the ground that the transcript has not been filed within the time prescribed by the supreme court rules, will be denied, where the certificate of the clerk of the trial court on which such motion is based does not conform to supreme court rule 4.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

In the matter of the estate of Taatemi Sweet, deceased. On motion to dismiss an appeal from a decree of distribution. Motion denied.

Dunne & McPike, for appellant. Timothy J. Lyons and W. A. Stuart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a decree of distribution, upon the ground that the transcript has not been filed within the time prescribed by the rules of this court. A motion to dismiss an appeal upon this ground must be based upon a certificate of the clerk of the trial court, certifying the facts required by rule 4 of this court.[1] The certificate relied upon in this case does not meet the requirements of the rule. Let the motion to dismiss the appeal be denied without prejudice.

[1] Rule 4 requires the certificate to show the amount or character of the judgment, the date of its rendition, the fact and date of the filing of the notice of appeal, together with the date of service thereof on the adverse party, and the character of the evidence by which such service appears; the fact and date of filing and undertaking on appeal, and that the same is in due form; the fact and the time of the settlement of the bill of exceptions and the statement on appeal, if there be any; and also that the appellant has received a duly-certified transcript, or that he has not requested the clerk to certify to a correct transcript of the record, or, if he has made such request, that he has not paid the fees therefor, if the same have been demanded.

Patterson v. Munyan. (No. 13,631.)

Highways—Removing Encroaching Fence—Trespass—Estoppel.

1. In trespass for removing plaintiff's fence, defendant justified on the ground that he was acting as road overseer, and that the fence encroached on the highway. Defendant did not deny that plaintiff's land adjoined the road, wherever it was, but the location of the road was disputed. It appeared that the road, as opened by the proper authorities, and laid out on the ground so as to exhibit its actual locality as used by the public, and allowed to be so used for a number of years by the original owners, was always the same. It further appeared that this road, which was, at all events, by dedication and user, a public road, whether the proceedings by the authorities were legal or not, was the actual road, which plaintiff acknowledged as such, and along which he built the fence so as not to encroach. Held, that plaintiff showed that the fence was on his land, and not in the road.

2. Where the owners of land make no objection to its use for a public road, and it is used and traveled as such by the public for more than 10 years, the presumption is that it has been abandoned to the public, and it becomes a public highway, under Pol. Code, § 2618, which defines a public highway to be a road, etc., erected or laid out as such by the public, or, if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public.

3. Under Pol. Code, § 2619, which provides that a road thus created shall continue to exist until vacated by the board of supervisors, or by operation of law or a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, the line of a road being once established, even mistakenly, and the road thus located abandoned to the public, a road overseer cannot correct such mistake by taking down a fence built on the line so established.

4. Where a road is shown to be a public highway by dedication and user, it is not error to reject evidence as to what was done by the board of supervisors in attempting to establish it.

5. By receiving damages for opening a road a person is not estopped to consider the road as located the true public road, and to establish his fence accordingly, and hold the land inside it.

Watkins v. Lynch, 11 Pac. Rep. 808, 71 Cal. 26, distinguished.

Action by one Patterson against one Munyan to recover damages for a trespass in taking down plaintiff's fence. Judgment for plaintiff. New trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Huxley, S. P. Hall, and Geo. W. Read, for appellant. H. W. Philbrook, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass upon the land claimed by the plaintiff to be owned by him and in his possession. The plaintiff obtained judgment for one dollar and costs, from which, and an order refusing a new trial, defendant has appealed.

The first contention urged by appellant for the reversal of the judgment and order is that the burden of proof showing the location of the north-westerly line of a certain highway, (No. 520,) which was the boundary between the plaintiff's land and the highway, was thrown upon the plaintiff, and that he failed to make sufficient proof of that fact, and a nonsuit should have been granted, instead of being refused. Even if it be conceded, without deciding, that the burden of proving this boundary line was thrown upon the plaintiff, we think he has done so, and the nonsuit was properly denied. The wrongful act complained of was that the defendant had entered upon the plaintiff's premises, and had removed and destroyed a part of his fence. The defendant admitted that, as a road overseer, he had removed the fence, but justified his act on the ground that he was in the performance of an official duty in removing an obstruction which encroached upon a public highway. The vital question involved in the controversy is whether the land upon which the fence stood is within the public road, or without its limits. The evidence showed, as we think, sufficiently, that the road, as opened by the proper authorities of the county, and laid out on the ground so as to exhibit its actual locality as used by the public, and allowed so to be used for a great number of years by the original owners thereof, was always the same. It further appeared that this road, which was, at all events, by dedication and user, a public road, whether the proceedings had by the supervisors of the county to make it such were legal or not, was the actual road, which the plaintiff acknowledged as such, and built his fence so as not to encroach upon it. So that the claim made in the complaint that the plaintiff's land, in his possession, was intruded upon, is true. And that it is not in the road as laid out and used by the public is also true according to the evidence. And the allegation of the answer that the alleged trespass, as committed, was not on the plaintiff's premises, but in the road, was not proved. It is not denied by the defendant that the title of the plaintiff, and his rightful possession of the land set out in the complaint, existed as to all land which was not in the public road, and that his land came up to and adjoined this public road, wherever it was, upon the side thereof from which the fence was taken. So that if the proof showed that the land invaded was adjoining the public road, but not in or on it, as dedicated to and used by the public, no right existed, by means of which the defendant was justified in removing and destroying the fence. And the plaintiff, when he showed, as he did, where the public road was actually located on the ground, and dedicated and used as such without reference to any proceedings by the board of supervisors to locate and bound it, demonstrated, also, where the true boundary of the true road was, which carried with it the proof of the boundary of his land by that road.

No objections have ever been made by the owners of the land over which the road runs to the public use, and as it has been used and traveled by the public for more than 10 years the legal presumption is that the owners abandoned possession of the land for the road, and therefore the road established upon the land is the public highway. "Public highways," as defined by the Code, are "roads, streets, alleys, lanes, * * * laid out or erected as such by the public, or, if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public." Pol. Code, § 2618. "A highway thus created continues to exist until it is vacated or abandoned by order of the board of supervisors of the county in which it is situated, or by operation of law or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction." Babcock v. Welsh, 71 Cal. 402, 12 Pac. Rep. 337; Pol. Code, §§ 2619–2621. The line being once established, even through mistake, and the road thus located having been abandoned to and used by the public until it became the true public road, the board of supervisors had no authority, nor could the defendant correct that mistake in the way he endeavored to do, (Babcock v. Welsh, 71 Cal. 403, 12 Pac. Rep. 337,) and he became guilty of the trespass complained of. It makes no difference in this case whether the attempted establishment of the road by the board of supervisors, in the steps taken by the viewers and the surveyor under the act of 1862, (page 78,) were proper or not, although it seems to us that they were so irregular as to give the board no jurisdiction to establish it. Therefore, there was no error on the part of the trial court in refusing the admission of evidence as to what was done in the matter.

There was no need to find whether the plaintiff was estopped to deny the boundaries of the road as intended by the board of supervisors, by his receiving damages for the opening of the road. The road was opened and used, and became a public road where located on the ground, and it was no fault of his that the mistake was made in locating it. He was not estopped to consider the public road as located and used the true public road, and to establish his fence accordingly, and hold the land inside it. The evidence supported the findings, and the findings, as made, rendered any others unnecessary.

The facts of this case do not bring it within the rule laid down in Watkins v. Lynch, 71 Cal. 26, 11 Pac. Rep. 808. That was not a case where it was attempted to claim under the statute of limitations land outside of a road established by the user. It was a case where it was claimed that land inside of the dedicated line of the road, as used, might be claimed under the statute of limitations as being abandoned by the public. Nor is it attempted here to claim the land trespassed upon under that statute as having been abandoned; for it never was used by the public, but the road was established, dedicated, and used outside of its limits. By preference the public had used land as the road which did not include the plaintiff's land. As was said in Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 481, 13 Pac. Rep. 141: "Any right the public or the defendants may have had to use the land in dispute * * * was never availed of." The effort of the plaintiff here is not to claim any portion of the land which ever became a part of the public road. It is to obtain damages for a trespass on land in his rightful possession, which has never been dedicated, used, or established as part of the public road. The effort to devote this land to a public use, and the trespass committed, were unauthorized.

The answer of the defendant, as we read it, admitted the trespass if the land in dispute was not a part of the public road, and we have seen that it was not. Therefore, no evidence was necessary to establish the trespass, except that the plaintiff's land was the place from whence the fence was torn down, and not the public road. And, if evidence was improperly admitted as to any other part of the plaintiff's fences, it could have worked no prejudice, under the facts, findings, and judgment. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order refusing a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order refusing a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte LIDDELL. (No. 20,887.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—REFORM SCHOOL—TITLE OF ACT—VALIDITY—HABEAS CORPUS.

1. Act March 11, 1889, entitled "An act to establish a state reform school for juvenile offenders, and to make an appropriation therefor," and providing (section 16) for the committal to such school of "any boy or girl between the ages of ten and sixteen years who has been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or penitentiary," and, in cases of offense punishable by imprisonment in the county jail, giving the court discretion to commit the offender to the jail, does not violate Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title."

2. Act March 11, 1889, § 19, gives to the person accused the right to a private examination on the question whether he ought to be committed to the reform school, unless his parents demand a public trial. Held, where a boy of 15, having been convicted of petit larceny and sentenced to the reform school, sued out a writ of habeas corpus, and alleged in his petition therefor that he did not demand a public trial or waive a private examination, but did not state that he demanded a private examination, and it appeared that the trial court, after a plea of guilty was entered by the petitioner, heard testimony, and found that the petitioner was a suitable person to be committed to the reform school, that such adjudication was conclusive, as far as the proceeding on the writ of habeas corpus was concerned.

3. Although Act March 11, 1889, § 16, could have been enacted as an amendment to the Penal Code, the fact that it was not does not render it void.

4. The fact that an offender may be detained in the reform school for a longer period than he would be if sent to the penitentiary or county jail does not make the act unconstitutional.

In bank.

One Liddell, having been sent to the state reform school, sued out a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded to the reform school.

M. W. Conkling, for petitioner. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner, a boy of 15 years of age, was charged in the justices' court of Los Angeles City township with the crime of petit larceny, and, upon being arraigned, entered a plea of guilty as charged. Thereupon the court sentenced him to serve a term of one year in the Whittier reform school. It is claimed that the judgment is void—First, because the act upon which it is based is unconstitutional, the legislature having failed to express the subject of the act in the title thereof; and, second, because petitioner was not given a private examination on the question as to whether he ought to be committed to the reform school.

Section 24, art. 4, of the constitution, provides that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title." The act in question is entitled "An act to establish a state reform school for juvenile offenders, and to make an appropriation therefor."[1] Section 16 provides that any boy or girl between the ages of 10 and 16 years, who has been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment in the county jail or penitentiary, may be committed to the state reform shool for a term not less than one, nor more than five years; provided, however, that, if the crime be one punishable by imprisonment in the county jail, the court may, in its discretion, commit the offender to the county jail for the time authorized by law for the punishment of the offense.

1. It is not claimed that the act embraces more than one subject, but it is contended that the title of the act does not fully express the subject-matter. If we bear in mind the part which the titles of acts have played in the history of legislation, it will not be difficult to understand the purpose of the constitutional inhibition and mandate quoted above. In olden times legislative titles were unknown; bills were drawn in the form of petitions, which were entered upon the parliament rolls. At the end of each parliament the judges put them in the form of a statute, and in that form they were entered on the statute rolls. It was not until the reign of Henry VI. that bills in the form of acts, according to modern customs, were first introduced. When titles were first introduced there was a general one for all the acts passed in the session, but in the first year of Henry VIII. distinct titles were introduced for each chapter. Until a comparatively recent date, the title of an act in this country was regarded as no part of it; but, if the language of the act was ambiguous, the title might be considered in determining the intent of the legislators. At the present time, however, the constitutions of many states contain provisions similar to that quoted above. The object of the provision is to prevent legislative abuse; to prevent the passage of acts bearing deceitful and misleading titles. It is intended to protect the members of the legislature, as well as the public, against fraud; to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which give no intimation to the members of the legislature, or to the people, of the matters contained therein. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 169. At the time the provision referred to was incorporated into our constitution, similar language in the constitutions of other states had received judicial interpretation. If there were any discordance of judgment as to the meaning of the language, we might be justified in discussing the matter as an original proposition; but, as the courts have been practically unanimous in their views, it would be idle to go beyond the mere statement of what we understand to be the consensus of judicial opinion at the time the provision referred to was adopted in this state, for the legal presumption arises that the language was used with reference to the interpretation put upon it by the courts in other states. There was a similar provision in the constitution of 1863, and it was held here that it was merely directory, and did not nullify laws passed in violation of it; but the provisions of the constitution of 1879 "are mandatory and prohibitory, unless by express words they are declared to be otherwise."

In Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 229, 24 Pac. Rep. 383, we held it was not necessary that the title of the act should embrace an abstract of its contents. The cases cited therein show that such is the view taken by the courts of other states; and, on reflection, it must appear that this conclusion is based upon the soundest principles of constitutional construction. It certainly was not intended that the title should be a repetition of the provisions found in the body of the bill; the object was to prevent deception by the inclusion of matters incongruous with the subject specified in the title. If the title contains a reasonable intimation of the matters under legislative consideration, the public cannot complain. It has always been the custom to state the subject of a bill in general terms, and with the fewest words, and the framers of the constitution doubtless intended the legislature to conform to that custom. Mills v. Charleton, 29 Wis. 409; Bright v. McCullough, 27 Ind. 226; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 494. Numerous provisions, having one general object fairly indicated by the title, may be united. Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391. When the general purpose of the act is declared, the details provided for the accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents. So an act to incorporate a fireman's benevolent association may include provisions for levying a tax upon the income of a foreign insurance company for the benefit of the corporation, (Association v. Lounsbury, 21 Ill. 511;) and it is held in many cases that an act entitled, in general terms, an act to incorporate a certain town, may lawfully provide all means necessary for the government of the town, including taxation, courts, definition of misdemeanors, punishment of offenders, municipal improvements, etc. State v. Town of Union, 33 N. J. Law, 350; Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 172, note 1.

In applying these principles to the case before us, we find no ground for declaring the act unconstitutional. The title declares the act to be one for the establishment of a state reform school for juvenile offenders, and to make an appropriation therefor. It is not an act to erect a building in which a reform school is to be hereafter conducted, but it is an act to establish a school. There can be no school without pupils. It is not simply an act to establish a school, but a school for juvenile offenders. This is a clear indication of an intention to provide for an institution for a certain class of criminals, —children who have offended against the laws of the state. No one can be condemned without a hearing. The title of the act necessarily implies, therefore, that some officer or tribunal shall hear and determine the question whether certain persons charged with crime shall be committed to a reform school, or treated as ordinary juvenile offenders are treated under the penal laws of the state. Any person of ordinary intelligence, reading the title of the act in question, would naturally be led to the inquiry, what juvenile offenders may be sent to this school, under what circumstances may they be committed to this institution, and who is to determine whether or not they should be sent there?

The title of the act clearly shows what the legislature intended to accomplish, and the provisions referred to simply conduce to that object; they are auxiliary to and promotive of the main purpose of the act, and have a "necessary and natural connection" therewith. They are germane to the subject stated in the title of the act; there is no attempt to conceal the purpose or scope of the act, and no attempt in the act itself to blend diverse and independent subjects. It is admitted that the constitutional provision under consideration has always been given a liberal construction; and this must be so, because the constitution itself does not define the degree of particularity with which a title shall specify the subject of a bill. The matter must therefore be left largely to legislative discretion. Mills v. Carleton, supra; Hannibal v. Marion Co., 69 Mo. 576; State v. Ranson, 73 Mo. 86; People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 635; San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Board, 60 Cal 12. While it is the duty of the court to place such a construction upon this constitutional provision as will prevent mischievous and vicious legislation, we should guard against such a rigorous interpretation of the language as will impale upon its sharp points the good with the bad. The cases cited by the petitioner do not support his contention. The Colorado case, upon which he places his chief reliance, is clearly distinguishable from the case before us. The title of the act under consideration in that case stated that it was an act "to provide for the maintenance, government, and police of the penitentiary, also the mode of appointing officers, and fixing the salary of the same, and to repeal several acts relating thereto," while the act itself made "certain offenses felonies punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, that otherwise would be considered and punished as misdemeanors." The court properly held that the act dealt with a subject not expressed in the title. At the time of the passage of the act the penitentiary was in existence, and a reading of the title at once induces the conclusion that the various provisions of the act relate alone to the preservation of the building, management of the institution, and the pay of the officers. Brooks v. People, (Colo. Sup.) 24 Pac. Rep. 553.

2. Section 19 of the act gives to the person accused the right to a private examination on the question whether he ought to be committed to the reform school, unless his parent demands a public trial. The matters to be inquired into are collateral to the main issue of guilt or innocence. Either before or after conviction the court may inquire as to the habits and disposition of the defendant, and determine whether he is a fit person to be committed to the school. The inquiry can be made before conviction only with the consent of the accused, (section 18;) but after conviction it is the duty of the court to hear testimony upon the question, (St. 1889, p. 116.) It does not follow, however, that a failure to give the defendant a private examination or public trial will render the judgment void. It is mere error which can be corrected on appeal. The petitioner alleges that he did not demand a public trial and did not waive a private examination, but it is not alleged that he demanded a private examination. It appears upon the face of the judgment, however, that the court did hear testimony after the defendant had entered his plea of guilty, and found that the petitioner was "a suitable person to be committed to the instruction and discipline of the reform school for juvenile offenders at Whittier," and this adjudication is conclusive so far as this proceeding is concerned.

3. We think there is no merit in the contention that section 16 is void, because not made a part of the Penal Code. It is true it could have been enacted as an amendment to the Code, and perhaps it would have been more consistent with our system of codification if it had been, but we know of no provision which requires penal statutes to be made a part of the Code.

4. Counsel for petitioner cites section 1388 of the Penal Code, but it does not clearly appear for what purpose it is cited. If there be any conflict between that section and the act under consideration, the latter must prevail. There can be no question as to the power of the legislature to provide for the detention and education of juvenile offenders, as it has done in this act; and the provisions of the act are not obnoxious to the criticism that it prescribes unjust or unequal penalties. It is true the term of detention at the reform school may be made greater by the judgment of the court than the term of imprisonment in the county jail or in the state-prison for the same offense would be, but it cannot be said that the punishment inflicted is greater than could be put upon an adult for the same offense. The object of the act is not punishment, but reformation, discipline, and education. Section 12. While detained for a longer period, perhaps, than he would be if sent to state-prison or the county jail, the conditions surrounding the child are vastly different. He is given the opportunity and instruction to learn a trade, and qualify himself for the duties of citizenship, so that at the end of his term he will go out prepared to take care of himself, and those dependent upon him, without the odium which attaches to an ex-convict. There is no doubt of the power of the state to make and enforce provisions for the compulsory education of all children within the state; and it is equally clear that the state may arrest the downward tendency of those who have offended against its laws, and manifested a disposition to follow a criminal career, by placing them in an institution where they will receive the care, education, and discipline necessary to prepare them for honorable citizenship. The records of the penal institutions of this state show that a large majority of their inmates are young men,—many of them juveniles. The legislature, in its wisdom, has endeavored to provide a place for children manifesting criminal traits, where they can be cared for without being thrown under the baneful influence of veterans in crime. We think the policy of the act a wise one, and we see no constitutional grounds for declaring it invalid. It is ordered, therefore, that the writ be discharged, and that the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the officers of the reform school.

BRONZAN v. DROBAZ. (No. 13,547.)

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—PLEADING—JURISDICTION—EVIDENCE—RES JUDICATA.

1. In an action on a judgment, a complaint stating that such judgment was duly "given and made," and that no part of it has been paid, is sufficient.

2. Where the judgment roll offered in evidence shows that the action was commenced against a corporation; that defendant was there required, in proceedings supplementary to execution, to appear before a referee, and answer concerning property in his possession belonging to the corporation, which defendant did; that the referee found that he was indebted to the corporation in a certain sum; and that the court confirmed the report, and adjudged that the money be paid to plaintiff,—it does not appear on the face of the roll that the court did not have jurisdiction.

3. Though defendant was not a party to the orginal action against the corporation, the fact that copies of the order requiring him to appear before the referee, and of the affidavit on which it was based, were served on him, and in obedience thereto he appeared and was examined, sufficiently shows that the court had jurisdiction of defendant's person in the supplementary proceedings.

4. The report of the referee that defendan owed the corporation a certain sum, and the con firmation thereof by the court, constitutes a judgment which cannot be assailed collaterally.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by John Bronzan against Matteo Drobaz to recover the amount of a judgment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan and Herbert Choynski, for appellant. A. F. Morrison and O'Brien & Daingerfield, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 27th day of October, 1887, the plaintiff herein recovered a judgment in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the Gold Lead Gold & Silver Mining Company, a corporation, for the sum of $1,271.95, and $18 costs of suit. On this judgment an execution was issued, and returned unsatisfied. The return states that the execution was duly levied upon "all moneys, goods, credits, effects, debts due or owing, or any other personal property in possession or under control of Matteo Drobaz, belonging to the defendant named in said writ." Thereafter, under and in pursuance of the provisions of section 717 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an order was made by the judge of the court requiring Drobaz to appear, at a specified time and place, before a referee appointed for the purpose, to answer concerning the property in his possession belonging to the defendant. At the time and place named Drobaz appeared, with his attorney, before the referee and was examined. As the result of the examination the referee found and reported to the court that Drobaz had in his possession $217.26, which he admitted was the property of the defendant corporation, and also that he had in his possession $128 and $55, moneys of the corporation, which he claimed had been paid out and expended for the corporation, but that this claim was sham, and not made in good faith. Wherefore it was ordered that Drobaz apply $400.26—the aggregate of the said sums—towards the satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment in the action. Subsequently an order was made by the court requiring Drobaz to appear at its courtroom at a time named, "to show cause, if any he have, why said report and order should not be confirmed and approved by the court; and also why he should not pay plaintiff's costs, amounting to $58.60, incurred in these proceedings." At the time appointed the parties appeared by their attorneys, and, after argument and consideration, it was by the court, on March 9, 1888, "ordered and adjudged that said report and order of said referee, as filed in this court on the 24th day of January, 1888, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed and approved in all respects, and that the said Matteo Drobaz do pay to the said plaintiff the sum of $400.26, to be applied towards the satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment herein, as ordered by said referee. It is also ordered that the application of plaintiff, as regards the payment of said costs by said defendant, be denied." On June 7, 1888, the plaintiff commenced this action, and in his complaint averred that, by the proceedings supplementary to the execution in the action before mentioned, "a judgment was duly given and made in favor of plaintiff, and against said Matteo Drobaz, defendant herein, for four hundred ($400) dollars principal, and fifty-eight and fifty hundredths ($58.50) dollars costs, and that no part of said judgment has ever been paid." Wherefore he prayed judgment against the defendant Drobaz for $458.50, with interest and costs. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and then answered by a general denial. At the trial the plaintiff was permitted against the objections of defendant to introduce in evidence the judgment roll in his action against the Gold Lead Gold & Silver Mining Company, the execution issued on the judgment and the sheriff's return thereon, and all the proceedings supplementary to the execution. And when the plaintiff rested the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that, "upon the face of the judgment roll offered in evidence, it appears that the court had no jurisdiction to make any order, and, in particular, that Drobaz was not indebted to the corporation in the sum of $400.26." The motion was denied, and an exception reserved. The defendant was then called as a witness in his own behalf, and was asked by his counsel: "Now, at the time that you were examined as a garnishee, as a man that owed some money, or was said to owe some money, to this Gold Lead Mining Company, did you owe the company anything, Mr. Drobaz?" And also· "Did you ever get a summons and complaint, or any papers in the other case?" Both questions were objected to as irrelevant and immaterial, and the objections were sustained, and exceptions taken. The case was then submitted, and the court made its findings, and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. From this judgment and an order denying him a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. Appellant contends that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the court, therefore, erred in overruling his demurrer. We think the complaint sufficient and the ruling proper. The complaint stated that the judgment sued upon was "duly given and made," and that no part of it had been paid. It was not necessary to state that no appeal had been taken from the judgment, nor that the plaintiff was authorized by an order of court to institute the action.

2. Appellant also contends that his motion for nonsuit should have been granted, because the proofs introduced were wholly insufficient to authorize a decision in favor of the plaintiff. The only ground on which this ruling can be reviewed is that specifically stated when the motion was made. Other grounds cannot now be considered. Raimond v. Eldridge, 43 Cal. 508; Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 608; Loring v. Stuart, 79 Cal. 201, 21 Pac. Rep. 651; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 261, 22 Pac. Rep. 195. We do not think it appears on the face of the judgment roll offered in evidence that the court had no jurisdiction to make any order, nor that Drobaz was not indebted to the corporation in the sum of $400.26. The referee found that Drobaz was indebted to the corporation in the sum named, and the court approved and confirmed the report, and adjudged that the money be paid over to the plaintiff. Surely the court had jurisdiction to make the order, and the most that can be said of its action is that it was erroneous. The order was the final determination of the rights of the parties in the proceeding, and it, in effect, constituted a judgment, (section 577, Code Civil Proc.,) on which an execution might have been issued, (section 1007, Id.,) and from which an appeal might have been taken, (section 963, Id.)

3. It is further contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings, and that a new trial should have been granted for that reason. The specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence are as follows: "(1) The evidence shows that the court had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, Drobaz, in the action of Bronzan v. Gold Lead Gold & Silver Min. Co., and proceedings thereto supplementary to execution. (2) There is no evidence to show that Drobaz was indebted to said corporation in the sum of $400.26, or any sum whatever. (3) There is no evidence to show that Drobaz was ever served with any process whatever to give the court jurisdiction in the case of Bronzan v. Gold Lead Gold & Silver Min. Co." The appellant was not a party to the original action against the mining company, and it was not necessary that any process issued therein be served on him. It was shown, however, that copies of the order, and of the affidavit on which it was based, requiring appellant to appear for examination before the referee, were duly served upon him, and that in obedience thereto he did appear and was examined. This was certainly sufficient to show that the court had jurisdiction of his person in the supplementary proceedings. There was also evidence to show that appellant was indebted to the corporation in the sum of $400.26; for, as we have seen, the report of the referee, and the confirmation thereof by the court, amounted to a final determination that such indebtedness existed, and, in effect, constituted a judgment, which cannot be assailed here collaterally. The finding, however, of the court below was that the referee "made and filed his report on said order of examination, and regularly ordered defendant to apply to the satisfaction of the aforesaid judgment against said corporation the sum of $458.50, which sum was found by said referee to be owing from said defendant to said corporation, and that "said report was regularly confirmed in all respects by an order duly given and made by this court in said action." This finding as to the $58.50, which was claimed as costs, was evidently not justified by the evidence; for the reason that the plaintiff's application to be allowed that sum for costs incurred in the proceedings was denied by the court in its order of confirmation. It is objected for respondent that the specification is not sufficient to raise this point, but we think it is.

4. The point is made that the plaintiff's evidence was all irrelevant and immaterial, and that the court erred in admitting it. We see no error in the rulings complained of. It is further suggested that the findings do not cover all the issues raised by the pleadings, but we think them sufficient in that respect. It follows, in our opinion, that the judgment should be modified by striking therefrom the sum of $58.50, and as thus modified it should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment will be modified as therein indicated, and as so modified will stand affirmed.

FAIVRE v. DALEY. (No. 14,400.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1892.)

CONVEYANCE OF HOMESTEAD—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

1. A quitclaim deed is a "grant," within the meaning of Civil Code, § 1243, providing that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment or a "grant" thereof, executed by the husband and wife.

2. A grant, bargain, and sale deed of certain land contained the following clause: "This conveyance is intended to reconvey and release only such title as the parties of the first part obtained to such premises by virtue of a deed from the parties of the second part to the parties of the first part." Held, that such clause should not be construed to be repugnant to the grant, and therefore void, as the manifest intention of the parties would thereby be defeated.

3. A husband and wife conveyed by a quitclaim deed the land in which they had a homestead estate to plaintiff, who conveyed his right of title and interest in such land to defendant under an agreement that the latter should protect plaintiff's title, perfect it if necessary, and sell the land for plaintiff. Thereafter defendant procured a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the land to himself from plaintiff's grantors, and then sold the land. Held that, in an action to recover the proceeds of the sale in the hands of defendant, testimony by the grantees of defendant that they relied on the deed to defendant from plaintiff's grantors was immaterial.

4. In such case, plaintiff testified as follows: "He [defendant] agreed to give me one-half. I told him I would give him one-half what he got." And defendant testified that he agreed to give plaintiff one-half of whatever he recovered under the deed, that plaintiff was to give him the land, and that he was to divide the receipts with plaintiff. Held, that such evidence was sufficient to support a finding that defendant was to pay all costs incurred in the recovery, sale, or disposal of the land.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by Faivre against Daley for money had and received. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. John M. Lucas, (Johnstone Jones and J. E. Deakin, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. George D. Carleton, a married man, became the owner of the property referred to in the complaint on January 11, 1868, and on July 7, 1868, he filed a homestead thereon. On April 8, 1870, Carleton executed and delivered to A. E. Horton a deed of conveyance of the property; and thereafter Horton's interest, if he acquired any, passed through mesne conveyances to S. S. Clark. The trustees of Clark's estate executed and delivered a deed of the land—grant, bargain, and sale in form—to plaintiff, on June 22, 1885; the consideration named being $7,087. On July 8, 1885, Carleton and wife executed and delivered to plaintiff and Pauly a quitclaim deed of the property. On March 1, 1886, plaintiff and Pauly executed and delivered to the Clark trustees a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the land, but the deed contained the following clause: "This conveyance is intended to reconvey and release only such title as the parties of the first part obtained to said premises by virtue of a deed from the parties of the second part to the parties of the first part." On March 18, 1886, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement by the terms of which, it is alleged and found, defendant was to "sell and dispose of any part or all of the interest of the plaintiff in and to said lands and premises, and if necessary, at his own cost and expense, to bring suits in law or equity to recover any part or all of said interest which the said plaintiff had in the said lands, * * * and to do and cause to be done whatever he, the said Thomas J. Daley, should deem just and proper for the purpose of selling or disposing of said interest of plaintiff as aforesaid; * * * the said defendant to pay all costs and expenses which might be incurred in or about the recovery, sale, or disposal of said lands," and was to receive one-half of all moneys obtained from the sale, the other half to be paid to plaintiff. Notwithstanding the conveyance to plaintiff and Pauly of July 8th, Carleton and wife executed and delivered a grant, bargain, and sale deed of the premises to the defendant on June 30, 1886. On October 5, 1886, the Clark trustees also executed and delivered a deed of the land to one Hensley. Hensley afterwards conveyed certain interests to Platt, Morrill, Bates, and Parrish. The defendant on February 7, 1887, quitclaimed the larger part of the land to Platt, who took the conveyance, however, for the benefit of himself and the other persons last named. On April 2, 1887, defendant conveyed another portion of the land to McLaren. The remaining portion he sold to Wilde and Frink.

This action was commenced on April 30, 1888, to recover one-half of the sums of money received by defendant,—$5,450. Although the evidence is undisputed that defendant received from Platt the sum of $10,000 for the deed of February 7th, and $400 for the deed to McLaren of April 2d, the court found that the defendant had sold plaintiff's interest in that portion of the land purchased by Platt for the sum of $5,000, and his interest in that portion sold to McLaren for the sum of $400. It is a singular fact, too, that although the court found defendant was "at his own cost and expense to bring suits, * * * and to pay all costs and expenses which might be incurred in or about the recovery, sale, or disposal of said lands," and that all money obtained from the sale was to be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant, $562.50 was allowed the defendant as costs incurred by him in making the sale and conveyance. Plaintiff was given judgment for only $2,418.75, (that being one-half of the balance remaining after deducting $562.50 from $5,400,) and interest at 7 per cent. from August 2, 1887. Defendant moved for a new trial, and the motion was denied. From this order and the judgment, he has appealed. The court made no finding as to the interest purchased by Wilde and Frink, but the evidence shows that the plaintiff had parted with his interest in the land sold to them before he made the deed to defendant.

It is claimed by appellant that plaintiff acquired no interest in the land through the quitclaim deed received from Carleton and wife, and, if he did, such interest was conveyed by him to the Clark trustees by the deed of March 1, 1886, and therefore the defendant took nothing by the plaintiff's deed of March 18, 1886. Conceding that the defendant, although his contract with plaintiff has not been rescinded, is not estopped from setting up these defenses, we think there is no merit in either contention. Section 1243, Civil Code, upon which appellant relies, provides that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment or a grant thereof, executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife, but the word "grant" is here used in its generic, not its technical, sense, and as so used is a term applicable to all transfers of real estate. Section 1053, Civil Code, says that "a transfer in writing is called a 'grant,' or 'conveyance,' or 'bill of sale.'" Washburn says that "though the word 'grant' was originally made use of in treating of conveyances of interests in lands, to denote a transfer by deed of that which could not be passed by livery, and, of course, was applied only to incorporeal hereditaments, it has now become a generic term, applicable to the transfers of all classes of real property, and will be used in that broad sense in speaking of the formal transfer of titles to lands. * * * Wood, in his treatise on Conveyancing, says: 'The word "grant," taken largely, is where anything is granted or passed from one to another; and in this sense it comprehends feoffments, bargains, and sales, gifts, leases in writing or by deed, and sometimes by word without writing.'" 3 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) pp. 193, 375. A statute of New Jersey provided that it should be lawful for any married female to receive, "by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, and hold to her sole and separate use, as if she were a single female, real and personal property;" and the court held that the legislature did not intend to use the terms "gift" or "grant" in their technical sense, but to embrace within the meaning of the terms used all the modes of acquiring property, except perhaps by descent. The court said: "The Vermont statute provides that any rights in real estate which a feme covert may acquire by gift, grant, devise, or inheritance, during coverture, shall not be liable for the debts of the husband. These words, 'gift' or 'grant,' came up for construction in the case of Peck v. Walton, 26 Vt. 85, wherein REDFIELD, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: 'It is very apparent that the statute was intended to embrace all rights in real estate which the wife shall acquire during coverture. It would be a very nice, and, as it appears to me, a very unintelligible, construction of this statute, to limit the word "grant" to its narrowest technical import. It evidently was intended to apply to all conveyances by deed which were not gifts.' In our statute, by the term 'grant,' the legislature intended all the ordinary modes of acquiring property by deed, whether operating by force of the statute of uses or not, that by long usage such had become not only the popular but also the technical meaning of the term." Ross v. Adams, 28 N. J. Law, 165. In Durant v. Ritchie, 4 Mason, 69, the court said: "The word 'grant' is nomen generalissimum. It includes all sorts of conveyances." In Wisconsin the statute provides that a married woman "may receive by inheritance, or by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, from any person other than her husband, and hold to her sole and separate use, real and personal property." It was claimed in McVey v. Railroad Co., that the statute did not permit a wife to acquire real estate by deed of bargain and sale, and hold the same as her separate property. Mr. Justice LYON, speaking for the court, said: "But the word 'grant' has also a larger meaning in the law. It is said in Shepard's Touchstone that 'this word is taken largely where anything is granted or passes from one to another. And in this sense it doth comprehend feoffments, bargains and sales, gifts, leases, charges, and the like; for he that doth give or sell doth grant also.' * * * Hence, in any view we can take of the question, we are impelled to the conclusion that the word 'grant,' as used in the statute, includes deeds of bargain and sale." 42 Wis. 536. It is admitted that Carleton was the owner of the property at the time the declaration of homestead was filed; and, as a quitclaim deed in this state passes all the title which the grantor has, (Lawrence v. Ballou, 37 Cal. 518,) we think the deed from Carleton and wife to plaintiff was a grant, within the meaning of section 1243, Civil Code, which operated as an abandonment of their homestead right, and that it conveyed to plaintiff all the interest they had in the property.

The other point made by appellant is equally untenable. There is no doubt that, where the language in the habendum is irreconcilable with that used in the premises, the premises will prevail; but, like the words in a contract, all the words employed in the deed should be given some effect, if possible, and if consistent with the evident purpose and operation of the deed. Havens v. Dale, 18 Cal. 366. There can be no possible question as to what the parties to the deed of March 1st intended. The word 'grant,' as used in deeds, has a well-known signification; but the parties may limit or qualify its meaning, and if they choose to do so the court should not hesitate to carry out their expressed intention. Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344; Castro v. Tennent, 44 Cal. 253 The language used in the deed is so plain and unambiguous that the intention of the parties appears upon the face of the instrument; but, if the circumstances surrounding the transaction can be considered, their intention becomes still more obvious. The Clark trustees were dissatisfied, and had commenced, or threatened to commence, an action to set aside their conveyance to the plaintiff. The grounds of their dissatisfaction do not appear, but plaintiff testified: "They didn't think we paid enough. We deeded it back to them, and they gave us our money back. We rescinded the contract." They doubtless believed that the plaintiff and Pauly had no title to the property at the time he attempted to convey to them. Plaintiff had paid them $7,087. This sum they repaid to him, and agreed that they (plaintiff and Pauly) should reconvey to them only such interest in the property as they had acquired through the deed of June 22, 1885. All of the parties to the deed evidently desired to be placed in exactly the same position they held with respect to the property before the Clark trustees conveyed to plaintiff and Pauly. If we hold that the clause quoted above is repugnant to the grant, and therefore void, we defeat the manifest intention of all the parties; and this can be done only by the application of "subtle and unsubstantial definitions, and technical and arbitrary rules." Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Cal. 51. It is impossible to lay down an invariable and universal rule of construction. The tendency of modern decisions is to uphold conveyances, and give effect to the intention of the parties, regardless of technical rules of construction. As illustrating this tendency, Mr. Devlin cites and quotes from many cases. 2 Dev. Deeds, § 855. If our views of the case thus far expressed are correct, the remaining topics discussed in the briefs require no extended consideration.

The court did not err in refusing to consider the testimony of Platt and others to the effect that they purchased, relying upon the title which defendant had acquired through his grant from Carleton and wife. Defendant entered into the contract with plaintiff, and took as a thing of value what title the latter held with full knowledge of all the facts. Upon the strength of his agreement to protect the title of the plaintiff, and to perfect it if necessary, the plaintiff conveyed to him all his right, title, and interest in the property, and went to Europe, trusting in the defendant to carry out his agreement in good faith. It was the duty of the defendant to protect the title which he had acquired, and make the most out of it. As a matter of fact, he paid Carleton and his wife only $50 for their deed. That deed conveyed to him no interest whatever; but, if it had, the defendant would have been bound to account to the plaintiff for it. Hardenbergh v. Bacon, 33 Cal. 377. It is immaterial what the purchasers thought they were buying. The material question is, what did the defendant convey? The only title he acquired from any source was that which he derived through the deed from plaintiff, and that is what he conveyed. The fact that Pauly gave his interest away has no bearing upon the question.

It is claimed by appellant that there is no evidence to support the second and third findings of the court,—nothing to show, at least, that he agreed with plaintiff to pay all costs and expenses which might be incurred in or about the recovery, sale, or disposal of the lands,—and that the court erred, therefore, in not deducting from the amount received by defendant the sum of $1,000 paid to an attorney for advice and assistance. The advice and assistance referred to consisted in an attempt to show that the plaintiff had no interest whatsoever in the land. We do not know upon what theory the court below deducted the sum of $562.50, and refused to allow the defendant anything on account of the attorney fee, unless it was that plaintiff ought not to be charged for advice which was adverse to his title. We think the finding as to costs is supported by evidence. The plaintiff testified as follows: "He agreed to give me one-half. * * * I told him I would give him one-half what he got. He was to get half, and I was to get half. * * * He first told me in San Francisco,—he said, 'You have made $10,000 out of that transaction.'" This last statement the defendant did not deny. The defendant testified as follows: "I agreed to give him one-half of whatever I recovered under that deed. * * * Question. He agreed to give it to you, and you were to divide the receipts, wasn't it? Answer. I think it was." The fact that plaintiff was willing to allow the defendant 50 per cent. of the amount recovered should be considered, also, in determining the question as to whether the defendant agreed to pay the costs and expenses. It is true the defendant testified that the plaintiff agreed to pay one-half of the expenses, but the evidence was conflicting. The court found in favor of the plaintiff, and that finding cannot be disturbed here. But, whether the finding is supported by the evidence or not, the failure of the court to allow defendant $1,000 on account of attorneys' fees was immaterial, in view of the evidence as to the total amount received by defendant. It is undisputed that the defendant received $10,400 for the two deeds. Assuming, therefore, that appellant is right in his contention as to costs, $1,562.50 should have been deducted from that sum, and the balance divided equally between the plaintiff and the defendant. This would have given the plaintiff a judgment for $4,418.75, instead of $2,418.75. As stated before, the only interest which the defendant held was that which he acquired from the plaintiff, and that is what he sold. The judgment was clearly for less than the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the defendant was not prejudiced by the failure of the court to deduct the $1,000 paid his attorney, conceding that he was entitled to a credit on that account. We think the court below properly computed interest on the amount found due from August 2, 1887. Plaintiff testified that on August 2, 1887, he went to the defendant's office, and inquired about the $20,000; that the defendant said: "Ain't $10,000 enough? I will pay you the money next week." But, whether interest was allowable or not, for the reasons stated in the last paragraph the defendant was not prejudiced by the amount of interest included in the judgment.

It is claimed by appellant that the present action for money had and received will not lie, an accounting being necessary between the parties. The complaint, however, sets forth all the facts upon which the plaintiff relies, and it is apparent from the evidence that no accounting was necessary. If an accounting had been necessary, the court below, doubtless, would have ordered it taken.

There is no merit in the appellant's claim that the transaction was between Faivre and the firm of which the defendant was a member. The other members of the firm testified that they had no interest whatever in the contract,—that the firm had nothing whatever to do with it,—and plaintiff testified that the defendant gave him no information that Gassen & Reed were concerned in the matter until after the sale was made. Judgment and order affirmed.

MOULTON v. McDERMOTT. (No. 13,930.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 24, 1892.)

INJUNCTION—RESTRAINING WRIT OF POSSESSION AGAINST THIRD PARTIES.

Where plaintiff in ejectment had judgment on the ground that defendant, who was then tenant under one E., entered into possession as tenant under plaintiff, and was therefore estopped to deny plaintiff's title, a writ of possession against E. on the judgment will be restrained; E.'s title not having been adjudicated.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Ejectment by Mary S. Moulton against Mary Ann McDermott. Plaintiff had judgment, and Fanny McElhinny obtained an order restraining the execution of the judgment, claiming a superior title to the premises, which was not concluded by plaintiff's judgment. From the restraining order, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Powell, J. G. Maguire, and J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. Geo. D. Collins, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The appeal taken herein is from an order perpetually restraining the sheriff from executing a writ of possession issuing under a judgment in ejectment. The action was for the purpose of recovering possession of certain premises from Mary Ann McDermott and certain defendants. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff, but when the writ of possession involved here was issued the defendant in the action was dead, and Fanny McElhinny, who was not a party to the original action in ejectment, was in possession, by her tenant, of the premises, and upon her application the court below enjoined the sheriff from interfering with her under the writ. The plaintiff in the action above alluded to contends that Mrs. McElhinny was so connected with the original action, although not a formal party thereto, that she ought to be held concluded by the judgment therein rendered, and therefore subject to be removed from possession of the premises under the present writ of possession. The defendant Mrs. McDermott set up in her answer in the original suit that she was the tenant in possession of John McElhinny, the husband of the party now in possession, Mrs. McElhinny, who now claims to be the owner of the property in dispute, and seised in fee thereof, and that her grantor was one John McElhinny.

The plaintiff failed to show any title in herself as declared by the court, but under the instructions of that tribunal the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, because of the fact that Mrs. McDermott, the defendant, having entered under the plaintiff as tenant, was estopped to deny the plaintiff's title, under whose license the defendant entered. In the same connection the court charged that, if this question of estoppel was out of the way, the plaintiff's title would be of no avail as against the right or title of Mrs. McElhinny, under whom also the defendant claimed. So, in effect, the case went off on the question of estoppel, and did not determine anything adverse to the right of possession of Mrs. McElhinny, the party in whose favor the court below made its restraining order. In other words, Mrs. McElhinny, although endeavoring to have the defendant prevail, as her tenant, under a title superior to that of the plaintiff, did not have the advantage of this superior right or title, because the jury, under the instructions of the court, were bound to find that Mrs. McDermott had entered under the plaintiff, and was estopped to defend her possession under the superior right of Mrs. McElhinny. As the case stands, this individual, although not an actual party to the record, is sought to be put out of possession by one having an inferior title to hers, because it is claimed that Mrs. McElhinny, by assisting the defendant in the action, is concluded by the judgment. She is concluded, as we think, only so far that she cannot say that Mrs. McDermott was her tenant; but she, being now in possession in her own right and adverse to the plaintiff, is not concluded from setting up as a shield her superior title, which has never been passed upon. To say otherwise would be to pervert a just rule which the plaintiff and appellant invokes. The plaintiff below contended, and prevailed in the contention, that Mrs. McDermott was not the tenant of Mrs. McElhinny. If we understand her position now, it is that Mrs. McElhinny claimed possession under her tenant, Mrs. McDermott, when the action was brought, and is therefore liable to be turned out. But the plaintiff must stand on the position she took and maintained, that Mrs. McDermott was her tenant, not that of Mrs. McElhinny, and must give back possession as such tenant, and is estopped to set up any superior title of Mrs. McElhinny. But we do not think that Mrs. McElhinny, who has been adjudged not to be the landlady of Mrs. McDermott, should be cut off from defending her possession under a superior title, which has never been judicially passed upon as between her or her tenant and the plaintiff. The authorities cited by the appellant do not go so far as to conclude one's superior title, when no opportunity has been had to have it passed on, and where the court has actually told the jury that, if the tenant is not estopped to set it up, it is the better title and should prevail. Mrs. McElhinny has a right in this proceeding to show that her possession is not under Mrs. McDermott, but in virtue of a paramount title, as it was declared she had by the trial court in the original action. See Long v. Morton, 2 A. K. Marsh. 39, cited in Sampson v. Ohleyer, 22 Cal. 207. Mrs. McElhinny is not the assignee in any way of Mrs. McDermott, who is dead. She is holding for herself by virtue of an independent, adverse, and paramount title to that of the plaintiff, whose tenant is dead. The judgment was based upon the fact that Mrs. McDermott was not the tenant of Mrs. McElhinny or her grantor, Mr. McElhinny, but that she was the tenant of the plaintiff. If that is so, then the possession of Mrs. McElhinny, upon the plaintiff's theory and contention, must be independent of the tenant, Mrs. McDermott, and her landlady, the plaintiff, and, as the record shows, under a superior right to that of the plaintiff.

Under the circumstances of this case, we think the trial court is not shown to be guilty of an abuse of discretion, and was justified in its ruling, as the distinct title of Mrs. McElhinny has not been tried in the action of ejectment. See Hickman v. Dale, 7 Yerg. 148, cited in Sampson v. Ohleyer, 22 Cal. 207. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

Kendrick et al. v. Diamond Creek Consolidated Gold Min. Co. et al. (No. 14,479.)

Action against Association—Change of Venue.

An "association," though not invested with corporate powers, is within Const. art. 12, § 16, which provides that a "corporation or association" may be sued in the county where the cause of action accrues; and in an action brought against a mining company in the county where the alleged injury occurred, it is no objection to the venue that the complaint does not show that the company has corporate powers.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by James Kendrick and Alice Kendrick against the Diamond Creek Consolidated Gold Mining Company and Oscar Newhouse. From an order denying a change of venue defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Niles Searls and Fred Searls, for appellants. G. D. Buckley and C. W. Cross, (W. D. Long, of counsel,) for respondents.

Foote, C. This appeal is from an order of the court below refusing to change the place of trial of the cause from Nevada county to the city and county of San Francisco. It appears from the complaint that the Diamond Creek Consolidated Gold Mining Company is an association of numerous persons joined together for the purpose of opening, developing, and working gold mines in the county of Nevada, state of California; that the injury complained of was inflicted in Nevada county, and was occasioned by their neglect in that county, while engaged in their business there. After demurrer filed to the complaint, the court below refused to change the place of trial, on the ground "that the defendants are shown by the complaint to be an association, and engaged in business as such in the county of Nevada, where the alleged cause of action accrued, and, as appears by the complaint herein, the alleged injury was inflicted; and that as such association they were, under section 16 of article 12 of the constitution of the state of California, liable to be sued in the county of Nevada, where the cause of action accrued." The only argument made against this ruling seems to be that the complaint does not make it evident that the association mentioned possessed any of "the powers or privileges of a corporation," and that the word "association," as used in the section of the constitution supra, was intended to mean such an association as did possess such powers and privileges; and that, unless such allegation descriptive of the character of the association did appear in the complaint, it would not appear therefrom that such an association was meant as that to which the constitutional provision had reference. The language of that section of the constitution is: "A corporation or association may be sued in the county where the contract is made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises, or the breach occurs," etc. It is evident that the words "corporation or association" do not convey the idea that the association meant was to have any "corporate powers or privileges," and there is nothing else in the section itself which gives color or makes a suggestion that the word "association" is intended to signify anything else than that word, standing alone, would ordinarily be taken to mean. We think the court below was right, and that its order should be affirmed, and so advise.

Brill v. Shively et al. (No. 14,558.)

Res Judicata.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, a subsequent mortgagee was made a party defendant, and answered, praying that the surplus, if any should remain after paying the prior mortgage, should be applied to the payment of the subsequent mortgage. Held, that the judgment in such action was not a bar to an action to foreclose the subsequent mortgage, which covered two distinct tracts of land, one of which was not involved in the previous action.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action by Brill against Shively and others to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry Bleecher, W. I. Foley, and Geo. I. Cochran, for appellants. Bicknel & Denis and D. P. Hatch, for respondent.

Sharpstein, J. This appeal is from a judgment and order denying defendants' motion for a new trial in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendants to plaintiff. The mortgage embraces two distinct tracts of land, which, for convenience, we shall designate as tracts 1 and 2. Upon tract 2 there was a mortgage prior to plaintiff's, which was foreclosed before this action was commenced. In that action plaintiff was made a party, as claiming some interest subsequent to and subject to the lien of the plaintiff in that action. The plaintiff herein filed an answer in that action, in which he set out the mortgage which he held upon said tracts 1 and 2, and prayed that, if any surplus should remain after applying the same to the amounts due on said prior mortgage, the same be applied to the payment of the mortgage of the plaintiff herein, defendant in said action, to foreclose said prior mortgage. It nowhere appears that tract 1 was in any way involved in the action to foreclose the mortgage prior to the plaintiff's on said tract 2, but appellants contend that the judgment in that case is a bar to this action, and that the court below erred in holding that it is not. It is sufficiently clear to us that the judgment in that case did not and could not affect any land or interest outside of the tract involved in that action. The plaintiff's mortgage embraced two tracts, one of which only was involved in that action. The other was as much outside of that action as if it had been mortgaged to the plaintiff in a separate mortgage. It could not be foreclosed in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage upon another and separate tract of land. No bar to this action is shown, and, no other defense appearing in the record, the judgment and order must be affirmed.

Water and Water-Courses—Quieting Title—Evidence—Pleading—Judgment—Apportionment.

1. Where a witness in an action to quiet title to the right to use certain water, alleged to flow naturally through a specified stream, testified that he had measured the water in such stream, and gave the result of his measurement, and defendants sought to show that there was more than the average amount of water in the creek at the time of such measurement, the trial court properly sustained objections to questions put to such witness as to the comparative amount of water in other streams at points not stated; nothing being shown as to their length, etc.

2. Where the complaint alleged a right to use the water, and "also the right to divert from its natural channel, and to use for irrigating and domestic purposes, all the waters" of the stream, the words "also the right to divert," etc., are mere surplusage, and do not vitiate the complaint.

3. Where plaintiffs alleged that they were entitled to all the water of the stream, and defendants denied that they were entitled to any of it, and the court found that plaintiffs were entitled to a portion of the water only, and that, to make the water available for irrigating purposes, it was "necessary that the full flow of the stream be used at once," there was no error in the decree apportioning to plaintiffs the full flow of the water every 3½ days out of 7, and to defendants such flow the other 3½ days.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by William P. Harris and others against A. Harrison and others. From the judgment of the superior court, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willis, Cole & Craig, for appellants. Barclay & Wilson, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This action was brought to quiet plaintiffs' title to the right to the use of certain water, alleged to flow naturally through a stream called "Harrison Canon." Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Plaintiffs and defendants are the owners of adjoining land; defendants' land lying on Harrison canon, above and to the north of the land of plaintiffs. The real merits of the case, underlying incidental points of pleading and practice, rest upon the issue whether or not there is any water-course in Harrison canon. Defendants undertook to maintain by their evidence that the general character of Harrison canon was that of a dry, sandy gulch, with practically no running water in it, except during great and unusual rain-storms, when temporary torrents bring down large masses of sand and debris, which fill up the gulch and so change it that it could not be said to have any well-defined bed or banks; that ordinarily there was no water in the canon, except a little that oozed out of two springs on defendants' land, in quantities too small to form a current strong enough to flow down to plaintiffs' land; and that defendants, by digging into said springs and removing obstructions, developed a small stream, which they use to irrigate their land. Plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show the contrary of defendants' contention; and tending to prove that there always has been, and is, a natural stream of water running down said canon to and upon plaintiffs' land, independent of said unusual storms. The judge of the court, with counsel for both parties, and a civil engineer, (Finkle,) visited the premises, and observed the various points alluded to in the testimony. The evidence was certainly very conflicting; and, without reviewing it here in detail, it is sufficient to say that its character is such that the finding of the lower court that there was a water-course, as claimed by plaintiffs, must be taken as final.

We do not think that the court erred in sustaining the objections to two certain questions asked by appellants of the witness Finkle. The witness had testified that he had measured the water in Harrison canon when he visited it with the judge of the court, as above stated, and had given the result of his measurement; and appellants' counsel then asked him this question: "What, if any, comparison does a flow of water out of streams or springs bear this year to that of the preceding year?" And the witness, having stated that he had "this year" also measured certain other named streams coming from the mountains into the San Bernardino valley, was then asked this question: "Now, then, what, if any, is the increase or decrease of any of the streams that you have mentioned,—City creek, Plunge creek, or the other streams you have mentioned,—on the north side of the San Bernardino range, this year as compared with the preceding years?" Objections to these two questions were sustained, and, we think, correctly. Appellants had the right to show, if they could, by appropriate evidence, that there was more than the average amount of water in Harrison canon at the time Finkle measured it. This they might have done by the direct testimony of witnesses who knew the fact, if there were such, or by proof of such circumstances as an unusual rain-fall that year at the place, etc. But the comparative amount of water in other streams, at points not stated, in a range of mountains, nothing being shown as to their length, water-sheds, etc., is too general and remote to be proper evidence of the fact sought to be proven.

2. There is some foundation for appellants' criticism of the complaint; but we think it must be held as sufficient, at least in the absence of a special demurrer. The averments are not as direct, and are not as well connected in logical sequence, as they should have been, but it sufficiently appears therefrom that plaintiffs were the owners of certain land; that there was a stream of water naturally flowing to and upon said land; and that, by their riparian ownership of the land, they were entitled to have the use of said water upon said land. We do not think that, as contended by appellants, the complaint merely declares on a right acquired by appropriation. The complaint contains this language: "Also the right to divert from its natural channel, and to use for irrigating and domestic purposes, all the waters of that certain stream," etc. So far as the sufficiency of the statement of the cause of action is concerned, the use of the words "right to divert" and "for irrigation" are unnecessary. If plaintiffs, by virtue of their ownership of the land, had the right to have the natural flow of the water, they, of course, had the right to divert and use it for irrigating their land, at least as against the defendants, who were upper riparian proprietors; but the use of these words does not vitiate the statement of the cause of action. So far as this point is involved, they may be treated as surplusage, although some importance may perhaps be attached to them when considering the relative rights of the two sets of riparian proprietors to the use of the water of the stream for irrigating their respective lands.

3. The most important question of law involved in the case, (although not much argued in the briefs,) arises out of the form of the judgment. The court found "that, in order that the water of said stream may be made available for the purposes of irrigation to advantage, it is necessary that the full flow of the stream be used at once;" and it was decreed in the judgment that plaintiffs are the owners of, and entitled to the full flow of, the water, every 3½ days out of every 7 days, and that defendants are entitled to such flow for 3½ days out of every 7, and plaintiffs' title to such flow is quieted. Appellants contend that the above finding and the judgment are outside of the issues made by the pleadings. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that they were entitled to the flow of "all the waters" flowing in Harrison canon; and defendants, in their answer, denied that plaintiffs were entitled to the flow of any of said waters. The court found and decreed, substantially, that plaintiffs were entitled to the flow of some of said waters, but not of all, and that their right to have the waters of said creek flow down to and upon their land was subject to the use of said waters by defendants as upper riparian proprietors. Now a plaintiff in an action to quiet title, or in an action of ejectment, does not lose his case by a failure to establish his title to the whole of the property described in his complaint. He may recover, upon sufficient proof, either a segregated part of the premises sued for, or an undivided interest therein. And so, if the judgment in the case at bar had been for a certain part of the continuous flow of the stream, as, for instance, one-half thereof, or a certain number of inches, there could have been no objection to its form. In that event, plaintiff would have simply recovered, in the ordinary way, a part of the property for which he sued. But could the court apportion the use of the water between the parties, as was attempted to be done by the judgment?

According to the common-law doctrine of riparian ownership, as generally declared in England and in most of the American states, upon the facts in the case at bar, the plaintiffs would be entitled to have the waters of Harrison canon continue to flow to and upon their land as they were naturally accustomed to flow, without any substantial deterioration in quality or diminution in quantity. But in some of the western and southwestern states and territories, where the year is divided into one wet and one dry season, and irrigation is necessary to successful cultivation of the soil, the doctrine of riparian ownership has by judicial decision been modified, or rather enlarged, so as to include the reasonable use of natural water for irrigating the riparian land, although such use may appreciably diminish the flow down to the lower riparian proprietor; and this must be taken to be the established rule in California, at least where irrigation is thus necessary. Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 394, 10 Pac. Rep. 674. Of course, there will be great difficulty in many cases to determine what is such reasonable use; and "what is such reasonable use is a question of fact, and depends upon the circumstances appearing in each particular case." Lux v. Haggin, supra. The larger the number of riparian proprietors whose rights are involved, the greater will be the difficulty of adjustment. In such a case, the length of the stream, the volume of water in it, the extent of each ownership along the banks, the character of the soil owned by each contestant, the area sought to be irrigated by each,—all these and many other considerations must enter into the solution of the problem; but one principle is surely established, namely, that no proprietor can absorb all the water of the stream, so as to allow none to flow down to his neighbor. In the case at bar only the rights of two riparian proprietors are to be considered. None other are involved. And the amount of water in the stream is so small that it is apparent that defendants could not use it for any useful irrigation without practically absorbing it all, and leaving none to flow down to plaintiffs' land. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the finding of the court that in order to irrigate, "it is necessary that the full flow of the stream be used at once." But defendants, as well as plaintiffs, were entitled to a reasonable use of the water for irrigation; and the rights of either could be declared or preserved by an attempted division of the flow of the water without reference to time. The only way, therefore, to preserve those rights, and to render them beneficial, was to decree to the parties the use of the full flow of the stream during alternate periods of time; and we do not see why the court could not decree a division of the use of the water according to that method, when there was no other method by which it could be done. And that the division was a just one, and not erroneously determined upon, seems clear. The evidence showed that the arable and irrigable land of each party was about equal in area; and there is no contention that the division was not equitable, provided that all the other facts were correctly found by the court.

We see no difficulty in the point that the pleadings do not support the judgment. We see no reason why a court of equity, in a case like this, could not decree such an adjustment of disputed water-rights as was decreed in this case upon the ordinary pleadings in an action to quiet title. Under such pleadings the rights of the parties to and in the property involved are at issue, and the court has jurisdiction to definitely and finally determine them. The pleadings in this case, however, set up the rights of the parties to irrigate their respective lands by the use of the water-right in litigation; and it is difficult to see what further pleadings were necessary.

There was some contradictory evidence as to whether plaintiffs' ditch or flume extends upon the land of defendants, and there is something on that subject in the briefs; but it is sufficient to say, on this point, that the judgment does not give plaintiffs any right to maintain a ditch on defendant's land, or to go on it for any purpose. Judgment and order affirmed.

STOLL et al. v. BEECHER et al. (No. 14,462.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 25, 1892.)

BOUNDARIES—MONUMENTS—COURSES AND DISTANCES—CONFLICT.

Where, in an action to recover possession of land, the evidence is conflicting as to the true location of a station, which is described as a natural monument, and is located in a different place by the courses and distances, the natural monument will control.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by Stoll and others against Beecher and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. J. King and R. Dunnigan, for appellants. D. L. Russell and W. S. Waters, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land in Los Angeles county. It is described in the complaint and in the judgment as follows: "All that certain tract of land in said county, lying between Promenade avenue on the east, and the line of ordinary high-water mark of the Pacific ocean on the west, and between the lines of Ocean avenue on the south and Front street on the north, according to the map of South Santa Monica, made by Rumble & Gaertner, surveyors, * * * to which map reference is made for further description and certainty. The lines of said Ocean avenue and of said Front street being considered, however, as extended westerly to the said line of ordinary high-water mark on the Pacific ocean." Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The only point made by appellants is that the findings are contrary to the evidence. There are no specifications in the statement as to the insufficiency of the evidence, but, as no objection has been made on that ground, we proceed to consider the merits of appellants' contention. It is claimed by appellants that neither the patent of the Rancho la Ballona nor the deed of Nancy T. Lucas includes in its description any of the land in controversy. Whether this contention be sound or not depends upon the question as to the proper location of station 31 of the Ballona rancho. Appellants contend that it is located in an arroyo on the bluff above the sea-shore. The question was one of fact to be determined by the court on all the evidence in the case. In finding that plaintiffs were the owners of the land in controversy, the court necessarily found that the station was not on the bluff, but on the sea-shore; and we think the finding is supported by the evidence. The north-west corner of the Ballona rancho is identical with the south-east corner of the Rancho Santa Monica y San Vicente. The description of the land in the patent of the Santa Monica rancho commences with the words: "Beginning on the sea-shore, at station number thirty-one of the 'Ballona' rancho." The decree of confirmation recited in the patent of the Ballona rancho describes the land as "a certain tract of land in Los Angeles county, west of the city of Los Angeles about three leagues, and bordering on the sea-shore, called the 'Ballona.'" The plat referred to in the patent shows that the north-west corner of the rancho is on the sea-shore, as stated in the patent of the Santa Monica y San Vicente, and all of the agreements, decrees, and conveyances through which plaintiffs deraign title tend to establish the same fact. Wright, a witness for plaintiffs, testified that he was a surveyor, and had surveyed the land; that the west line of the rancho, as shown in the patent, survey, and map, was not the same as it was shown to be in the survey and map of South Santa Monica; that "the west line of the patent includes the land in controversy." Fisher, a surveyor called on behalf of defendants, testified on cross-examination that "the boundaries, as called for in the title-deeds of plaintiffs, (which are here now shown,) embrace and include the land in controversy. The west line, as called for in said title, being the Pacific ocean, and the lands in controversy being east of and above the line of ordinary high-water mark of said Pacific ocean. If the entire west line from the point where the southern boundary of the La Ballona intersects or touches the Pacific ocean was run in accordance with the calls, courses, and distances as called for in the patent and survey of said La Ballona rancho, to station thirty-one, its north-west corner, then, in that case, the land in controversy would lie east of and above said line so run." All the witnesses testified that, if station No. 31 were located at ordinary high-water mark on the sea-shore, as called for in the survey and patent, and the west line of the rancho were run according to the calls, courses, and distances given in the survey, all of the land in controversy would be east of and above said west line; and that, if the lines of Ocean avenue and Front street were extended westerly to the line of ordinary high-water mark, all the land in controversy would lie between the lines of said Ocean avenue and Front street, so extended, and above and east of the line of ordinary high-water mark. It is true, four of the five witnesses testified that station 31, according to the courses and distances given in the survey is located in the arroyo on the bluff; but the most that can be said is that there is a conflict in the evidence. Where there is a conflict as to the true location of a station, which is described as a natural monument, and is located in a different place by the courses and distances, the natural monument will control. It is claimed by appellant that the deed from Andres and Rafael Machado to Nancy T. Lucas did not embrace the land described in the complaint. This contention also is based upon the assumption that the south-east corner of the Santa Monica y San Vicente, and the north-west corner of the Ballona is in the arroyo, and not on the sea-shore. The deed and the decree correcting the same, (entered long prior to the commencement of this action,) in describing the land, both say, "Commencing at a point on the sea-shore of the Pacific ocean," etc. The description of the land sought to be recovered was properly amended. The assumed extension of the lines of the streets fixed with certainty the exterior boundaries of the tract, and rendered it unnecessary to locate them by courses and distances. The affidavits set out in the transcript are not authenticated, as required by our rule, and need not be considered. A glance, however, is sufficient to show that they allege matters clearly incompetent.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WESTERN LUMBER CO. v. PHILLIPS et al.
(No. 14,452.)

MINOR—APPEARANCE BY GENERAL GUARDIAN—SPECIAL ANSWER—FINDINGS OF FACT—WAIVER.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 372, an infant defendant may appear by his general guardian in an action to enforce a lien for materials furnished for a certain building.

2. Where infant defendants have no special or separate defense, no separate answer is necessary, but joinder in the general answer of defendants is sufficient.

3. Code Civil Proc. § 634, providing that "findings of fact may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact," applies to infants as well as to adults.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by the Western Lumber Company against Emma A. Phillips and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas J. Curran, for appellants. Wilson & Bulla, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to enforce a lien for materials furnished for and used in the construction of a building on land owned by the defendant Emma A. Phillips. The defendant Gifford was the contractor to erect the building, and under contract with him, as the duly-authorized agent of the owner, the materials were furnished by plaintiff. The other defendants were made parties to the action, because they claimed to have some interest in the land sought to be subjected to the lien. Gifford failed to appear, and his default was duly entered. Two of the other defendants were minors who were regularly served with summons, and appeared and answered by their general guardian. The defendants joined in the same answer, and the only issues tendered thereby were as to the furnishing and use of the materials, and as to the sum which would constitute a reasonable attorney's fee. At the trial witnesses were sworn and examined on both sides, and at the conclusion of the testimony findings were waived, and the case submitted. Thereafter the court made and entered its decree, whereby, after stating that it appeared to the court that all the allegations of the complaint were true, except as to the amount which should be allowed as attorney's fee, and that judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the sums named, aggregating $759.37, and that the same was a lien on the premises described, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said premises, or so much thereof as might be necessary to raise the amount due the plaintiff, be sold, etc., and that out of the proceeds of the sale the sheriff, after deducting his costs and commission, pay to the plaintiff the amount found due him, with interest thereon from the date of the decree; and that if the proceeds should be insufficient to pay the whole amount found due, with interest, costs, and expenses of sale, then that the clerk of the court, on the coming in of the return, docket a judgment against Gifford for the amount of the deficiency. From this judgment all of the defendants, except Gifford, appeal on the judgment roll.

The only points made for a reversal are: (1) That no guardian ad litem was appointed for the minors; (2) that the general guardian did not answer specially for the minors, but joined in a common answer with the other defendants; (3) that the minors could not waive findings of fact; (4) that there was no personal judgment against the contractor, Gifford. We see no merit in either of these points. When an infant is a party to an action, he may appear by his general guardian. Section 372, Code Civil Proc. A general guardian is authorized—indeed, it is his duty—to appear for his ward. Gronfier v. Puymirol, 19 Cal. 629; Smith v. McDonald, 42 Cal. 484. And the appearance of a general guardian is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the persons of the infant defendants. Richardson v. Loupe, 80 Cal. 499, 22 Pac. Rep. 227.

It is not pretended that the minors had any separate or special defense, and we know of no rule of law or pleading requiring, in such a case, that a separate and special answer be filed in their behalf. The Code provides that findings may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact. Section 634, Code Civil Proc. This provision includes all parties, and must be held to apply to infants as well as adults. But in this case the court did, in effect, make and recite findings of fact and conclusions of law therefrom in the judgment. The judgment was sufficient in form against Gifford, but, if not, the appellants were not prejudiced thereby. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

GOODRICH v. LATHROP. (No. 14,421.)

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—NEGLIGENCE—COMPENSATION.

1. Civil Code, § 3407, provides that "rescission cannot be adjudged for a mere mistake, unless the party against whom it is adjudged can be restored to substantially the same position as if the contract had not been made." Plaintiff, knowing that defendant had a certain lot for sale, went to examine it, with a view to purchase, but by mistake looked at the wrong lot, which was satisfactory. Believing it to be the lot defendant had for sale, she entered into a written contract for the purchase of defendant's lot. Held, that plaintiff's right to rescind was not defeated by the fact that the lot had largely depreciated in value when she discovered her mistake, and gave notice to rescind, the words "same position" in the statute being used with reference to the subject-matter of the contract, and not with reference to a change in the market value of the property which was the subject of such contract.

2. If, in equity, defendant is entitled to any relief by reason of plaintiff's mistake, the court can award full compensation therefor, under Civil Code, § 3408, providing that, on adjudging a rescission, the party to whom such relief is granted may be required to make any compensation to the other which justice may require.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

C. E. Sumner, for appellant. H. B. Westerman, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by a vendee to rescind a contract of sale of realty, and to recover money paid thereunder, upon the ground that the contract was executed through a mistake of fact. Judgment went for defendant, and this is an appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Plaintiff, knowing that defendant had a certain lot for sale, went to examine the same, with a view to purchase, but by mistake looked at a different lot, from the one defendant had for sale. She did not see defendant's lot, but, the one she viewed being satisfactory, and believing it to be the lot defendant had for sale, she entered into a written contract of purchase with defendant, the description in said contract being for defendant's lot. Later, upon ascertaining her mistake, she gave notice of rescission, and brought this action thereunder. Defendant, by his answer, conceded the mistake, but set out many facts tending to show negligence upon her part in viewing the wrong lot, and also claimed that the lot had largely depreciated in value since the making of the contract, and that consequently he could not be placed in statu quo. Under the authority of Barfield v. Price, 40 Cal. 542, these facts present ample ground for rescission of the sale, unless the defenses set out by the answer are sufficient to defeat it. As to these defenses the court found "that said mistakes were caused by the neglect of a legal duty on the part of plaintiff," and also that "defendant cannot be restored to substantially the same position as if the contract had not been made;" and upon these findings rendered judgment for defendant. Section 3407 of the Civil Code provides: "Rescission cannot be adjudged for mere mistake, unless the party against whom it is adjudged can be restored to substantially the same position as if the contract had not been made." The words "same position," found in the section, are used with reference to the subject-matter of the contract; and the fact that the market value of the property may have depreciated while out of the possession of the vendor does not defeat the vendee's right of rescission. If the property can be returned by the vendee in substantially the same condition as when he received it, then the requirements of this section of the Code are fully satisfied. If in equity and good conscience the vendor is entitled to any relief from the vendee by reason of her mistake in the premises, then section 3408 gives the court full power to do what justice may require in the nature of compensation. As has been previously noted, the defendant set out various facts and circumstances tending to show that the mistake of plaintiff was occasioned by her own negligence. In response to these allegations of the answer the court made the single finding that "these mistakes were caused by the neglect of a legal duty on the part of plaintiff." Conceding that the facts set out by the answer in this regard constitute a good defense to the action, which question we do not decide, yet the finding of the court is a conclusion of law, and can only be considered as such. It follows that there are no findings of fact made by the court upon this defense, and we are unable to determine upon what fact or state of facts this conclusion was based. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

OAKS v. OAKS. (No. 14,544.)

WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY.

In an action to quiet title it appeared that a husband purchased property with community funds, and that his wife filed a declaration of homestead thereon; that the husband then conveyed the premises to his wife as a gift; that subsequently he wished to sell the land, but the wife refused to join in a deed unless he paid her one-half the proceeds of the sale; that they conveyed the premises by joint deed, and one-half the proceeds were paid to the wife by the husband's consent; that out of this money the wife purchased the property in controversy. Held, that the joint conveyance was an abandonment of the homestead under Civil Code, § 1243, and the proceeds paid to the wife, and the premises purchased with them, became her separate property.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action to quiet title by W. J. Oaks against Carrie Oaks. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wilcoxon and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. W. B. Dillard, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. Action to quiet plaintiff's title to lot 4, block 105, in the city of San Luis Obispo. The allegations of the complaint, which is in the usual form, but not verified, are denied by the answer, and defendant, by her cross-complaint, avers title to the lot in question in herself, and asks that her title thereto be quieted against plaintiff. Plaintiff answered the cross-complaint by a general denial, and afterwards, by leave of the court, filed a supplemental answer thereto, in which he sets up a declaration of homestead on said lot, made by him after the commencement of this action. At the trial plaintiff abandoned his complaint, and the case was tried by the court upon the cross-complaint, answer, and supplemental answer thereto, and judgment given in favor of the defendant. This appeal is taken by plaintiff on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions.

It appears that plaintiff, who is the husband of defendant, purchased with community funds certain real property in the city of San Luis Obispo, on which he, with his family, were actually residing when the defendant filed her declaration of homestead thereon. Afterwards, on January 11, 1886, plaintiff conveyed to defendant by deed, said premises as a gift, and in 1887 they were sold for $6,000 in excess of a certain mortgage lien thereon. Of this sum defendant claimed $3,000, and refused to join in the deed unless the same was paid to her, and put in her own name. This sum was then paid to her by the purchaser, with the consent of the husband, and thereafter plaintiff and defendant joined in a conveyance of said premises. The $3,000 received by defendant was deposited in bank by her in her own name, with plaintiff's knowledge and consent, and thereafter she purchased for $2,500 the lot in controversy, paying therefor out of the said $3,000, and taking a deed thereof in her own name. It further appears that after the commencement of this action plaintiff filed for record a declaration of homestead on the lot in question, but the declaration was not made with the defendant's consent. It is contended by appellant that, as the marriage relation between the parties herein has never been severed, the wife held the proceeds of the sale of the homestead charged with the same trust that she held the title to the homestead, and that when such proceeds were invested in another home, it became, as it had always been, community property. The effect of the deed from plaintiff to defendant conveying the property out of which the homestead was carved by the wife's declaration, was to vest in her the legal title, subject to the husband's rights in the homestead, (Schuler v. Society, 64 Cal. 397, 1 Pac. Rep. 479; Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. Rep. 715;) and, so long as the property continued to be impressed with the character of a homestead, it could not be extinguished during the existence of the marriage relation, except by the joint act of husband and wife in the mode pointed out by the statute. In the case before us, the premises from which the homestead was selected by the wife were afterwards sold, but the wife refused to join in the deed unless the sum of $3,000—one-half of the proceeds realized from said sale—were paid over to her, "and put in her own name." This the husband consented to, and, after receiving said sum from the purchaser in pursuance of such consent, she joined with her husband in a conveyance to the purchaser of the premises. This joint conveyance was an abandonment of the homestead under section 1243 of the Civil Code, and the proceeds so received by her from said sale became by virtue of the deed of January 11, 1886, her separate property, and under the rule laid down in Schuler v. Society, supra, they became her separate property independent of the deed. It therefore follows that the judgment decreeing the lot in controversy to be the separate property of defendant, and the husband's declaration of homestead thereon to be void, because made without her consent, should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

GREEN et al. v. CLIFFORD. (No. 14,276.)

PLEADING—MECHANICS' LIENS—FINDINGS—PARTIES.

1. A count may incorporate by reference certain general averments which are in a previous count in the same pleading.

2. Plaintiff furnished materials to a contractor, who afterwards abandoned his contract. In an action to enforce a lien, plaintiff, after the time for commencing an action, amended its complaint by making the contractor a party. Held that, even if the contractor was a necessary party, defendant was not prejudiced by the amendment.

3. The complaint in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien alleged that there was due and owing from defendant to the contractor, on the contract, "an amount exceeding the sum due this plaintiff as hereinbefore stated;" and there was a finding of the court to the same effect. Held, that the pleading and finding were full enough to cover everything necessary on the subject.

4. A contractor is not a necessary party to an action to enforce liens for labor and materials furnished after the abandonment of his contract.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Consolidation of several actions brought by Green and others against Mrs. R. N. Clifford to enforce liens for labor and materials. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. Wilson & Bulla, Johnsson & Borden, Smith, Winder & Smith, Scarborough & J. F. Waterman, E. E. Powers, and J. L. Murphy, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is a consolidation of several actions brought to enforce liens of various mechanics and material-men against premises owned by defendant, Clifford. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and defendant, Clifford, appeals from the judgment. There was no motion for a new trial. There is no bill of exceptions, and all the points made by appellant arise upon the pleadings and findings. There were general demurrers to all of the complaints, and also demurrers on some special grounds. There is no contention that the amounts of the liens claimed were not correct and just. Most of the points made are highly technical, and we will not attempt to notice all of them in detail.

1. The appellant, Clifford, on December 3, 1888, made a written contract with one Graham for the construction by the latter of a house on land owned by her for $1,800. This contract was recorded December 4, 1888; and immediately afterwards Graham commenced work on the house, and continued it until December 26, 1888, "when he abandoned the contract and fled the country." He had given a bond to Mrs. Clifford for the faithful performance of the contract, and on said bond one Sylvester was a surety. After the flight of Graham the building was completed under the supervision of Sylvester; and appellant contends that Sylvester, as such surety, carried out the said contract of Graham, and that, therefore, the rights of all the respondents must depend upon and be measured by said contract. Upon this contention many of appellant's points rest. The court, however, found that such was not the fact, and that, after the abandonment by Graham, Sylvester was merely the agent and foreman for defendant, Clifford, and as such agent ordered the labor and materials mentioned in the various complaints, except in that of the plaintiff the Western Lumber Company. As there is no evidence before us, such finding must be taken as true. All of the labor and materials for which the liens sued on were filed were furnished after the abandonment by Graham, and to the appellant through her agent, Sylvester, except those furnished by said Western Lumber Company, which will be separately noticed hereafter. Hence the contention of appellant that the Graham contract must control the rights involved herein cannot be maintained, and all the incidents of that contention fall with it.

2. Among the plaintiffs, Green claimed and recovered the largest amount; and it is contended that all of his complaint, except the first count, was fatally defective. Green had a lien for work done by himself, and he was also the assignee of 11 other lienholders; and it was necessary for him to put the cause of action upon each lien in a separate count. His first count was plainly divided into distinct paragraphs, accurately designated by Roman numerals from I. to X. Paragraph I. contained certain necessary averments as to the land owned by appellant upon which the building was erected, etc. The subsequent counts commenced in this way: "Plaintiff hereby refers to paragraph I. of the first cause of action, hereinbefore set forth, and expressly makes said paragraph a part of this cause of action, as if incorporated herein." And appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed because paragraph I. of the first count was not written in full in each of the other counts. It has never been the settled law here that the preliminary averments of a complaint can never be made part of subsequent counts by apt and express reference and without being rewritten. In the opinion of the court in Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 131, 22 Pac. Rep. 398, where, in a second count, it was averred "that certain paragraphs of the first count are true," the pleading was hostilely criticised, and certain remarks were made which were obiter dicta; but nothing upon the subject was there decided. In Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 266, the court quotes approvingly from Chitty's Pleadings, as follows: "But, unless the second count expressly refers to the first, no defect therein will be aided by the preceding count." And the language which the court itself uses is substantially to the same effect. Of course, each count must stand by itself; but it is not fatally defective because it incorporates by reference certain general averments which are in the same pleading, and which are necessary to all the counts, if the reference be so plain and explicit as to leave no doubt as to the meaning. Such pleading is not, in general, to be commended. It may be, as it has been called, "slovenly," but it is not bad enough to upset a judgment.

3. As before stated, the Western Lumber Company, one of the plaintiffs, furnished the materials covered by its lien to Graham before he abandoned the contract. In its original complaint, it did not make Graham a party, but afterwards, and after the statutory time for commencing the action, it amended its complaint by making said Graham a party; and appellant contends that this was fatal to the validity of the judgment. We do not know of any law which makes the contractor a necessary party, so far at least as the rights of the owner of the building are concerned; and the contrary was substantially decreed in Lumber Co. v. Garrettson, 87 Cal. 596, 25 Pac. Rep. 747. But at all events the appellant could not be prejudiced by the amendment making Graham a party, although made after the statutory time for commencing the action. It is also contended that there is no averment in the complaint of the Western Lumber Company of what amount, if any, was due from appellant to Graham on the contract. It is doubtful if this point is raised by the demurrer. But it is averred that there is due and owing from appellant to said Graham, upon said contract, "an amount exceeding the sum due this plaintiff as hereinbefore stated;" and there is a finding of the court to the same effect. Under any view of the law the pleading and finding are full enough to cover everything necessary in this case to have been pleaded or found on the subject.

4. Graham was certainly not a necessary party to the actions brought to enforce liens for labor and materials furnished after the abandonment of his contract.

5. Many points are made as to alleged variances between some of the averments of the various complaints and the findings, but we see no variances that are material, or that prejudice the substantial rights of appellant. In a few of the counts for labor, it is averred that the laborers were hired at certain specified wages per day, but it is alleged that the hiring was by appellant through her agent; and the court found that all the amounts for which judgment was given were "the reasonable value of said work and materials done and furnished."

So far, at least, as appellant's rights are concerned, there are no valid objections to the constitutionality of the mechanic's lien law. We do not deem it necessary to notice at large the many other minor points made by appellant. It is sufficient to say that we see no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; PATERSON, J.

STONESIFER et al. v. KILBURN et al. (No. 14,629.)

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REFUSAL TO SETTLE—APPEAL—EXCUSABLE NEGLECT.

1. An order refusing to settle a bill of exceptions because, owing to mistake or neglect, the same had not been presented within the time prescribed by law, is appealable. Ketchum v. Crippen, 31 Cal. 367, overruled.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 473, declares that a court may allow an answer to be made after the time limited by the Code, and may also relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other "proceeding" taken against him through his mistake or excusable neglect. Section 4 declares that the provisions of the Code are to be liberally construed. Held, that the settlement of a bill of exceptions is a proceeding within the meaning of said section, and that a court has power, although the bill may not have been served in time, to allow a settlement upon a proper showing that the failure of service resulted solely from mistake or excusable neglect, or that the settlement will promote justice.

3. Where an attorney in a cause asks that 30 days be allowed in addition to the 10 days allowed by law within which to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions, and the attorney for the other party, without making any objection, afterwards presents a stipulation which the first attorney merely glances over without reading, and, seeing "thirty days," assumes it to be in conformity to his request, whereas in fact the time allowed is only 30 days after service of the notice of intention to move for a new trial, his conduct, although negligent, is, under the circumstances, and considering that the time allowed by such stipulations is usually expressed to be in addition to the time allowed by law, excusable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action by A. G. Stonesifer and others against Paris Kilburn and others. From a judgment for three of the defendants, plaintiffs and the other defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd and Stonesifer & Minor, for appellants. William Matthews and C. C. Wright, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. On June 13, 1889, judgment was entered in this case in favor of three of the defendants and against the plaintiffs and two of the defendants. The parties in whose favor the judgment was given notified the other parties of the decision on the 17th day of June, 1889. On June 21, 1889, the plaintiffs and the two defendants against whom judgment was given (all of whom are appellants) gave due notice of their intention to move for a new trial on various grounds, and that the motion would be made upon a bill of exceptions thereafter "to be prepared, settled, and allowed by the court." On June 26, 1889, a written stipulation was signed and filed by the attorneys for all the parties, giving 30 days after service of notice of intention to move for a new trial in which to prepare a bill of exceptions. On the 3d day of August, 1889, the attorneys for plaintiffs served their draft of their proposed bill of exceptions on the attorneys for defendants, who received the same subject to the objection that it was not served within the time stipulated; and on October 8, 1889, served their proposed amendments, with a reservation therein of their objection to a settlement of the proposed bill of exceptions on the ground that it was not served in time. After due notice of the non-acceptance of the proposed amendments by plaintiffs, and within 10 days after service thereof, plaintiffs delivered their proposed bill of exceptions, and the proposed amendments thereto, to the clerk of the court, for the judge who tried the action. On November 25th, and before any further steps towards settling the exceptions had been taken, the plaintiffs' attorneys served on the attorneys for defendants the following notice:

"You will please take notice that on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock A. M., or as soon thereafter as counsel can be heard, at the court-room of this court, the plaintiffs and the defendants Montgomery and Paige will make application to the court for an order that the bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial served herein on defendants Kilburn, with the amendments proposed thereto by the said defendants under objection reserved that the said bill was not served in due season, be settled, allowed, and certified, and thereupon filed with the clerk of said court, and the motion for new trial heard thereon, and that the plaintiffs and said Montgomery and Paige be relieved from said objection on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect as set forth in the affidavits of A. Stonesifer and Edward J. Pringle, copies of which are hereunto annexed, upon which affidavits and the papers on file herein the said application will be based."

The affidavits of Pringle and Stonesifer annexed to this notice are as follows:

"Edward J. Pringle, being duly sworn, makes oath that since the commencement of this action he has been one of the attorneys of the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action, residing in the county of Alameda, state of California, and having his law office and place of business in the city and county of San Francisco; and that Mr. William Matthews, ne of the attorneys of the defendants Kilburn, has been residing in the city and county of San Francisco. That in conducting the said cause arrangements in reference to it have been made in San Francisco between this affiant and Mr. Matthews, and in Modesto between Messrs. Stonesifer and Wright. That relations of a very friendly character have always existed between this affiant and Mr. Matthews, and, as this affiant believes, between Messrs. Stonesifer and Wright. That, after giving notice of intention to move for a new trial in said cause, this affiant called upon Mr. Matthews, and requested from him an extension of the usual statutory period to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions. Mr. Matthews readily consented to give any reasonable time that the affiant would require, and the stipulation giving thirty days' time was written by Mr. Matthews, who promised to send the same to Modesto, to be signed and delivered by Mr. Wright. That this affiant did not himself make any memorandum of the terms of the stipulation, or charge his memory with the date of its maturity, or enter it in his office diary, because it was not put in his hands or delivered to him, but was to be sent to Modesto, being still subject to Mr. Wright's approval; but the affiant wrote immediately to Mr. Stonesifer, telling him generally of the stipulation, and that it would be signed and presented to him by Mr. Wright, and requesting Mr. Stonesifer to prepare the bill of exceptions within the time of the stipulation, and to submit the bill to him for examination. That Mr. Stonesifer afterwards gave to the managing clerk in the office of the affiant a memorandum of the day to which by said stipulation the time for serving of the bill of exceptions was extended, stating that that day was the 3d day of August, and thereupon entry to that effect was made on the office diary of affiant. That when Mr. Stonesifer prepared the bill of exceptions, and sent it to San Francisco for examination by this affiant, he stated in his letter accompanying the bill that the last day for serving it was on August 3d, and the affiant wholly believed such statement to be correct, and relied upon the same."

"C. A. Stonesifer, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the plaintiffs in the above-entitled action, and a member of the firm of Stonesifer & Minor, attorneys for plaintiffs, and resides and has his office in the city of Modesto, county of Stanislaus. That on the 24th day of June, 1889, the above-named plaintiffs and defendants A. Montgomery and Timothy Paige duly served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial herein, specifying therein that the same would be made upon a bill of exceptions thereafter to be prepared, settled, and allowed by the court. That on the same day, and at the time of the service of the said notice of intention to move for a new trial, affiant applied to C. C. Wright, Esq., of the firm of Wright & Hazen, who reside and have their office in the city of Modesto, county of Stanislaus, attorneys for defendants Paris, Guy, and Jeanette Kilburn, for a stipulation extending the time within which plaintiffs and said defendants Montgomery and Paige might prepare and serve their proposed bill of exceptions to thirty days in addition to the time allowed by law, in view of the fact that the testimony was rather lengthy, and that it would take considerable time to prepare the bill of exceptions. That said Wright replied to affiant that they were perfectly willing to give such time by stipulation, and any further time plaintiffs and defendants Montgomery and Paige might desire. That two days thereafter, and on the 26th day of June, said Wright came into the office of affiant, and stated that he had just received from Mr. Matthews, who was also one of the attorneys for defendants Kilburn, and was residing and having his office in the city and county of San Francisco, a stipulation giving the time previously agreed upon between affiant and said Wright. That affiant, looking over the stipulation, and finding it not very legibly written, but seeing the words 'thirty days,' at once assumed, as well from seeing these words in the stipulation as from the fact that Mr. Wright had brought it to him as embodying their previous understanding, that the stipulation gave thirty days in addition to the ten days allowed by law. That the stipulation is hastily and illegibly written, and is certainly not so plain as to strike the attention and change the idea of the affiant previously formed as to its contents, without a closer examination than was given to it under the circumstances. That affiant has no doubt that Mr. Wright put the same construction upon the stipulation. That in the presence of Mr. Wright, and while the stipulation was lying before them on the table, affiant made the following entry in his pocket diary, under date of August 3, 1889: 'Stonesifer vs. Kilburn. Serve bill of exceptions. Last day;' and made a similar entry in the office diary of Stonesifer & Minor. That, in fact, this affiant and Mr. Wright, after the first general reference to the stipulation made by Mr. Wright as aforesaid, paid no further attention to the time allowed, but discussed only the subsequent part of the stipulation, which they had not previously considered. That the said stipulation is in the exact words and figures following: 'It is agreed that the plaintiff may have thirty days after service of notice of intention to move for a new trial in which to prepare and serve bill of exceptions in thereof. No objection is to be taken by either party for the failure to serve the Radols with process, and no further papers shall be required to be served on them to fully litigate the rights of the parties now in court.' That said Wright then took said stipulation, and filed it in the county clerk's office, as affiant is informed; and affiant never saw it again until the 1st day of August, 1889. That affiant subsequently wrote to E. J. Pringle, Esq., one of the attorneys for plaintiffs, at his office in the city of San Francisco, that a stipulation had been signed extending the time to plaintiffs and defendants Montgomery and Paige to serve the bill of exceptions, and that August 3, 1889, was the last day to serve it. That affiant prepared said proposed bill of exceptions, and on the 23d day of July, 1889, it was completed and ready for service, and could have been served on that day, but, affiant believing that August 3d was the last day, he forwarded it to said Pringle on that day (July 23, 1889) for his examination and service on said Matthews, and again wrote said Pringle on that day that August 3d was the last day to serve it. That affiant, at all times from the time of signing said stipulation until the first day of August thereafter, believed and so understood that it gave thirty days in addition to the time allowed by law within which to prepare and serve said proposed bill of exceptions, on which day the following letter was received by R. C. Minor, of the said firm of Stonesifer & Minor, from said Pringle, to-wit: 'San Francisco, July 31, '89. My Dear Mr. Minor: Stonesifer wrote to me that the time for serving bill of exceptions in the Kilburn case did not expire until August 3d, and I applied to Matthews to-day for an extension. Matthews alarmed me by saying that the time had already expired, and would give no other stipulation than the inclosed. Please look immediately, and see which of us is right. I think Stonesifer got a stipulation on July 3d giving us 30 days. Please see how we stand, and let me know. Yours, truly, EDWARD J. PRINGLE.' The stipulation referred to in the above letter is as follows: 'It is hereby stipulated and agreed in the above-entitled action that, if the time to prepare and serve bill of exceptions has not expired, plaintiffs and defendants Paige and Montgomery may have until and including the 23d day of August, 1889, in which to prepare and serve proposed bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial. If the time has expired, this stipulation is void. Dated July 31, 1889.'"

The following counter-affidavits of Messrs. Matthews and Wright were filed:

"William Matthews, being duly sworn, makes oath that the stipulation giving the plaintiff Stonesifer and the defendants Paige and Montgomery additional time to prepare a bill of exceptions in support of their motion for a new trial was written by affiant in the presence of Mr. Edward J. Pringle, and that the time therein named as the period within which the bill of exceptions should be filed and served was then agreed upon by Mr. Pringle and affiant, and according to the best of affiant's recollection the said stipulation was read by affiant to Mr. Pringle before said stipulation was signed. WILLIAM MATTHEWS."

"C. C. Wright, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys for the defendants Paris, Guy, and Jeanette Kilburn, in the above-entitled action. Denies that he understood the stipulation referred to in the affidavits of E. J. Pringle, Esq., and C. A. Stonesifer, Esq., in any other or different sense from what its terms plainly import, or that affiant ever put any other construction upon it. Admits that he may have said, and probably did say, to said Stonesifer, on the 24th day of June, 1889, that we 'were willing to give such time by stipulation' as might be necessary, but alleges that it was with the understanding that the stipulation would be regularly extended in the mode and manner provided by law and the rules of this court. That rule 28 of this court is the following, to-wit: 'Rule 28. No agreement, consent, or stipulation between the parties or their attorneys, in respect to the proceedings in a cause, will be regarded by the court, unless the same shall have been made in open court, and entered by the clerk in the minutes of that day's proceedings of court; or unless the evidence thereof shall be in writing, subscribed by the party against whom the same is alleged, or by his attorney.' Affiant does not remember the conversation fully which occurred between said Stonesifer and himself on the 24th day of June, 1889, but alleges that when affiant signed said stip.

ulation he did so with full understanding of its contents, and did not know that said Stonesifer did not so understand it. Denies that in anything which affiant may have said he meant to mislead said Stonesifer or any one else, and alleges that he expected that, if further time were required for said purpose, it would be applied for in the regular way. Denies that affiant ever said to said Stonesifer that said stipulation was in any other or different form from what it was and is; and denies that affiant said it was a stipulation extending said time to thirty days in addition to the time allowed by law. C. C. WRIGHT."

On December 6th the motion was heard by the court, and thereafter (omitting immaterial recitals) the court made the following order: "It appearing to the court that the said bill was not served in due season by reason of the mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of one of the attorneys of the plaintiffs who had charge of the matter of preparing and serving the said bill of exceptions, but that the court has no power to relieve the parties from the objection so made by the defendants Kilburn, and the said defendants still insisting upon the said objection, and the proceedings upon the said motion and application having been duly and regularly continued since the 6th day of December, 1889, it is ordered that the said motion be, and the same is, for the reason aforesaid, hereby denied, and the application for settlement of the said bill of exceptions is refused." The appeal is from this order.

1. It is contended for respondents that the order is not appealable; citing Ketchum v. Crippen, 31 Cal. 367, and other early cases to the same effect. But these cases have been expressly overruled on the point to which they are cited. Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110; Morris v. De Celis, 41 Cal. 331; Dooly v. Norton, Id. 440; Clark v. Crane, 57 Cal. 630; and Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza Gold Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. Rep. 810. Besides, in this case a writ of mandate was denied by this court, on the ground that, if the court below erred or abused its discretion, its action could be reviewed on appeal. Stonesifer v. Armstrong, 86 Cal. 594, 25 Pac. Rep. 50.

2. It is contended that the court had no power to relieve appellants from the legal effect of their failure to serve their proposed bill of exceptions in time, even though their default was caused by their excusable mistake, and the relief asked be deemed just. But the cases cited in support of this point seem to go no further than to determine what is the legal effect of the default in the absence of a proper and well-grounded proceeding to be relieved from it, and do not determine that the court has no power, under any circumstances, to relieve a party from such legal effect. The distinction seems quite as clear as that between determining the legal effect of a judgment by default and adjudging that under no circumstances can a party be relieved from the legal effect of such judgment. Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The court * * * may allow an answer to be made after the time limited by this Code; and may also * * * relieve a party * * * from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." Section 4 of the same Code declares that "its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." "The settlement of a bill of exceptions is a proceeding in an action." Lukes v. Logan, 66 Cal. 33, 4 Pac. Rep. 883; Irwin v. Bank, 6 Ohio St. 86; Wilson v. Allen, 3 How. Pr. 371; Rich v. Husson, 1 Duer, 620; Wilson v. Macklin, 7 Neb. 52; Strong v. Hardenburgh, 25 How. Pr. 438. In Irwin v. Bank, supra, it is said: "The word [proceeding] is generally applicable to any step taken by a suitor to obtain the interposition or action of a court." In Wilson v. Allen, the court said: "The term 'proceeding' is generally applicable to any step taken by a party in the progress of a civil action; anything done from the commencement to the termination is a proceeding." In this case respondents objected to a settlement of appellants' bill of exceptions, and moved the court to disregard it, on the ground that it was not filed within the stipulated time. These were steps taken in the action "to obtain the interposition or action of the court," which, according to the cases cited, amounted to a proceeding against the appellants, even within the letter, and certainly within the spirit, of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not distinguishable in principle from a proceeding to obtain a judgment by default. It is from this proceeding that appellants ask relief; and I think the court had the power to grant it, upon a proper showing that the default of appellants resulted solely from their excusable mistake or neglect, and that the relief will promote justice. Such a showing, if made, brought the matter within the jurisdiction conferred by section 493 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 456; Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502, 23 Pac. Rep. 50, 227.

3. I think the showing made by appellants was sufficient, and that the court should have granted the relief asked. There appears to be no reason to doubt that the failure to serve and file the proposed bill of exceptions within the stipulated time was caused solely and entirely by an excusable inadvertence of one of the attorneys for plaintiffs, (Mr. Stonesifer,) who was also one of the plaintiffs in the action, and therefore directly interested in having the proposed bill served in time. Before reading the stipulation, (which had been prepared in San Francisco and sent to Mr. Wright at Modesto,) Mr. Stonesifer had the impression that the time to be allowed by it was thirty days in addition to the time allowed by law, and upon hastily glancing over it and reading "thirty days, he assumed that it was so, without carefully reading the whole stipulation. This was negligence, but under the circumstances, and considering that the time allowed by such stipulations is generally expressed to be in addition to the time allowed by law, and that the stipulation could have no other effect than to add to the time allowed by law, I think the negligence was excusable; and so thought the court that heard the motion, as appears by its opinion. It certainly cannot be attributed to bad faith. It also appears that the granting of the relief would be in furtherance of justice. I therefore think the order should be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Thomson v. Bettens et al. (No. 14,562.)

Mortgages—Foreclosure—Deficiency Judgment against Mortgagor's Grantee.

In an action to foreclose a purchase-money mortgage, brought against the mortgagor and one B., who purchased from him after the mortgage was given, it was not error to refuse a deficiency judgment against B. on the ground that he assumed the mortgage debt, where, in his answer and testimony, he denied that he assumed the debt, and the only evidence to the contrary was the testimony of the mortgagor that in purchasing the land and executing the mortgage he was acting as agent for B., and with the purpose of conveying to him, as he afterwards did; that he had purchased other land for him in the same way, and he had always assumed the mortgages thereon; and where it does not otherwise appear that the mortgagor acted in this particular transaction as agent for B.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Eva R. Thomson against Philip A. Bettens, Sr., and E. S. Babcock to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff in part as prayed, the court refusing to give a deficiency judgment against Babcock, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Ewing, for appellant. Works, Gibson & Titus and Johnstone Jones, for respondents.

Foote, C. The plaintiff, under the name of Eva R. Casady, before she became by marriage Mrs. Thomson, sold a piece of land to Philip A. Bettens, Sr., and took his promissory note for $3,200, payable at a future date, with interest, and secured to be paid by a mortgage upon the land transferred by deed to Bettens. Bettens transferred it by deed to E. S. Babcock. The note remaining unpaid when due, Mrs. Thomson endeavored to foreclose her mortgage, and to obtain a deficiency judgment for any balance that the property might not bring at sheriff's sale against Bettens and Babcock. The ground upon which it is sought to hold Babcock for a deficiency judgment is, as set out in the complaint, that at the date of the execution of the note and mortgage by Bettens, and of the date of the transfer of the property by deed from Bettens to Babcock, the latter "assumed and agreed with said Bettens to fully pay and discharge at maturity the promissory note and mortgage set forth herein, and all the debts and obligations evidenced thereby." The court below found that no such assumption or agreement was made by Babcock, and thereupon refused to render any deficiency judgment against him, but ordered the mortgage foreclosed, and a deficiency judgment against Bettens. Babcock, in his answer, denied that he had undertaken or assumed to pay the note and mortgage. Bettens, in his answer, endeavors to relieve himself of all responsibility in the premises, except as to the foreclosure of the mortgage as against the property involved, by claiming that he was merely the agent of Babcock, and bought the property for him, and that his principal was therefore responsible for the payment of the note and mortgage. Mrs. Thomson, when on the stand as a witness, declared that she never knew Babcock as a principal in the transaction, either from himself or Bettens. Bettens, who, upon this state of facts, was held by the court for the deficiency, is not appealing or complaining. There is no direct evidence at all by which it could be inferred positively that Babcock did agree with Bettens to assume and pay the note and mortgage, except what at a casual examination might seem such,—that of Bettens himself. But when we come to examine closely what he says in the light of the defense he made,—that is, that Babcock was principal and he agent,—we cannot say that such agreement was made. It was for the plaintiff affirmatively to show that Babcock did make this agreement with Bettens, which would inure to her benefit, under the rule laid down in section 1559, Civil Code. "A contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties rescind it." And under that enunciated by Mr. Justice McKee in his concurring opinion in the case of Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 363: "Where a purchaser of real estate from a mortgagor assumes payment of the mortgage debt as a part of the consideration of his contract of purchase, there arises out of the transaction, upon the principle of subrogation, a cause of action for the benefit of the mortgagee," etc. And see, also, Pellier v. Gillespie, 67 Cal. 583, 8 Pac. Rep. 185. But, as we have seen, the plaintiff could not and did not give evidence as to any such express agreement. Nor do the letters of Babcock, in the record, show its existence. When Mr. Bettens comes to testify, although he says that he had a conversation or agreement with Babcock on the day the land was mortgaged and sold by him to Babcock, he also says: "I can't state any conversation." And the perusal of the record of his testimony shows that he was going upon the general idea that he was only the agent of Babcock, and he assumes from that that Babcock was to pay the note and mortgage. He says again: "I came to town either the same day or shortly afterwards, and I immediately transferred this property to the defendant Babcock, he assuming the payment of the note. There was nothing said then that I know of, or I don't recall there was anything said about it. It was simply understood I was to transfer the property to him, and he assumed the payment of all obligations. I always remained under the impression it was so worded in the deed. Other deeds have it where I made purchases of land for him. Under the same transaction I made other purchases for him,—a great many thousand dollars' worth. He paid the half of the others, and assumed the payment of the mortgages when I transferred them to him. When I came in after making the purchase from the plaintiff, I saw the defendant Babcock personally in his office. I told him I would go out and make a deed to him for this property. He said, 'All right;' at least it was assented to. I do not recollect that the note or mortgage was mentioned." It seems as if this witness, when he speaks of an understanding or agreement, means one which he alone supposed to exist, either from the fact that he was acting as the agent of Babcock, or from the fact that all the deeds he made to Babcock of lands, except that herein involved, contained a clause binding Babcock to assume the mortgage debt resting on the property conveyed to him; for otherwise he could certainly have stated at least something of the language of such an assumption or agreement which it is claimed the defendant Babcock made. It is not to be said, therefore, that the trial court acted without legal justification in finding as it did as to the issue under discussion. For these reasons we advise that the judgment and order refusing a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

HEATHMAN et ux. v. HOLMES et al. (No. 14,692.)

HOMESTEAD—USE OF, FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES—ABANDONMENT.

Plaintiff executed and duly recorded a declaration of homestead on a certain house and lot owned by him, and afterwards built a large addition to the house, and then leased the greater part thereof to a woman, who used such part for a boarding-house. Plaintiff in his lease reserved several rooms, where he and his family continued to live, though they took their meals with the lessee. Held, that plaintiff did not thereby lose his right of homestead. MCFARLAND, J. Plaintiffs obtained a writ of injunction enjoining the sale under execution of certain premises claimed by them as a homestead. On motion of defendants the injunction was dissolved; and from the order dissolving it the plaintiffs appeal. The only question in the case is whether or not the premises constitute the legal homestead of the appellants. The evidence shows, substantially, these facts: In 1883, the appellant M. F. Heathman purchased the lot of land involved, situated in the residence part of the city of Los Angeles, "for the purpose of erecting a dwelling-house thereon, and making the same a home and dwelling-place for himself and family." In the summer of 1885 he moved into the house with his family, consisting of a wife and daughter, and has resided on the premises with his family continuously ever since. On February 17, 1890, the said M. F. Heathman duly executed a declaration of homestead upon the said premises, which was on the same day duly recorded. However, in 1888, he built a large addition to the house, and in October of that year he leased the greater part of the house to Mrs. Samantha Kelly for a term of three years. He reserved from the lease two main rooms over the parlors, and also a bath-room, and certain other privileges, and he, with the family, continued to live and make their home in the house until about March 1, 1890, when Mrs. Kelly forfeited her lease, and left the house; Heathman and his family remaining in the house and continuing to make it their home. He was not the lessee of Mrs. Kelly of the part of the house used by him and his family while Mrs. Kelly was there, but that part of the house was reserved from the operation of the lease from him to her. The rooms thus reserved were taken care of by his family, although he and his family took their meals with Mrs. Kelly at a certain price agreed upon when the lease was made, and which was deducted from the monthly rent due him from her. The part of the building leased by her was used by her as a boarding and lodging house. Two witnesses—the said Mrs. Kelly and one J. A. Kelly—swore that the addition to the house was built for hotel purposes, and with special reference to its use as an hotel. Heathman testified that he built the addition partly on account of financial loss in his business, and partly because, his wife not being physically strong enough to bear the cares of housekeeping, he decided to adopt measures by which his family could have their board furnished in their own house.

We think that the court below erred in dissolving the injunction. We have not been referred to any decision of this court where the facts were exactly like those in the case at bar; but it has been held here that using a building partly, or even chiefly, for business purposes, or renting part of it, is not inconsistent with the right of homestead, provided it is, and continues to be, the bona fide residence of the family. Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181; Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 195, 10 Pac. Rep. 406; Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 226, 22 Pac. Rep. 1145. In other states this rule has been very broadly stated. In Phelps v. Rooney, 9 Wis. 70, for instance,—perhaps a somewhat extreme case,—the homestead claimant owned a building three stories high in front and four at the rear. The court say that "the style of the building externally is that of a store, and it is situated in a compact block on one of the principal business streets of the city of Milwaukee." The basement and the first story and a room of the second story were rented and occupied by tenants as a wholesale and retail store; the balance of the second story and the third story were occupied by the claimant and his family as a dwelling. The property was much more valuable for business than for residence purposes. The store would command a rent of $1,500 per annum, while the rooms used as a residence would not rent for more than $250 or $300. But the court held the homestead to be good, saying: "Nor does the owner forfeit the benefit of his exemption by devoting some, even the most valuable, portion of the building to another use than a mere residence of his family." And there is no substantial difference between the statutory provisions there and here, except that there the amount of land which may be covered by a homestead is limited. See, also, Rush v. Gordon, (Kan.) 16 Pac. Rep. 700. In the case at bar it is not contended by respondents that the appellants did not continue to reside in the building and to make it their home, or that they had any other residence or home. They have never ceased for a day to reside there from 1885 to the present time. But it is contended that because for part of that time they leased part of the building, although residing themselves in the part not leased, therefore they lost the right of homestead. We cannot concur in this view. To do so would be to hold that appellants lost their residence without changing it, and left their home without going away from it. In Ackley v. Chamberlain, supra, FIELD, C. J., said that "the question whether property devoted chiefly to business purposes can be subject to a homestead claim is full of embarrassment;" but we think that there should, at least, be no embarrassment in a case like the one at bar, where, after the family had lived on the premises for years and devoted it entirely to a home, it was concluded to enlarge the building for both domestic and financial reasons. It would be strange, indeed, if the occupants of a house could not use part of it for family revenue, no matter how favorable the opportunity might be to do so, without forfeiting the home itself. There is nothing in the homestead laws which prohibits such use, and it has been settled here that "the homestead statute is a remedial measure, and should be liberally construed." Schuyler v. Broughton, 76 Cal. 524, 18 Pac. Rep. 436; Southwick v. Davis, 78 Cal. 504, 21 Pac. Rep. 121.

The contention of respondents rests almost entirely on the authority of Laughlin v. Wright, 63 Cal. 113, and mainly upon some language used in the opinion delivered in that case. The statement of facts in the opinion is very meager; but it appears that the premises were used primarily and principally as an hotel, and that the residence of the family there was merely "incidental to the business of running an hotel," and that when they became financially embarrassed "they sought a residence elsewhere." So far, therefore, as the facts appear in that case, the family had never really made the premises their bona fide home. In the opinion the case of Ackley v. Chamberlain is cited approvingly, and the latter case is entirely inconsistent with the conclusion which respondents here seek to draw from language used in Laughlin v. Wright. The case of Maloney v. Hefer, 75 Cal. 422, 17 Pac. Rep. 539, also cited by respondents, was materially different from the case at bar. In that case there were two houses entirely separate and distinct from each other. The family lived in one of the houses and rented the other; and it was merely held that the homestead did not include the house in which the claimants did not live. We are satisfied that from the facts developed in the case at bar the appellants are entitled to their asserted homestead rights, and that the court erred in dissolving the injunction. Of course, the decision here has no effect upon any right which respondents may assert to reach the excess of the value of the property over the homestead valuation. The order dissolving the injunction is reversed.

HILL v. McKAY. (No. 13,964.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—CANCELLATION—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Plaintiff, the owner of timber lands on a slough, below tide-water, agreed with defendant's assignors, who owned timber lands above tide-water on the same slough, to allow them a right of way for a railroad for logging purposes across plaintiff's land to the slough below plaintiff's landing, for a given period, at a fixed annual rental, defendant's assignors agreeing that they "will, providing they make landings and deposit their logs down stream from the present landings of" plaintiff, "purchase yearly all logs hauled by" plaintiff, "and deposited in said slough, paying therefor the prevailing market price." In case a price could not be agreed on, the same to be fixed by arbitration. Defendant's assignors built their road and constructed a landing on plaintiff's land a short distance below his landing, and several years later carried their road 240 rods further down the slough, and set up a landing on land other than the plaintiff's. Held, that the removal of the landing did not release them from their obligation under the contract to purchase plaintiff's logs.

2. The refusal of defendant's assignors to purchase plaintiff's logs for any one year after tender of the same, and the sale of a part of the logs thereafter by plaintiff, did not cancel their obligation to purchase the remainder during said year.

3. Where defendant's assignors refused to be bound by the contract to accept or purchase plaintiff's logs for any one year, deposited in the slough, it was not incumbent on plaintiff to offer to determine by arbitration "the prevailing market price."

4. The measure of damages for such refusal to purchase plaintiff's logs is the market price at the nearest market at the time of delivery, less the expense of transportation; and in determining the cost of transportation plaintiff is entitled to recover the additional expense of rafting his logs to market caused by the obstructions placed in the slough by defendant's assignors below plaintiff's landing.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Hill against Rebecca McKay. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellant. J. D. H. Chamberlin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. At and before the time of the execution of the contract hereinafter set out, the plaintiff was the owner of timber lands adjacent to and including a portion of Ryan's slough, in the county of Humboldt. This slough is connected with Humboldt bay, and is of sufficient size and depth to float rafts of saw-logs from plaintiff's lands. Near the head of tidewater in this slough, plaintiff had a landing at which he dumped logs into the slough, and thence floated them to market, on Humboldt bay. During the same time Allan McKay, Alexander Connick, and John A. Sinclair, copartners under the name of McKay & Co., were engaged in the business of logging on lands adjacent to Ryan's slough, above the plaintiff's landing, and above tide-water, where the capacity of the slough was considerably less than at and below plaintiff's landing. Besides, at plaintiff's landing, the slough was often obstructed by his logs. McKay & Co., therefore, desired to carry their logs by railroad to a point on the slough below plaintiff's landing, but, in order to do this, they must acquire the right of way for their road over plaintiff's land. Under these circumstances the following agreement was executed: "Know all men by these presents that I, Charles W. Hill, of the county of Humboldt, state of California, party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of three hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States to me in hand paid by Allen McKay, of the city and county of San Francisco, and Alexander Connick, of said county of Humboldt, all in said state, parties of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and for other good and valuable considerations, do hereby grant to said parties of the second part a right of way two (2) rods in width for logging and lumbering purposes over and upon the south-west quarter of section number thirty, (30,) and the north-west quarter of section number thirty-one, (31,) in township number five (5) north, of range number one (1) east, of Humboldt meridian. Said way being more particularly described as beginning at the Freese dam, on Ryan's slough, at the intersection of the west bank thereof with the Humboldt meridian line, and running from thence north along or near said meridian line one-half (½) miles (more or less) to its intersection with the west bank of said slough and Humboldt meridian line, said way to be at no point more than two hundred and sixteen (216) feet from said meander line. Together with the right to construct and maintain over such way all such roads, railroads, bridges, or other structures for logging and lumbering purposes as such parties shall choose. All of which said rights shall continue and remain in full force and effect for the period of ten (10) years from the date hereof; and at the expiration of this instrument shall, at the option of said parties of the second part, be renewed in periods of ten (10) years each, not to exceed in all the full period of thirty (30) years from the date of these presents, subject always to the same terms and conditions. In consideration whereof said parties of the second part agree to pay to said party of the first part, in gold coin, on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1884, the sum of three hundred dollars, and a like sum annually thereafter. That after the logging season of the year 1883 said parties of the second part will, providing they make landings and deposit their logs down stream from the present landings of said party of the first part, purchase yearly all logs hauled by said party of the first part, and deposited in said slough, paying therefor the prevailing market rates. It is also agreed, by and between the parties hereto, that, providing they fail to agree upon said market rate, then it shall be determined by arbitration. That each of the parties hereto shall select one person to act as arbitrator, and, if the two arbitrators fail to agree, they, the arbitrators, shall select a third person, and the decision of the arbitrators shall be final. The covenants herein contained are to bind the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of the respective parties. Time is hereby expressly declared to be of the essence of this contract. Executed in duplicate this sixth day of April, A. D. 1883, as witness our hands and seals. C. W. HILL. [Seal.] ALLAN MCKAY. [Seal.] ALEX. CONNICK. [Seal.]

It is admitted that McKay and Connick, in executing this agreement, acted for the copartnership, and that the copartnership was bound by the agreement. In 1883 McKay & Co. constructed their railroad to a point on the slough about 120 rods below the plaintiff's landing, where they established a landing at which they continued to dump their logs into the slough, until the latter part of 1887, and during all that period purchased plaintiff's logs according to the agreement. During the year of 1887, McKay & Co. extended their railroad from this landing a distance of about 240 rods in a direct line across a bow in the slough, and terminating at a point on the slough about 385 rods (by way of the stream) below their dam used in connection with their upper landing, and there established a new landing, at which they have ever since dumped all their logs. Between their upper and lower landings there is a junction of Ryan's slough with Freshwater slough, and it was a disputed question at the trial, upon which the evidence was conflicting, whether the name of the slough below this junction is "Ryan's" slough or "Freshwater" slough. On September 12, 1888, the defendant acquired all the copartnership property of McKay & Co., including the agreement above set out, and it is admitted that she is bound by that agreement as McKay & Co. were bound by it before it was assigned to her. The object of this action is to recover from defendant damages for an alleged breach of that agreement by her in the year 1888. The complaint alleges that during the year 1888 the plaintiff cut, hauled, and put into said slough, below his landing, 1,240 saw-logs, containing 1,078,232 feet of merchantable lumber of the value of $10,782.32, which, on the 12th day of September, 1888, and many times thereafter during the year 1888, he tendered to the defendant and demanded that she purchase the same, in accordance with the terms of said agreement, which she "absolutely and unqualifiedly refused to do, and she still does absolutely and unqualifiedly refuse to purchase the same at any price or upon any terms or conditions; that plaintiff has ever since been and is now unable to sell the said saw-logs; and plaintiff avers that by the said breach of said agreement, in not purchasing his said saw-logs, he has been and is damaged in the sum of $10,782.32." The answer denies the alleged tender of the logs; denies that 1,240 logs were all the logs hauled by plaintiff, and deposited in Ryan's slough during the year 1888; denies the alleged value of the logs; denies that McKay & Co., or defendant, during the year 1888, deposited any logs in Ryan's slough "down stream from" plaintiff's landing; alleges that, without the consent of defendant, plaintiff sold to other persons 542 of the logs hauled and deposited in the slough by him during the year 1888; and denies all damages.

The case was tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,590.80, from which defendant brings this appeal on the judgment roll containing a bill of exceptions which raises questions of both law and fact.

1. Appellant's counsel contend that defendant's lower landing, where she and her predecessors deposited all their logs during the year 1888, was not upon Ryan's slough, but was upon Freshwater slough, and that the contract bound them to purchase plaintiff's logs only while they deposited logs in Ryan's slough below plaintiff's landing; and upon this point they requested the following instruction to the jury, which the court refused: "I charge you that, if you find from the evidence that all the logs that were deposited by McKay & Co. or by defendant, during the year 1888, were deposited from landings maintained and used by them on the stream formed by the junction of Ryan's slough with Freshwater slough, and below said junction, then I instruct you that defendant is not liable under said contract set forth in said amended complaint, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

Considering the admitted circumstances under which the agreement was made, and the conflicting evidence as to the extent of Ryan's slough below the junction of the two sloughs, I think the court did not err in refusing the requested instruction. The object of McKay & Co. in procuring the agreement was to enable them to make their landings on tide-water below plaintiff's landing, where the slough was of greater capacity, and would not be obstructed by plaintiff's dam and logs. The agreement on their part to purchase plaintiff's logs during the term of the lease, at the prevailing market rates, "providing they make landings and deposit their logs down stream from the present landings" of plaintiff, was evidently intended to compensate plaintiff for the advantage he gave them in the change of the relative positions of their respective landings, whereby they were permitted to obstruct the navigation of the slough below his landing by their dam and logs. By their agreement to purchase his logs at market rates, he was relieved from rafting his logs, and therefore their obstructions below his landing did not affect his interests. Besides, the agreement does not fix any points below plaintiff's landing at which McKay & Co. were to establish their landings. They might have established a landing at the point of their present lower landing in the first instance, by constructing 240 rods of additional railroad. The language of the agreement is, "down stream from the present landings of said party of the first part," not down stream upon Ryan's slough. Ryan's slough is not mentioned in that part of the agreement relating to the purchase of plaintiff's logs. Nor is there anything elsewhere in the agreement limiting the words "down stream" to Ryan's slough, while the circumstances under which the agreement was made plainly indicate that no such limitation was intended.

On the theory of defendant's counsel the question as to whether or not Ryan's slough extends down to and includes defendant's lower landing is a material question of fact. As such, it was tacitly submitted to the jury on conflicting evidence without any instruction as to the legal effect of a finding upon it, none having been requested, except the one under consideration, and another to the same effect, by defendant's counsel; yet the requested instruction assumed that Ryan's slough extends only to its junction with Freshwater, and thereby took from the jury the question as to whether it does so or not. Therefore, whether the question was material or not, the requested instruction was erroneous; although, as above indicated, I think the question was immaterial; and, had an instruction been asked to this effect, judging from the opinion of the court on defendant's motion for nonsuit, it probably would have been given.

2. It is contended for appellant that the defendant was not bound to purchase less than all the logs hauled by plaintiff, and deposited in the slough in any one year; and that plaintiff did not tender to defendant all the logs hauled and deposited in the slough in the year 1888, but sold a considerable portion of them to other parties. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove that all the logs hauled or deposited in the slough by plaintiff during the year 1888 had been tendered by him either to McKay & Co. before September 12th, or to defendant on and after September 12th of that year, and that he had sold no logs to other parties until after they had been so tendered, and after McKay & Co., or defendant, had absolutely refused to accept or purchase such logs, or any part thereof, upon any terms whatever, claiming that they were not bound by the agreement to purchase any logs from plaintiff during 1888, because, during that year, they had deposited no logs in Ryan's slough, down stream from plaintiff's landing. Under this state of the evidence counsel for the defendant requested two instructions to the jury which the court refused to give as requested, but gave with modifying additions, as follows, the additions being italicized: "(11) I charge you that, if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff did not tender to defendant, or offer to sell to her, all the logs hauled by him and deposited in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, then your verdict must be for the defendant; unless you further find from the evidence that defendant or McKay & Co. absolutely refused to accept or purchase from plaintiff any logs hauled and deposited by him in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, in which case a tender of said logs by plaintiff would not have been necessary. (12) I charge you that if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, before making the tender to defendant alleged in the complaint, had sold to persons other than defendant, or McKay & Co., a portion of the logs hauled by him and deposited in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, then your verdict must be for the defendant. But if you find from the evidence that, before making such sales, plaintiff tendered to defendant all the logs deposited by him in Ryan's slough at that time, during that year, and that the defendant, or McKay & Co., absolutely refused to accept or purchase from plaintiff, under said contract, any logs during said year, and that, in making such sales, plaintiff was acting upon such refusal, then, in that case, he could recover in this action." The court, of its own motion, further instructed the jury on this point as follows: "If you find from the evidence that plaintiff sold a portion of the logs hauled and deposited by him in Ryan's slough, during the year 1888, to other parties than the defendant or McKay & Co., but that no logs were sold by him during said year until after he had tendered all of his logs to defendant or McKay & Co., or until after defendant or McKay & Co. had unequivocally refused to accept from plaintiff his logs under said contract during said year, and that, in making such sales to other parties, the defendant was acting upon such refusal, then, in such case, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover whatever damages he may have suffered, if any, by the refusal of defendant to accept and pay for the logs deposited by plaintiff in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, and remaining therein at the time this action was brought."

Appellant's counsel contend that the court erred in refusing the first two of these instructions as requested, and in giving them as modified, and also in giving the third. In the first place, it is urged that these instructions are erroneous, so far as they "laid down the rule that plaintiff could recover without proof of a tender." But I do not understand them as laying down such a rule. In the second place, it is said that they are erroneous "in so far as they charged that a prior refusal by McKay & Co. would, in any event, entitle plaintiff to recover without proof of a tender to defendant." They do not so charge. Nor does the plaintiff, by his complaint or otherwise, seek to recover for any breach of the contract by McKay & Co., before the assignment of the agreement to defendant. The evidence offered by plaintiff tending to prove a tender to McKay & Co. prior to September 12, 1888, and their refusal to purchase, could have had no other effect in this case than to excuse plaintiff's sale of a portion of the logs hauled in 1888 after they refused to purchase. The defendant is not sued for or on account of any logs sold by plaintiff before she became the assignee of the agreement and the owner of all the partnership property; but only for not purchasing a specified number of logs which were alleged to be on hand and in the slough at the times they were tendered to her on and after September 12, 1888. The third of the instructions under consideration limits the damages to such as resulted from defendant's refusal to purchase "the logs deposited by plaintiff in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, and remaining therein at the time this action was brought." After McKay & Co. refused to purchase, it was not only the privilege of the plaintiff, but his duty, to sell as many of his logs as he could for the highest obtainable price; and, had he succeeded in selling all for a price equal to that which McKay & Co. agreed to pay, he could have recovered from them no more than nominal damages, (Utter v. Chapman, 38 Cal. 659; Winans v. Lumber Co., 66 Cal. 61, 4 Pac. Rep. 952;) but however this may be, no question as to the logs sold by plaintiff is involved in this case, except the question as to whether McKay & Co. unqualifiedly refused to purchase them after tender by the plaintiff. The refusal of McKay & Co. to purchase, and the sale of a part of the logs thereafter by plaintiff, did not cancel their obligation to purchase the remainder during the year 1888, (Sedg. Dam. § 754;) and their obligation to purchase the remainder during the year 1888 devolved upon the defendant by the express terms of the lease, viz., "the covenants herein contained are to bind the * * * assigns of the respective parties."

3. Defendant's counsel requested an instruction applicable to the arbitration paragraph of the agreement, which, as requested, the court refused, but gave with an addition as follows, the addition being in italics: "I charge you that, if it appears from the evidence that plaintiff and defendant failed to agree upon the market rate for said logs, and if the evidence fails to show that plaintiff demanded that such rate should be determined by arbitration, then your verdict must be for the defendant; unless you further find from the evidence that the defendant absolutely and unqualifiedly refused to be bound by said contract, and to accept or purchase from plaintiff the logs hauled and deposited by him in Ryan's slough during the year 1888, in which case it was not incumbent upon plaintiff, after such refusal of performance on the part of the defendant, if such refusal was made, to offer to determine by arbitration the prevailing market rate." The only objection urged to the addition made by the court is that there was no evidence tending to prove the facts therein hypothetically stated. But in this I think counsel are mistaken.

4. Appellant contends that the court did not properly instruct the jury as to the measure of damages, and consequently that the damages are excessive. I think this point should be sustained. The evidence tended to show that the market for logs nearest to the place in Ryan's slough, where, by the contract, plaintiff was to deliver and defendant to accept the logs in question, was at the mills in the vicinity of the city of Eureka, on Humboldt bay, and that, if there was any prevailing market price at the place where the logs were to be delivered, it was the same as the market price at the sawmills on the bay, less the costs of transportation. The court, of its own motion, instructed the jury as follows: "If you find for the plaintiff upon the issues submitted to you, then you will have to estimate the amount of damages; and I charge you that the measure of damages in this case is the difference, if any, between the sum which the logs hauled and deposited in Ryan's slough by plaintiff during the year 1888, and remaining therein at the commencement of this action, would have brought in the market here, on Humboldt bay, at the prevailing rates during the year 1888, and the value of said logs to the plaintiff as they lay in the slough, at the time of defendant's refusal to accept them, if such refusal was made." As contended by counsel for appellant, I think this instruction is based upon a misconstruction of the agreement as to the price to be paid for the logs in case there was no market price at Ryan's slough, where the logs were to be delivered, in that the instruction allows nothing to be deducted from the market value at Humboldt bay—the nearest market—on account of expenses of transportation. Section 3311 of the Civil Code, so far as applicable to this case, is as follows: "The detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is deemed to be: (1) * * * (2) If the property has not been resold in the manner prescribed by section 3049, the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market, over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof, if the buyer had accepted it." The agreement does not directly or conclusively fix the price to be annually paid, but provides that defendant shall purchase all logs deposited in the slough, "paying therefor the prevailing market rates." Unless controlled by circumstances dehors the agreement as written, this means the prevailing market rates at the place and times of delivery, if that can be ascertained; but, if no market rate at such place and times can be ascertained, it means the market rates at the nearest market at the times of delivery, less the expenses of transportation, (Sedg. Dam., 8th Ed., §§ 738, 739;) this being the rule in case of a breach of the agreement by the buyer, when the title has not passed. In such case, "when there is no market at the place of delivery, the price of getting the goods to the nearest market is to be subtracted from the price at that market in order to find the value at the place of delivery." Sedg. Dam. § 753. By this rule the value of the logs to plaintiff (the seller) at the place of delivery was the market value at Humboldt bay, less costs of transportation, "at such time after the breach of the contract as would have sufficed, with reasonable diligence, for the seller to effect a resale," (Civil Code, § 3353;) that is, at such time after the breach as would have sufficed to transport the logs to Humboldt bay, and resell them at the market rate there.

From the foregoing consideration it seems necessarily to follow that the value of the logs to plaintiff at the place of delivery, and at such time after the breach as would have sufficed to transport and resell them, was precisely equal to "the amount due from the buyer," (defendant,) according to the agreement, and therefore that the plaintiff was entitled to only nominal damages. Sedg. Dam. 753. Were there any circumstances dehors the written agreement which would warrant a construction of the agreement different from that above given? The only claim that the evidence tended to prove any such circumstance is to be found in the opinion of the court upon denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, in which, as to this, the court said: "Now, the view I take of it is that, under that contract, considering the advantages which the plaintiff had yielded to them, (McKay & Co.,) they were willing to take his logs there as he deposited them in Ryan's slough, and pay him whatever was the prevailing market rate for saw-logs in the vicinity of Humboldt bay during the year that the deposit was made." This assumes, without evidence, that the payment of the annual rent of $300, and the purchase of plaintiff's logs by McKay & Co., at their market value in the nearest market, less the cost of transportation, would not fully compensate plaintiff for the advantages which he "had yielded to them." There is not a particle of evidence tending to prove that $300 per year for the right of way for defendant's road was not full compensation for the grant of that right. The only other advantage that plaintiff yielded to McKay & Co. was the privilege of establishing their landings and dumping their logs into the slough below his landing, and thus, to some extent, obstructing the rafting of his logs. For this, was not the purchase of all his logs at his landing at a price equal to the market value in the nearest market, less the cost of transportation to such market, adequate compensation? He was thereby relieved from rafting his logs to market; yet realized from the sale of them at his landing precisely what he would have realized if he had never yielded to McKay & Co. any advantage whatever. This, certainly, was full compensation for all advantages yielded by him, and there is no evidence that both parties to the agreement did not so consider and intend. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant, however, which, if the agreement is, in any degree, ambiguous or uncertain, strongly tends to confirm the construction for which the appellant contends, by showing the action of the parties under the agreement during the five years preceding the year 1888. Alexander Connick, one of the parties to the agreement, testified that during that period, "the price of the logs in each year was arrived at and regulated by the price of lumber in the market. We based the price upon the market rates here at the mill, delivered at the mill on Humboldt bay. We paid him that market rate, less the cost of transportation,—the rafting them out. That was the market rate of his logs as they lay in the slough below his dam. * * * In fixing these rates, the cost of transportation was discussed between McKay & Co. and the plaintiff." This testimony was undisputed. When the meaning of the language of a contract is considered doubtful, the acts of the parties done under it afford one of the most reliable clews to the intention of the parties. Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 108; Pio Pico v. Coleman, 47 Cal. 65; Truett v. Adams, 66 Cal. 218, 5 Pac. Rep. 96. Therefore, conceding that the agreement is ambiguous or uncertain as to the price to be paid for the logs, this practical construction of it by the acts of the parties more certainly indicates their intention than does the supposed inadequacy of compensation for advantages yielded by plaintiff, adverted to by the court.

5. It is contended for respondent, however, that the defendant and her assignors have so obstructed the slough below his landing as to make the expense of rafting his logs to market much greater than it was before they made their landings below his, and much greater than it would be now, but for such obstructions; and, against the objection of defendant's counsel, plaintiff was permitted by the court to introduce evidence tending to prove this. The ground of the objection to this evidence was that it was irrelevant to any issue in the case. As to the effect of this evidence the court instructed the jury as follows: "The testimony in relation to the condition of the slough, and as to whether obstructions have existed therein or not, and, if so, to what extent, was admitted solely for the purpose of informing you as to whether said logs could have been taken to the bay or to market, and, if so, with what facility and at what expense, and in that connection to be considered by you with the other evidence, in estimating the value of the logs to the plaintiff as they lay in the slough, in the fall of 1888." Thus limited, I think the evidence was not irrelevant. The plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages the excess of the expenses of rafting his logs to market over and above what such expenses would have been if no obstructions had been placed in the slough by defendant or her assigns. In other words, he is entitled to recover a sum equal to the additional expense of rafting his logs to market caused by the obstructions which have been placed in the slough by defendant or her assignors. For the purpose of ascertaining this sum, it would be necessary to prove the expense of rafting in an unobstructed condition of the slough, and also the expense of rafting in the obstructed condition caused by defendant or her predecessors. The difference would be the true measure of damages. But there was no evidence of what would have been the expense of rafting in an unobstructed state of the slough, and consequently no evidence of any difference. The plaintiff introduced no evidence of the expense of rafting in any condition of the slough, and of the nine witnesses who testified on behalf of defendant as to such expense in the actual condition of the slough during 1888, and since, one estimated it at 45 cents per 1,000 feet, five at 50 cents, one at 60 cents, and two at 75 cents. At 75 cents per 1,000 feet, the transportation of the 1,078,232 feet alleged to have been tendered to defendant would have cost $808.67, yet the verdict is $1,590.80. It therefore appears that the damages are excessive. I think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted.

UPTON v. UPTON. (No. 14,591.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

Code Civil Proc. § 170, provides that no judge shall try a case in which he has been attorney for either party, but that the section shall not apply to the power of transferring the action to some other court. Section 398 provides that, if the judge is disqualified from acting, the case must be transferred to a court the parties may agree upon, or, if they do not agree, then to the nearest court. The constitution authorizes a judge of any superior court to hold a superior court in any county, at the request of the judge of the superior court thereof. Held, where a superior court judge, who was disqualified to try a certain case, "called in" another judge to try such case, that the parties were not entitled to have the case "transferred" to another court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; JOSEPH H. BUDD, Judge.

Action by Thomas Upton against Albert E. Upton. To an order overruling plaintiff's motion for a change of venue, plaintiff excepted. Affirmed.

R. E. Houghton, for appellant. T. C. Law, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion to change the place of trial. The motion was made on the ground that Hon. J. K. LAW, judge of the superior court of Merced county, was disqualified by reason of having acted as attorney for defendant prior to the time of his election. The notice of motion fixed Saturday, the 7th day of March, 1891, at 10 A. M., as the time for hearing the motion. On that day and at that hour Hon. JOSEPH H. BUDD, judge of the superior court of San Joaquin county, at the request of Judge LAW, held a session of the superior court of Merced county, and called the motion referred to for hearing and determination, whereupon the plaintiff insisted that Judge LAW should hear the motion, because it was his duty to hear it, and he had no authority to call in another judge to pass upon the motion, and thereby deprive the plaintiff of his right to have the case transferred to an adjoining county. The request was denied, and an order was made by Judge BUDD denying the motion to change the place of trial, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted. In passing upon the motion the judge stated that he was ready and willing to try the case at that or any other time for which it might be set for trial.

Appellant relies upon sections 170 and 398, Code Civil Proc.: "No justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding * * * when he has been attorney or counsel for either party in the action or proceeding. But the provisions of this section shall not apply to the arrangement of the calendar, or the regulation of the order of business, nor to the power of transferring the action or proceeding to some other court." Section 170. "If an action or proceeding is commenced or pending in a court, and the judge or justice thereof is disqualified from acting as such, or if, from any cause, the court orders the place of trial to be changed, it must be transferred for trial to a court the parties may agree upon by stipulation in writing or made in open court and entered in the minutes; or, if they do not so agree, then to the nearest court where the like objection or cause for making the order does not exist; as follows: if in the superior court, to another superior court." Section 398. It is undoubtedly true that if the motion had been entertained by Judge LAW, and there had been no other judge present, qualified to hear the motion, it would have been his duty to grant it. Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 59 Cal. 130; Livermore v. Brundage, 64 Cal. 299; Finn v. Spagnoli, 67 Cal. 330, 7 Pac. Rep. 746. But it has been held here that if the judge who is holding court at the time the motion is heard is qualified to try the case, and ready and willing to try it, the motion should be denied, the court saying that "the provision upon which the appellant relies was intended to secure to litigants a trial before a judge who is not disqualified from acting as such, and nothing more." Paige v. Carroll, 61 Cal. 216. We cannot, without overruling that case, sustain the appellant's contention; but we see no reason for departing from the rule there laid down. It seems to be sanctioned by the provisions of the constitution, which are broad enough to authorize a judge of one superior court to call in a judge of another superior court to hear and determine any matter. "A judge of any superior court may hold a superior court in any county, at the request of a judge of the superior court thereof; and upon the request of the governor it shall be his duty so to do." In view of this constitutional provision, and the construction placed upon these sections by our own court, we deem it unnecessary to consider the cases cited by appellant from other states. Order affirmed.

YOUNG v. DONEGAN. (No. 13,900.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—MATTERS NOT APPARENT OF RECORD.

A contention on appeal that the court erred in matter of law in rejecting a part of appellant's counter-claim cannot be considered where there is no foundation for the point in the record, either by exception or specification.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Frank C. Young against D. F. Donegan. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Richard Dunnigan, for appellant. J. M. Damron, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover $1,769, as the value of labor done and materials furnished by plaintiff in building a house for defendant. The answer of defendant denies that the plaintiff did the amount of labor or furnished the amount of materials alleged in the complaint; and also denies the alleged value of the labor and materials admitted to have been done and furnished, but admits them to have been of the value of $841.70. Defendant also pleads a counter-claim against plaintiff for labor and materials, amounting to $139.75. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment given for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,177.15. From this judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. It is contended for appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify certain findings of fact, as to which his counsel admits that there is a slight conflict of evidence. It seems to me, however, after a careful examination of the evidence, that the conflict is substantial to a degree which precludes consideration of the question here.

2. Appellant's counsel, in his brief, makes the point that the court erred in matter of law in rejecting a part of defendant's counter-claim; but there is no foundation for this point in the record, either by exception or specification. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur. TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

In re KENNEDY'S ESTATE. (No. 14,815.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—INTEREST ON JUDGMENT—RES ADJUDICATA—COSTS.

1. Even though one who, after his claim against an estate was rejected by the executor, recovered a judgment against the estate, to be paid in the due course of administration, was entitled to interest from the date of the rejection to the date of the judgment, the probate court cannot, in ordering the judgment to be paid, allow such interest, where the same was not included in the judgment, since the court, in ordering the claim paid, can base its order only on the transcript of the judgment.

2. Even if the probate court could otherwise order the interest to be paid, the judgment would be a bar to its recovery, since the claimant could have had it included in the judgment when it was rendered.

3. In such case, however, the claimant should be allowed interest on his judgment for costs.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Francisco county; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Thomas E. Curran, as administrator of the estate of Thomas Cushing, deceased, presented to the probate court a judgment against the estate of Philip Kennedy, deceased, and it was allowed as a claim and ordered to be paid. The court refused to allow interest on the claim from the time it was rejected by the executor and executrix of the estate until the date of the judgment, or to allow interest on the judgment for costs, and Curran appeals. Modified.

James Gartlan, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Thomas E. Curran, as administrator of the estate of Thomas Cushing, deceased, recovered a judgment in the sum of $2,642.25 principal and $128 costs against the executor and executrix of the estate of Philip Kennedy, deceased, to be paid in the due course of administration. Thereafter the probate court ordered the judgment and costs to be paid from the assets of the estate, and denied appellant's motion to allow him interest upon the amount of the judgment from the date of the rejection of his claim by the executor and executrix to the date of the rendition of the judgment, and also denied his application for interest upon the amount of his judgment for costs. It is from the order of the court in these regards that this appeal is prosecuted. It would seem, under the authority of Pico v. Stevers, 18 Cal. 376, that upon the recovery of a judgment against an estate upon a rejected claim the creditor is entitled to recover interest from the date of such rejection. In this case it is not entirely clear from the record that the amount of the judgment recovered did not include such interest, but, conceding such to be the fact, still the probate court had no authority to order any amount paid not included in the judgment. A certified transcript of the docket of the judgment forms the claim which is to be paid, and furnishes the evidence upon which the court acts in ordering its payment. Conceding appellant was entitled to recover interest from the date of the rejection of his claim, and the amount of such interest was not included in the judgment rendered, still such judgment is a bar to its recovery. If he failed to ask for such interest in his complaint, or if he asked for it, and his prayer was denied by the court, in either case the judgment is a bar. In the court where the probate proceedings are pending the question as to the amount to which appellant is entitled is res adjudicata by the judgment, and authorities are not necessary to be cited upon the proposition. We think appellant is entitled to legal interest upon the amount of his judgment for costs. Linck v. City of Litchfield, 31 Ill. App. 104. Let the cause be remanded, with directions to the lower court to allow appellant legal interest upon the amount of his cost-bill, and in other respects let the order be affirmed, appellant to pay the costs of this appeal.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

KURTZ v. FORQUER et al. (No. 14,525.)

ACTION ON BOND—FAILURE OF ALL PARTIES TO SIGN—PLEADING—VARIANCE—QUESTIONS ON APPEAL.

1. The fact that a joint and several bond is signed by a part only of those who are named as parties in the body of the instrument does not render it invalid, as against those who have signed, since Code Civil Proc. § 383, allows any or all persons who are severally liable on any instrument to be proceeded against in the same action. Sacramento v. Dunlap, 14 Cal. 421, and People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585, distinguished.

2. Where suit is brought on a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of a certain contract, it is proper to admit the contract in evidence for the purpose of proving its provisions.

3. In an action on a bond alleged to have been executed by certain persons, proof that it was executed by a part only of the said persons is not a material variance, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 469, since those who executed it could not thereby have been misled to their prejudice in making a defense.

4. An alleged error in refusing to strike out a judgment roll which had been admitted in evidence will not be considered on appeal where there is nothing in the record to show what the judgment roll was.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by Christian Kurtz against James M. Forquer and others upon a bond. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willis, Cole & Craig, for appellants. Parris & Fox, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action upon a bond alleged to have been executed by the defendants Forquer and Deyo as principals, and the defendants Allen, Smith, and Stewart as sureties, conditioned for the faithful performance by Forquer and Deyo of a certain contract by which they agreed to build and deliver to plaintiff, free of indebtedness, liens, etc., a certain house. Judgment went for plaintiff against Allen, Smith, and Stewart, and they appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The bond purports to be the bond of all the defendants, but it was, in fact, signed only by Allen, Smith, and Stewart; and it is contended that it created no liability against appellants, because not signed by Forquer and Deyo. Sacramento v. Dunlap, 14 Cal. 421, and People v. Hartley, 21 Cal. 585, are cited to this proposition; but they are not in point, because in those cases the bonds sued on were strictly joint, and not several, while in the case at bar the obligation is expressly joint and several. People v. Love, 25 Cal. 530. In such case the obligors "may, all or any of them, be included in the same action at the option of the plaintiff." Code Civil Proc. § 383. Where several persons are named in the body of an instrument as parties thereto, it is not necessarily invalid as against those who have signed it because others named have not signed. Such a result would follow where it appeared on the face of the instrument or by proof that the person sought to be charged signed upon the consideration that other persons named would also sign. Cavanaugh v. Casselman, 88 Cal. 549, 26 Pac. Rep. 515. Nothing of the kind, however, appears in the case at bar. The three sureties, who stood on the same footing, did sign the instrument; and it is evident that the signatures of the principals, who were already bound by the contract referred to in the bond, were not necessary as a consideration. Moreover, appellants delivered the bond, without the signatures of the principals, to the plaintiff. We think, therefore, that the sureties were liable, so far as this point is concerned.

2. There was no error in the admission in evidence of the written building contract between Forquer and Deyo and plaintiff. The bond referred to such a contract, and it was proper to show what it was.

3. It is contended that there was a fatal variance between the averment of the complaint and the proof, on the ground that the former shows a bond executed by Forquer and Deyo and the other defendants, while the bond offered in evidence was not executed by said Forquer and Deyo. Strictly speaking, it is, perhaps, doubtful if there was a variance; because, while in the body of the complaint it is averred that the principals executed the bond, a copy of the bond which is attached as Exhibit A, and made a part of the complaint, shows that it was not signed by the principals, and the bond offered in evidence was identical with Exhibit A. This was undoubtedly bad pleading, and the complaint could, perhaps, have been successfully assailed by a special demurrer on the ground of ambiguity; but it is not clear that Exhibit A cannot be considered on the point of variance. Assuming, however, that there was such a variance as is contended for, we think it was immaterial, within the meaning of section 469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "no variance between the allegation in the pleading and the proof is to be deemed material unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits." The case was fully tried on its merits, and we do not see how appellants were misled, or in what different position they would have been if the body of the complaint had corresponded exactly with the exhibit. It would be a vain thing to reverse the judgment in order to allow the plaintiff to make an amendment to his complaint which would in no material way change the positions of the parties or the merits of the case.

4. Appellants assign as error the refusal of the court to strike out a certain judgment roll which had been admitted in evidence. With respect to this point it is sufficient to say that, as there is nothing in the record to show what said judgment roll was, we cannot say whether or not it was error to admit it. Dyer v. Leach, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 598.

5. As to the merits of the case, we see no reason to disturb the judgment. There was sufficient evidence to support the findings that there were unsatisfied indebtedness and liens created by the contractors to the extent found by the court, and that the amount of money to be retained by plaintiff on the building contract was appropriated to the satisfaction of liens and indebtedness against the building. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: De Haven, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Harrison, J.; Garoutte, J.; Paterson, J.

Riciotto v. Clement. (No. 14,378.)

Action of Claim and Delivery—When Lies—Possession at Time of Suit.

An action of claim and delivery cannot be maintained, under Code Civil Proc. § 509, against a constable "to recover possession of personal property," which has been wrongfully attached, unless brought before the property has been sold, and while it is still in defendant's possession.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery, brought by Giacomo Riciotto against H. S. Clement, to recover possession of personal property, or for the value thereof, in case delivery cannot be made, together with damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henry Bleeker, for appellant. Shinn & Ling and P. E. King, for repondent.

Temple, C. Appeal from judgment and order refusing a new trial. This is an action of claim and delivery, to recover possession of two horses which plaintiff alleges defendant "still unlawfully withholds and detains." The pleadings were verified, and the defendant in his answer denies that he "unlawfully withholds or detains or detained said goods and chattels." For a further and separate defense he admits the taking, and attempts to justify as constable under a writ of attachment against one Smith, as whose property they were taken. He avers that judgment passed against Smith in the attachment suit, and the goods were taken by him, as constable, under an execution issued upon the judgment, and were sold, by virtue of the writ, June 6, 1889. This suit was commenced June 19, 1889, which was after the goods had passed out of the possession of defendant. The plaintiff, testifying on the trial, states, in effect, that the goods had been sold and delivered before suit was commenced; but his attorney here contends that, as the answer admits that defendant still detains the goods, such evidence cannot be noticed. But, as we have seen, the defendant shows, in the affirmative allegations, that he had taken the goods under an execution, and had sold them June 6, 1889, which was 13 days before the commencement of this action. The evidence came in without objection; was in fact put in by plaintiff himself. Does it show that he had no cause of action? In the Code, the action is called "an action to recover the possession of personal property," (section 509, Code Civil Proc.;) and the provisional remedy provided, with all the machinery and procedure, implies that it is to recover property from the defendant which he unjustly detains. The facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action certainly are those which show that plaintiff is entitled to possession, and that defendant wrongfully withholds the property from him. Quite often the plaintiff may choose whether he will content himself with damages for the conversion, or seek to recover the specific property, but the two remedies are quite distinct. In what is called "trover," present possession of the property is immaterial, but the relief sought in claim and delivery cannot be had from the defendant unless he is then possessed of the property, which fact must therefore constitute an essential element in plaintiff's cause of action. A different conclusion has been reached by the courts in some states by identifying the action with the common-law actions of replevin or detinue. But there is no ground for this. It is a statutory remedy provided to enable one to recover the possession of personal property wrongfully detained, with an alternate remedy if possession cannot be had. In Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 573, 21 Pac. Rep. 305, this court held that the alternate judgment for value could not be entered unless it is found that plaintiff is entitled to recover the property. Could he be entitled to recover the property upon a showing that at the time the suit was commenced defendant did not have the possession? In New York the decisions have varied. Perhaps it may be considered now to be the law in that state that the action will lie although defendant was not in possession at the time the action was commenced. That view is presented in Nichols v. Michael, 23 N. Y. 264, and in Ellis v. Lersner, 48 Barb. 546. They seem to be based entirely upon the analogies of the common-law actions. The contrary is maintained in Missouri, (Feder v. Abrahams, 28 Mo. App. 454;) in Iowa, (Coffin v. Gephart, 18 Iowa, 257;) in North Carolina, (Haughton v. Newberry, 69 N. C. 456;) in Massachusetts, (Hall v. White, 106 Mass. 599;) and in Michigan, (Aber v. Bratton, 60 Mich. 357, 27 N. W. Rep. 564.) Perhaps the question has not been directly passed upon in this state, but in Hawkins v. Roberts, 45 Cal. 38, it is said: "If he [the defendant] was not in possession, then the action of replevin in the detinet cannot be supported against him." If the action of claim and delivery can be said to be an action of replevin, it must be in the detinet, and not in the cepit. At all events, if it was such in that case, it must be so here. Perhaps, if it were found after suit brought that the defendant had wrongfully disposed of the property before the commencement of the action, plaintiff might be allowed to amend, so as to claim damages for a wrongful taking or conversion. Permission to do this was not asked in this case. If the complaint must contain a logical statement of plaintiff's cause of action, this complaint does not justify recovery for a conversion, and the judgment should be reversed. It is not necessary to consider the other points raised. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. BABCOCK. (No. 14,505.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1892.)

GUARANTOR OF NOTE—DEMAND.

A person who indorses his name on the back of a non-negotiable note, to give it credit, is, under Civil Code, §§ 2787, 2807, 2823, a guarantor, and liable, on default of the principal, without any previous demand or notice.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of San Diego against E. S. Babcock, Jr. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Works, Gibson & Titus, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes and Wellborn, Parker & Stevens, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a promissory note made by one Story, payable to the order of plaintiff, 90 days after date, and containing the following provision: "Should suit be commenced, or an attorney employed to enforce the payment of this note, I agree to pay an additional sum of five per cent. on principal and accrued interest as attorney's fees in such suit." The note was executed at the instance and request of the defendant to take up another note, on which he was liable, and before its delivery he indorsed it, by writing his name upon the back thereof, and then delivered it to the plaintiff. The complaint contains no averment that demand for the payment of the note was ever made on the maker, or that notice of its non-payment was given to the defendant before the action was commenced; and the answer denies that defendant, by his indorsement or otherwise, waived protest, or demand, or notice of non-payment, or that he guarantied the payment of the note; and avers that notice of non-payment was never given him by the plaintiff, or any other person. After trial the court found the facts, and as conclusions of law: "That by the writing of his name upon the back of said note, and the delivery thereof to plaintiff, the defendant, Babcock, became and is a guarantor upon said note; that no demand or notice of protest was required to be given to said defendant; * * * that defendant was not exonerated from the payment of said note as such guarantor by the mere delay on the part of plaintiff in bringing suit or to prosecute Story;" and that plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant the amount due on the note, after deducting certain credits. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and from it the defendant has appealed on the judgment roll.

The principal question in the case is: What liability did the defendant assume by writing his name on the back of the note; or, in other words, did he thereby become a maker, an indorser, or a guarantor of the note? It is contended for appellant that he was an indorser, and that demand and notice of non-payment were necessary to fix his liability. The authorities upon this subject in other states are irreconcilably conflicting, and the question must be solved by reference to the decisions in this state and the provisions of the Code. In Riggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 485, HEYDENFELDT, J., delivered the opinion of the court, and said: "One who puts his name on the back of a promissory note, out of the course of regular negotiability, is not an indorser, according to strict commercial meaning. He is termed a 'guarantor,' and this is so whether his inscription is simply in blank or preceded by the words, 'I guaranty,' etc." He then went on to discuss the question, and concluded by saying that the undertaking of such a guarantor "is attended with all the liability and all the rights of an indorser stricti juris." In Pierce v. Kennedy, 5 Cal. 139, the note was indorsed by Ford, Lathrop & Co., out of the course of regular negotiability, and the same learned judge said: "The defendants, Ford, Lathrop & Co., were guarantors upon the note which is the foundation of this action." He then added that their liability, according to the decision in Riggs v. Waldo, was strictly that of an indorser. In Brady v. Reynolds, 13 Cal. 32, the defendant and two other persons indorsed a promissory note, before its delivery, to assist the maker in obtaining money upon it, and it was held that they were guarantors, and jointly liable. The court, by FIELD, J, said: "Over their names a contract of guaranty could have been written in terms," etc. It is then further said: "The decision of this court in Riggs v. Waldo, 2 Cal. 485, only goes to the extent of holding that a notice of protest is as essential to charge a guarantor as an indorser. It does not change the previous rule in relation to guarantors in any other respect. There are words, it is true, in the opinion which lead to the inference that the distinguished judge who delivered it considered the distinction between the undertaking of an indorser and that of a guarantor more nice and subtle than solid and just. In this we may differ from him, for we are disposed to regard the undertaking of the two as materially different. The contract of both is conditional, but the conditions are unlike. The contract of indorsement is primarily that of transfer; the contract of guaranty is that of security. It is unnecessary, however, to question the language or reasoning of the opinion. The case only decides that notice of protest is equally necessary to fix the liability of a guarantor as to fix that of an indorser." In Ford v. Hendricks, 34 Cal. 673, the note in suit was made by Hendricks, and indorsed by one Reed before delivery; and the court, by SANDERSON, J., said: "As to the relation of Reed—whether it be that of maker, indorser, or guarantor—there is much conflict of authority; but, under the settled rule in this state, he must be regarded as a guarantor." In Crooks v. Tully, 50 Cal. 254, the note sued upon was indorsed by one Durkin after it became due, to obtain further time for the maker to pay it; and the court, by NILES, J., said: "The contract of Durkin was that of a guarantor. It has been frequently so held by this court."

It clearly appears from these decisions that when one, before the enactment of the Codes, wrote his name on the back of a promissory note for the purpose of giving it security, and not for the purpose of transfer, his undertaking was that of a guarantor, though he was entitled to the same notice of demand and non-payment as he would have been if an indorser. See, also, Jones v. Goodwin, 39 Cal. 493. In this condition of the decisions the Codes were enacted, and we must look to them to see in what respects, if any, the rule above stated has been changed. The Civil Code contains the following provisions: "Sec. 2787. A guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person." "Sec. 2807. A guarantor of payment or performance is liable to the guarantee immediately upon the default of the principal, and without demand or notice." "Sec. 2823. Mere delay on the part of a creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, does not exonerate a guarantor." "Sec. 3108. One who writes his name upon a negotiable instrument otherwise than as a maker or acceptor, and delivers it, with his name thereon, to another person, is called an 'indorser,' and his act is called 'indorsement.'" "Sec. 3117. One who indorses a negotiable instrument before it is delivered to the payee is liable to the payee as an indorser." It will be observed that the two sections last quoted relate only to negotiable instruments, and, in accordance with the rule declared by them, the case of Fessenden v. Summers, 62 Cal. 484, was decided. They do not in any way affect this case, for the reason that the note here sued upon was not a negotiable instrument. Adams v. Seaman, 82 Cal. 636, 23 Pac. Rep. 53. This being so, the defendant must still be treated and held liable as a guarantor. The question, then, is, what is now the liability, in this state, of a guarantor? As we have seen, a guaranty is a promise to answer for the debt of another person, and it may be enforced, upon default of the principal, without any previous demand or notice. It is an absolute undertaking to pay the whole debt, if the principal does not; and no mere delay of the creditor to proceed against the principal, or to enforce any other remedy, can be availed of as a defense. And such a liability is assumed prima facie when, as in this case, the guarantor writes his name on the back of a non-negotiable note to give it credit. Under the circumstances shown here, we think the findings were sufficient, and the court below rightfully refused to allow any offset for damages alleged to have been sustained by defendant, because plaintiff, after demand that he should do so, neglected and refused to institute an action against the maker of the note, and thereby secure payment of a portion of the money due thereon. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

GALLIANO v. KILFOY. (No. 14,186.)

SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT—SERVICE—RETURN OF WRIT.

1. Pending an action to foreclose a mortgage plaintiff gave defendant written notice, to which was attached a copy of a supplemental complaint, that on a certain day he would ask leave to file such complaint. Thereafter the complaint was filed by leave of court, and subsequently a default entered thereon against defendant, without any additional service. Held, that the default was erroneous, the defendant being entitled to service of the complaint after it was filed.

2. A return of a writ showed that service was made on "Rose" K., "by delivering to Rose K., one of the defendants, personally, * * * a copy." Upon this return default was entered against "Rosa" K., a defendant in the action. Held, that the return and default were prima facie regular, Rose and Rosa being substantially the same name.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Merced county; C. H. MARKS, Judge.

Action by G. Galliano against Rosa Kilfoy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Rosa Kilfoy appeals. Affirmed.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. Law & Law, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This was an action to foreclose two certain mortgages upon real property. A judgment by default was entered against all the defendants, from which judgment Rosa Kilfoy appeals. Pending the action a supplemental complaint was filed, asking judgment under certain covenants contained in the mortgages for moneys paid out for the insurance of the property. Respondent gave appellant written notice, to which was attached a copy of the supplemental complaint, that upon a certain day he would ask leave of the court to file such complaint. Thereafter the complaint was filed by permission of the court, and subsequently a default thereon was entered against appellant, without any additional service thereof. This was erroneous. A copy of the supplemental complaint should have been served upon appellant after it was filed, and the judgment should be modified to the extent of the relief granted by that complaint. Washburn v. Wilkinson, 59 Cal. 538.

Appellant attacks the proof of service. The defendant was sued as "Rosa" Kilfoy; the return shows the service to have been made upon "Rose" Kilfoy "by delivering to Rose Kilfoy, one of the defendants, personally, in the city and county of San Francsco, state of California, a copy," etc. Upon this return a default was entered against "Rosa" Kilfoy. It was said in Com. v. Donovan, 13 Allen, 571: "The question whether one name is idem sonans with another is not a question of spelling, but of pronunciation, depending less upon the rule than upon the usage." In various languages "Rose" is pronounced "Rosa," and even in this country, in various communities and among various classes of people, that pronunciation is maintained. Indeed, it may well be said that they are substantially the same name, and, taken in connection with the recital in the return, her identity as one of the defendants, as against nothing to the contrary, is prima facie established.

The record is not all before us, and in its absence we cannot say that the attorney's fee allowed to plaintiff was unreasonable.

Let the cause be remanded and the judgment modified to the extent of the relief given by the supplemental complaint, and in all other respects let it be affirmed.

MONAHAN v. SAN DIEGO COUNTY. (No. 14,703.)

CONSTABLES—MILEAGE FEES.

Under Act March 5, 1870, providing that constables shall receive mileage for "every mile necessarily traveled, in going only, in executing any warrant of arrest, subpœna, or venire, bringing up a prisoner on habeas corpus, taking prisoners before a magistrate or to prison," a constable is entitled to mileage both for the distance traveled in going to make an arrest, and for that traveled in bringing his prisoner from the place of arrest to the magistrate or to prison. Allen v. Napa County, 23 Pac. Rep. 43, 82 Cal. 187, followed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by T. J. Monahan against the county of San Diego for fees as constable in criminal cases. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. Leonard Goodwin and Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiff, as a constable, charged the defendant fees for services in criminal cases, amounting to $578.75, and presented to the board of supervisors his verified, itemized bill for this amount. The board allowed his claim to the extent of $384, but rejected it for the balance of $194.95, on the ground that the charge for the sum rejected was for "mileage in bringing various persons arrested by him from the place of arrest to the court from which the warrant of arrest was issued, or from the place of arrest to the county jail, in addition to mileage for going from the place where said process was issued to the place where the arrest was made; that is to say, * * * claimed mileage for both going to arrest such persons, and for bringing such persons before the magistrate or to prison from the place of arrest." Plaintiff sued, and recovered judgment for his entire demand. The defendant brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll.

The questions presented were decided adversely to appellant's contention in Allen v. Napa County, 82 Cal. 187, 23 Pac. Rep. 43, following Cunningham v. San Joaquin County, 49 Cal. 323. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

CERF v. PFLEGING et al. (No. 14,492.)

HIGHWAYS—CLAIM OF TOWN—DEDICATION—REFERENCE TO OFFICIAL MAP.

1. A town authorized by Act Cong. March 2, 1867, and Act March 23, 1868, (St. 1867–68, p. 245,) to enter lands within its limits "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants," and, after determining conflicting claims, to make deeds to the proper parties, caused a map of the town to be made and adopted as official which embraced and showed a certain tract in the possession of one M. to be laid off in blocks and lots, with streets extending through it, though in fact there were at the time no such divisions thereof. Thereafter it received a patent embracing the tract, and on petition of the assignees of M., who referred for description to the map, executed to them a deed of the land. Held, that the town could not be regarded as having asserted a claim to the streets, and as having deeded the land subject to the recognition of such claim by the grantees.

2. The mere mention of the streets as landmarks in deeds conveying parts of the land, without describing it by lot or block, or as bounded by any of the streets, is not such an adoption of the map as to constitute a dedication of the streets.

3. The fact that all but one of the streets were opened and used does not show a dedication of the one.

4. Neither is a conveyance of land in such street by deed describing it as part of the street a dedication.

5. Nor would a deed bounding land on such street imply that the street is there according to the description.

Action by Ernest Cerf against Jacob Pfleging and another to enjoin the opening of a street. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Venable & Goodchild, for appellant. Wm. Shipsey, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment and order denying a new trial. This action was brought against the city of San Luis Obispo and its street superintendent to enjoin the opening of a street therein. The city of San Luis Obispo, formerly the town of that name, was located upon public lands of the United States, and acquired title under an act of congress entitled "An act for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns," passed March 2, 1867. March 23, 1868, the legislature passed an act defining the limits of the town, and authorizing her board of trustees to enter these lands "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants." St. 1867–68, p. 245. The statute authorized the board to ascertain who were the beneficiaries of the trust, and to determine conflicting claims, and directed them to execute deeds to the proper parties. The act of congress referred to provided that the corporate authorities in such cases might enter the lands "in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests." The board, therefore, was a mere trustee for the occupants, and by the terms of the act of congress were to execute their trust under such regulations as might be prescribed by the legislature. As early as 1866 one Murray was in possession of a tract consisting of 31.78 acres within the town limits. At that time the tract was not divided into blocks and lots, and no streets extended through it. In 1869 the town trustees caused the town to be surveyed, of which survey a map was made, called the "Harris and Ward Map," which was adopted as the official map, and deposited in the recorder's office, in 1870, but not filed until 1878. This map embraces the 31.78 acres, and shows it laid off into blocks and lots, and the piece of land in controversy as a part of Pacific street, which is in accordance with the claim of defendants. October 5, 1871, a patent was issued to the town trustees by the United States, in accordance with the act of congress. The 31.78-acre tract was part of the land granted. November 8, 1870, a petition was presented by the successors in interest of A. Murray to the trustees for a deed to said tract. The petition referred for description to an annexed map, which was that portion of the Harris and Ward map which included the Murray tract. A description was also attached, defining the boundaries, which mentioned some of the streets by name, particularly Pacific street. The streets marked on the map, except Pacific, were opened after the survey, and have been traveled as the necessities of the public required. Pacific street, also, except the portions in controversy here, has been opened and traveled for many years. That portion has never been opened or used as a street, and no special ordinance or resolution has been passed by the town trustees accepting the street. November 22, 1870, the trustees, acting upon the above petition, granted and authorized the deed, "always saving and excepting from the operation of this conveyance so much as is covered by streets, lanes, and alleys." February 7, 1872, the president of the board executed the deed, making no reservation as to streets. In 1872 the recipients of the deed from the trustees sold and conveyed, by eight several deeds, parcels of land, part of the Murray tract, in which deeds reference is made to the Harris and Ward map as follows: "According to the official survey and map made by Harris and Ward on file in the recorder's office of said county." February 16, 1874, the grantees of the town executed to plaintiff a deed to the premises in controversy, describing it by reference to the lines of Pacific street and as "being a part of Pacific street." It is also found that in 1872 the grantees of the town agreed with E. H. Smith to sell him a corner lot adjoining the land in controversy,—whether a part of the Murray tract is not found; that Smith by mistake built on the lot in controversy a house worth $150, which is still there; that the grantees of the town refused to convey to him because the land was a street. Plaintiff also claims under E. H. Smith, who conveyed to him. It is obvious that the conveyance of the title by the city did not affect the tenure by which the land was held. The title was still the possessory title, quieted by a release to the occupants of the title of the United States. It was still affected by the previous acts of the owners, as though no new title had been acquired. But necessarily, as also by express provision of the legislative act, the trustees were required to decide in the first instance who were the occupants, within the meaning of the act of congress. It is contended that the town, by the survey and map marking streets upon this land, laid claim to them as streets, and, when the petitioners annexed to their petition a copy of the map, they recognized the strips of land marked on the map as streets as rightfully so marked. That the trustees, finding that the claim of the town was conceded in the petition, awarded the deed, reserving the streets, is conceded. But can the mere making of a map be regarded as the assertion of a claim to the streets? It must be assumed that the town authorities knew that they did not own the streets, and could acquire no right to them by surveying and platting them upon an official map. It is not a very unusual proceeding, and may be regarded as a suggestion to the owner, who, it may be presumed, could more profitably dispose of his lands as lots than otherwise, that it was the proper subdivision to be made. The acts of the officials could certainly have no greater effect. But the land-owner may adopt a survey made by the town, and convey lots and blocks according to it, and thereby perhaps dedicate streets designated upon it. In this case, however, the only evidence which tends to show that the owner of the land adopted the map is the fact that the streets have been opened and are being used by the public, except that portion of Pacific street in question here. How they came to be opened does not appear, but from the fact that they have been opened and used for some length of time, without objection, we may infer that it was by consent of the owners. But how can we infer from that a consent to the use of lands which have not been thrown open to the public and not used? Undoubtedly, we are at liberty to infer that the proprietors did not propose that all the other streets should be open, and to obstruct Pacific street at this point. Certainly they expected, at some time or other, that Pacific street would be open through its entire extent. But this does not constitute the animus dedicandi, which must include, not only a general intention that some time or other the land shall be surrendered to the use of the public, but a present offer. There must be the act of giving,—the actual offer and acceptance. Property cannot be taken for public use without compensation unless the owner is willing; and this willingness should be manifested by clear and unmistakable acts. Parties are not to be done out of their property by doubtful implications, no matter how greatly the public may be inconvenienced. Has the owner freely given, or is he by some act estopped from denying that he has? is the real inquiry in every such case. Otherwise it would constitute a taking in invitum for public use without compensation. It does not appear that the owners have conveyed any of the land by lot or block, or as bounded by any of the streets. The only references to streets are as above stated. A street mapped might be as good a landmark as a street legally established, and such a conveyance, disregarding subdivisions, was held, in People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. Rep. 474, to be a withdrawal of an offer to dedicate, previously made.

A deed bounding land upon a street merely existing upon a map or plat made by the owner of the land as a convenience in selling, implies in favor of the grantee that the street is there according to the description. There is no such implied covenant in a deed describing land as bounded upon a public highway established by public authority. The grantor in such case assumes no responsibility in regard to the highway. Each party is equally well acquainted with the law in accordance with which the highway exists or may be abandoned. And it has been held, and the conclusion seems reasonable, that the rule is the same where a highway has been laid out, but not yet opened by public authority. In re Opening of Brooklyn Street, 118 Pa. St. 640, 12 Atl. Rep. 664; Bellinger v. Society, 10 Pa. St. 135. Much less should the mere mention of streets as landmarks, which have been platted by the town authorities without leave of the owners, have such effect. It is plain that the conveyance of the identical property in question, describing it as a part of Pacific street, cannot have that effect. A mere statement of the owner of land that it constitutes a part of a street is certainly not an offer to dedicate, although it may be a probative fact of some value in determining whether he had not previously dedicated it. Here the very act asserts the contrary. He would not have conveyed the property for a valuable consideration, intending thereby to give it to the public, unless the grantee had a special interest in having it so dedicated. Precisely the contrary appears. There was a house upon it which evidently the grantee desired to acquire, and presumptively to hold and enjoy with the land. Such a dedication would be inconsistent with the grant, and void, if so intended. The grantor would be dedicating the land of another. I think the case should be remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment in favor of the defendants, and enter judgment for the plaintiff as demanded in his complaint.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the case is remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the judgment in favor of the defendants, and enter judgment for the plaintiff as demanded in his complaint.

SAN GABRIEL WINE CO. v. BEHLOW et ux.

(No. 14,486.)

APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

A verdict will not be disturbed on appeal where the evidence is conflicting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by the San Gabriel Wine Company against William Behlow and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Gottschalk & Luckel, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial, in an action brought to recover the sum of $500, alleged to be due for the balance of the purchase price of a tract of land sold by plaintiff to defendants, for the sum of $4,500, upon which the sum of $4,000 was paid; and for a decree foreclosing a vendor's lien. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants agreed to pay $4,500 for the land, of which $4,000 was paid, and a conveyance of the premises was executed by plaintiff to the defendants upon a promise of defendants to pay $500 more. Defendants deny that they ever agreed to pay more than $4,000 for said land. This, with some other issues, was submitted to a jury, which found against the plaintiff, and in favor of defendants thereon. The grounds of plaintiff's motion for a new trial are that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury or findings of the court; and that the decision is against law; and errors occurring at the trial and excepted to by plaintiff. But the ground mainly relied on is insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or finding that the amount for which plaintiff sold the property was $4,000. Of course, plaintiff could not have sold the property to defendants for more than defendants paid or agreed to pay for it. There is evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to prove that defendants agreed to pay $4,500 for the property; and evidence on the part of defendants that they agreed to pay $4,000 only for the property. This presents a conflict in the evidence, which, under a well-settled rule in this state, precludes a review of it by this court. A review of it would involve a determination of the relative credibility of the witnesses, and the weight which should be given to the testimony of each respectively. Those were matters exclusively for the jury and the trial court to consider and pass upon. We fail to find in the record any errors of law occurring at the trial which were excepted to by the plaintiff. The finding of the jury is not, in our opinion, contrary to any of the instructions of the court. Besides, the court adopted the finding of the jury as the finding of the court. Order affirmed.

SAN GABRIEL WINE Co. v. BEHLOW et ux. (No. 14,490.)

APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

A verdict will not be disturbed on appea where there is evidence to support it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county · WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by the San Gabriel Wine Company against William Behlow and wife. Defendants set up a counter-claim. From a judgment for plaintiff as to the counter-claim, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellants. Gottschalk & Luckel, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from the order of the court denying the motion of appellants for a new trial, as to their counter-claim, in an action brought by plaintiff to recover $500, alleged to be a balance due plaintiff from defendants for purchase money of a block of land in Ramona. The counter-claim is for a breach of covenant in the conveyance against incumbrances; the alleged incumbrance consisting of a prior conveyance by respondent of a right of way over said block to the San Gabriel Valley Rapid Transit Railway, a corporation. Defendants alleged that they were thereby damaged $3,000, for which they demanded judgment against plaintiff. Among the special issues submitted to the jury was the following: "What is the amount of damage to said block from the existence of said railroad? Answer. No damage." There is sufficient evidence to justify this finding; and appellants, in their specification of particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the special findings or verdict of the jury, do not specify wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify that finding. None of the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial could have influenced the jury, in the least, in reaching the conclusion that the block of land through which said right of way had been granted was not damaged thereby. We therefore omit the discussion of such alleged errors as could not have affected the substantial rights of appellants. If they sustained no damage, they were not entitled to recover any, and the order must be affirmed. Order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DILWOOD et al. (No. 20,859.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS.

1. On a trial for grand larceny it was reversible error to instruct, on the subject of circumstantial evidence, that the jury should be regulated by the superior number of probabilities on the one side or the other, whether the amount of such probabilities be expressed in words or arguments, or by figures and numbers.

2. Declarations of a co-conspirator, made subsequent to the crime, and in the absence of defendant, are not admissible in evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. HOLMES, Judge.

Prosecution against O. H. Dilwood, J. E. Deegan, and E. W. Burnsides for grand larceny. From a judgment entered on a verdict of guilty defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hinds & Merriam, for appellants.

William H. Layson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People, cited the following authorities on the point that the declarations of one of the defendants, made on the day subsequent to the larceny, were admissible as those of a co-conspirator: Whart. Crim. Ev. (9th Ed.) No. 699, p. 601; Scott v. State, 30 Ala. 503; O'Neal v. State, 17 Reporter, 285; 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 230; 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 854; Wilson v. State, 66 Ga. 591; 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 844, tit. "Acts of Confederates;" Lewis v. State, 4 Kan. 296.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny in stealing a calf, and now prosecutes this appeal.

The court gave the jury the following instruction upon the subject of circumstantial evidence: "As mathematical or absolute certainty is seldom to be obtained in human affairs, reason and public utility require that jurors, as well as all mankind, in forming their opinion of facts, should be regulated by the superior number of probabilities on the one side or the other, whether the amount of these probabilities be expressed in words or arguments, or by figures and numbers." We have looked in vain in our standard works upon criminal law for an indorsement of the principle contained in this instruction of the court. Starkie on Evidence, in discussing this question, at page 860, says: "It is very possible, indeed, that mere coincidences may be so numerous as, by force of multiplied probability, to exclude all reasonable doubt; but this can never happen in the absence of circumstances of a conclusive tendency, unless the probability be increased to an indefinite extent beyond the reach of mere calculation. Whenever the probability is of a definite and limited nature, (whether in the proportion of one hundred to one, or of one thousand to one, or any other ratio, is immaterial,) it cannot be safely made the ground of conviction; for to act upon it in any case would be to decide that, for the sake of convicting many criminals, the life of one innocent man might be sacrificed." This instruction appears to have been before the court in the case of People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 24 Pac. Rep. 143, and Justice MCFARLAND, in that case, very properly said: "This is not only against the settled rule as to the amount of proof necessary to convict in criminal cases, but is against the express language of the Code." The instruction was not only erroneous, but of such a prejudicial character that the error was incurable by the giving of further instructions correctly stating the law.

The court erred in admitting evidence as to the appearance, conduct, and declarations of one Deegan, a co-defendant, the day subsequent to the larceny, the defendant being absent. Conceding that Deegan and defendants were co-conspirators in stealing the calf, at this time the theft has been consummated, and the conspiracy a thing of the past. The declarations of a co-conspirator, after the object of the conspiracy had been accomplished, are not admissible in evidence. The authorities relied upon by respondent are cases where a disposition of the stolen property and a division of the proceeds were a part of the scheme or plan of the criminals. The facts of this case do not bring it within the rule there discussed. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Murder—Confession—Discharge of Jury—Failure to Agree—Abuse of Discretion—Receiving Verdict—Harmless Error.

1. A voluntary confession of murder is not inadmissible because made to free defendant's sister, then under arrest for the crime, from suspicion, especially where defendant testifies in self-defense to every fact contained in the confession, and the sister testifies that he acknowledged to her substantially the same facts immediately after the killing.

2. The record of the discharge of a jury in a criminal case for failure to agree cannot be impeached by extrinsic evidence showing an abuse of judicial discretion; and the exclusion of a transcript of the proceedings, offered to show, by the answers of the jurors to the court's questions, that the judge abused his discretion, if error, is harmless.

3. The absence of defendant at the discharge of the jury, when waived by his counsel, does not affect the question of his jeopardy.

4. Pen. Code, § 1149, provides that, when the jury have announced that they have agreed on a verdict, they must, on being required, declare the same. Section 1164 provides that, where the verdict given is such as the court may receive, the clerk must immediately record it in full upon the minutes, read it to the jury, and inquire of them whether it is their verdict. Held, that where on a murder trial the jury return a verdict of guilty, which is received in proper manner, and also written verdicts for the state on the pleas of former acquittal, former conviction, and former jeopardy, as directed by the court, and defendant's counsel expressly waives the recording thereof at the time, failure to cause them to be recorded and read to the jury, and have them declare whether they are their verdicts, is harmless error, under section 1404, providing that no departure from the form prescribed by the Code in respect to any proceeding renders it invalid, unless it tends to prejudice defendant in regard to a substantial right.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. Gottschalk, Judge.

John W. Smalling was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Swinnerton and Paul C. Morf, for appellant. Ira Hill Reed, Dist. Atty., F. J. Solinsky, and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, with punishment fixed at imprisonment for life, and now appeals from the judgment. For a reversal of the judgment he relies upon the following assigned errors of law: (1) The court erred in admitting in evidence the written confession of defendant, under objection. (2) The court erred in excluding Exhibit B from the jury, it being the evidence of what occurred on the discharge of the jury at the first trial of the action, and in sustaining the people's objection thereto. (3) The court erred in denying defendant's motion to be discharged from custody, and in pronouncing judgment on said defendant. (4) The court erred in instructing the jury to find for the people upon the pleas of former acquittal, former conviction, and former jeopardy.

The confession of the defendant was clearly admissible. It appears to have been an entirely free and voluntary statement. The fact that defendant's sister was also under arrest for the commission of the homicide, and that the confession may have been made to free her from suspicion of guilt, is a matter that in no way tends to invalidate it as material and competent evidence. Again, this sister testified at the trial that immediately subsequent to the commission of the homicide defendant acknowledged to her the facts of the killing, and the facts as stated by her were substantially the same as contained in the written confession admitted in evidence. In his defense the defendant went upon the witness stand, and again stated, with additional matters, every fact contained in the said confession. Thus, from any and every stand-point of the case, we conclude the assignment of error not well taken.

It is claimed that the court erred in excluding Exhibit B as evidence in the case. Exhibit B was that portion of the transcript of the proceedings of the previous trial, taken by the phonographic reporter, showing what occurred at the time the jury were discharged by the court, for the reason that they were unable to agree upon a verdict. When this case was called for trial counsel for defendant announced themselves as not ready, by reason of the absence of one Hood, the party who acted as short-hand reporter at the previous trial, but that if the district attorney would stipulate to admit the certified copy of the reporter's notes in evidence, in lieu of the presence of the reporter, they were ready to proceed. The district attorney agreed to admit the transcript, to-wit, Exhibit B, in evidence, whereupon the trial proceeded. When defendant attempted to introduce the exhibit in evidence, counsel for the people waived the objection that it was not the best evidence, but objected upon the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and the court sustained the objection. We will not enter into a discussion as to the effect of the stipulation, or as to the professional proprieties which should exist among attorneys in carrying out stipulations made in good faith. If the evidence was improperly rejected, but the defendant was not prejudiced thereby, it was not error; or if the evidence had been admitted before the jury, and could not have affected the character of the verdict, then a violation of the stipulation, if it occurred, did the defendant no injury. In addition to the plea of not guilty, the defendant entered the plea of prior acquittal, prior conviction, and once in jeopardy, and depended upon the proceedings of the first trial for the facts to support such pleas. The jeopardy relied upon by defendant is insisted to have attached by reason of the fact that at such trial the jury were discharged without legal necessity, and also discharged in the absence of the defendant. The records of the court were introduced, which showed that the defendant had once been placed on his trial for the same offense, on a valid information, before a legal jury, and in a court of competent jurisdiction. People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal. 334. This jeopardy once having attached was a shield forever protecting the defendant from a second prosecution, unless the jury was prevented from rendering a verdict from some legal necessity. It cannot be questioned but that the inability of a jury to agree upon a verdict is one of those necessities that will authorize a court to discharge the jury, and thereby subject the defendant to a second trial. At the time Exhibit B was offered in evidence, the record of the previous trial had been placed before the jury, and one of the recitals thereof was as follows: "At 11 o'clock and 15 minutes P. M. the jury came into court. Present, Hon. C. V. Gottschalk, judge, Ira Hill Reed, district attorney, Ben. K. Thom, sheriff, A. L. Kyllie, clerk, by Sam. E. Redmond, deputy-clerk, Reporter E. E. Hood, and defendant's attorneys, J. G. Swinnerton and Paul C. Morf, defendant's presence in court being waived by his said attorneys. Roll-call of jurors,—all found present. The jury were asked by the court if they had agreed upon a verdict, and they replied that they had not. The court, after questioning each one of the jurors as to the probability of their agreeing upon a verdict, and being satisfied that there is no reasonable probability of the jury so agreeing, orders the jury discharged from further consideration of the case." Exhibit B contained a transcript of the proceedings occurring in court at the time the jury were discharged, showing the examination of the jurors by the court as to the probability of arriving at a verdict, and it was offered for the purpose of showing by the answers of the jurors that there was a probability of agreement. Its purpose was necessarily to impeach the recitals of the record and show a gross abuse of discretion in discharging the jury under the circumstances there indicated. A defendant is not entitled to impeach the record by extrinsic evidence of facts, showing an erroneous exercise of judicial discretion in discharging a jury. He is bound by the judgment of the court as declared by the record. In U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. 580, Justice Story said: "We think that in all cases of this nature the law has invested courts of justice with the authority to discharge a jury from giving any verdict, whenever in their opinion, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there is a manifest necessity for the act, or the ends of public justice would be defeated." In the case of People v. Green, 13 Wend. 57, Chief Justice Savage said: "The subject has been fully considered by this court in several cases, particularly in People v. Olcott, 2 Johns. Cas. 301, and People v. Goodwin, 18 Johns. 200. The rule was laid down by Mr. Justice Kent in the first of these cases, which was acquiesced in by Chief Justice Spencer in the last, that the question of discharging a jury is one which must rest in the sound discretion of the court. Either the court must determine when it is requisite to discharge, or the rule must be inflexible, that after the jury are once sworn and discharged no other jury can in any event be sworn and charged in the same case. The moment cases of necessity are admitted to form exceptions, that moment a door is open to the discretion of the court to judge of that necessity, and to determine what combination of circumstances will create one." In this case the jury were out but 30 minutes. In People v. Harding, 53 Mich. 487, 19 N. W. Rep. 155, Chief Justice Cooley, in speakng as to the power of the judge to discharge the jury without a verdict, said: "The whole subject, however, is referred to his judgment, and, when he decides, no one can question his conclusion." Counsel relies upon the case of Ex parte McLaughlin, 41 Cal. 219, as authority to authorize a reversal of the judgment of the court upon the necessity for a discharge of the jury, by extrinsic evidence. This case was heard upon the record alone, and the language used in the opinion, as to the right of the appellate court to review the judgment of the trial court upon this question, must be limited to a review of the facts as disclosed by the record; and especially does this appear when the entire opinion is carefully considered. It follows that the admission of Exhibit B as evidence in this case would have resulted in no benefit to the defendant, for neither court nor jury could have considered it in passing upon the question of jeopardy. The record recital is full and complete, and clearly indicates the legal necessity contemplated in law to justify the discharge of a jury.

The fact that the defendant was not present at the time the jury was discharged, his presence having been waived by his counsel, does not affect the question of his jeopardy; for his objection to the discharge of the jury at that time could not have defeated the validity of the court's action. It follows that the defendant wholly failed to establish his special defense by any evidence, and, under such circumstances, it was the duty of the court to instruct the jury to find for the people thereon. Varnes v. State, 20 Tex. App. 109; O'Connor v. State, 28 Tex. App. 288, 13 S. W. Rep. 14.

There remains but one additional assignment for consideration, and, in a case of the importance of the present one, it is a matter of regret that it ever should have arisen. When the jury were about to retire to consult as to their verdict, the court handed them forms of verdicts as to the pleas of former acquittal, former conviction, and once in jeopardy, and instructed them to find for the people upon these pleas, and have their foreman sign and date them, and return them into court, with their verdict upon the merits of the case. The jury, having retired, returned into court, and announced that they had agreed upon a verdict. The foreman declared the verdict to be guilty of murder in the first degree, and fixed the punishment at imprisonment for life. The clerk read the verdict to the jury as recorded, and asked them if that was their verdict, and they all responded, "It is." The bill of exceptions then recites: "The foreman also handed to the court three other verdicts, being the same verdicts heretofore set out and delivered to the jury, which verdicts were all signed by the foreman and properly dated. The court then said: 'Now, I desire to know of the counsel in regard to these verdicts found by the jury, as to the defendant having been once acquitted of the offense charged, and having been once convicted of the offense charged, and having been once in jeopardy for the offense charged, whether or not it will be understood by counsel that these verdicts may be entered by the clerk subsequently,—they having been brought in by the foreman in favor of the people under the instructions of the court,—or whether they insist upon having those verdicts now entered by the clerk before the jury are discharged, and read to the jury and have them declare whether these are the verdicts.' Mr. Swinnerton: 'We do not insist on that,—the recording at this time.' The Court: 'The clerk may then record those verdicts afterwards. They were brought in under the instructions given to the jury.' The jury was then discharged. The jury did not orally declare, nor did their foreman nor any member of the jury read aloud, any verdict on the pleas of former acquittal, former conviction, or former jeopardy. Such verdicts were not read aloud to the jury by any person, nor was anything asked them to establish what verdict, if any, they had agreed upon as to the issues raised by such pleas. But counsel for defendant expressly waived the declaring and recording of said verdicts at the time, and agreed that they might be recorded afterwards, as appears in this bill of exceptions, and all the facts constituting such waivers are therein set forth." Under section 1149 of the Penal Code, when the jury have returned into court, and announced that they have agreed upon a verdict, they are required, through their foreman, to declare such verdict, and under section 1164[1] of the Code, when the verdict is so declared, and upon an examination by the court it appears to be correct in form, it must then be recorded, etc. In this case these verdicts were declared by the jury, through their foreman, to be their verdicts, when, in response to the interrogatory of the court, the foreman announced they had agreed upon a verdict, and handed these three verdicts to the court as their verdicts upon these special pleas. The court then announced to the counsel, and in the presence of the jury, the contents of these verdicts, and, necessarily, each member of the jury knew what the verdicts in effect declared. Indeed, under the instructions of the court, the jury was not at liberty to bring in a verdict upon these pleas in any other form. After all these proceedings had taken place, defendant's counsel waived the recording of the verdicts in the presence of the jury; and, having made such waiver, he of necessity waived the declaration of the jury that it was their verdict, which the statute requires to be made subsequently to the record of the verdict. In the case of People v. Gilbert, 57 Cal. 96, there was no waiver, and the verdict was not recorded until after the jury had been discharged; and, while the proceeding was irregular, the court decided, especially in the light of sections 1404 and 1258 of the Penal Code, that no error existed which would justify a reversal of the judgment. This principle of irregularity of procedure without prejudicial error was also recognized and approved in People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 494. Section 1404 reads: "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor any error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right." Section 1258: "After hearing the appeal the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." The record clearly shows that irregularities existed in the manner in which these various verdicts were returned into court; irregularities occasioned without necessity, and which could have been easily avoided. In cases of felony, and especially where a defendant is charged with the crime of murder, the only correct procedure is to adhere strictly to the statute. Any other course is a dangerous innovation, which generally results in a miscarriage of justice. We think the irregularities here shown do not affect the validity of the judgment, and are such as come squarely within the provisions of the Penal Code cited. Let the judgment be affirmed.

KAUFFMAN v. MAIER et al. (No. 14,571.)

APPEAL FROM ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL—MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—NON-EXPERT TESTIMONY—ADMISSIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where an appeal is taken from an order granting a new trial, the court is not confined to considering the ground on which such order is made, but will review the entire record, except that where the evidence is conflicting, and the trial court excludes the question of the insufficiency thereof as a ground for granting the new trial, the supreme court will not re-examine the evidence.

2. Where plaintiff, an employe of defendant, while at work threw a towel over a certain shaft, which was not a part of the machinery with which his service was connected, and was never intended for the use to which he put it, defendants are not liable for injuries sustained by plaintiff in attempting to draw the towel from the shaft while the machinery was in motion.

3. Where the testimony of a witness that he informed the foreman of the condition of the shaft was admitted to show knowledge of defendants, it was error to admit the opinions of the witness concerning the shaft, or to permit him to testify as to his motives in telling the foreman.

4. It was error to admit the testimony of machinists as to whether the shaft would be more dangerous if it were jagged and split on the end, since the jury was capable of deciding such question without the aid of experts.

5. Under Const. art. 6, § 19, forbidding judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact, it was error for the trial court to charge that, as a "general rule, the statements of the witnesses as to verbal admissions of a party should be received by the jury with great caution, as that kind of evidence is subject to much imperfection and mistake," such conclusion being an inference of fact to be made by the jury from the peculiar circumstances of each particular case.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by Kauffman against Maier and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Max Lowenthal, Geo. J. Denis, and J. L. Murphy, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick and Hutton & Swanwick, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from their negligence. He was in their employ at the time of the injury, and the negligence charged upon them was their permitting the shaft of a wheel to protrude into the room where he was at work, by reason of which his sleeve was caught upon the jagged end of the shaft, causing him to be carried around it, whereby his arm was so injured as to require amputation. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below, and a new trial was granted upon the motion of the defendants, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed. In their statement upon the motion for a new trial the defendants have assigned various errors of law on the part of the court, as well as many particulars in which the evidence is claimed to be insufficient.

1. In its order granting a new trial the court included the following as a part thereof, viz.: "The new trial is hereby granted upon the following ground specifically, and upon no other ground or grounds, no error being by this court deemed to have occurred at the trial on account whereof a new trial should be granted to defendants, except such ground above referred to, which ground is as follows, to-wit: The court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, which motion should have been granted on the sole ground that the placing of the towel on the shaft, as shown by the evidence, constituted such contributory negligence on his part as to preclude him from recovering in this action. On all other grounds embraced in said motion, save said ground aforesaid, said motion for a new trial is denied." The proposition of the appellant that this court is limited upon this appeal to a consideration of the grounds specified in the order granting the new trial is untenable. A party has the right to move for a new trial upon any or all of the grounds permitted by the statute; and, if the record on which his motion is based discloses more than one ground for which a new trial should be granted, the court cannot, by stating in its order that the motion is granted upon one ground only, and denied upon the others, deprive the other party of the right to a review by this court of the entire record. The action of the court below is limited to granting or refusing a new trial, and, excepting those cases in which it is justified in limiting the new trial to one or more designated issues, the effect of an order granting a new trial is to place the cause in the position it held before any trial had been had. Upon an appeal from that order this court will review the entire record upon which the order was based, and, if there be found any error in the record which would have justified the court in making the order, the order will be affirmed, upon the same principles that an order sustaining a demurrer to a defective complaint will be sustained, even though the ground upon which the trial court sustained it may be held untenable. A motion for a new trial is a proceeding in the nature of a new action, wherein the statement or bill of exceptions corresponds to the complaint, and the specifications of error to a demurrer thereto, and the action of the trial court in sustaining the motion is to be treated on the same principles. If there be any grounds upon which its action can be upheld, the order will be sustained, irrespective of the particular ground given by that court, whether in an opinion or by a statement in the order itself. A contrary rule might work great injustice. If a new trial is granted, the former decision is set aside, and the party whose motion has prevailed is not "aggrieved," and has no ground for an appeal. By the order granting the new trial the judgment is vacated, and the cause is in the same condition as when the issues were joined. But if, upon an appeal from that order, the action by this court is limited to a review of merely the ground designated by the lower court, and that ground should be held insufficient, the moving party would be deprived of the new trial to which the record might show that he is manifestly entitled. This rule has a limitation in cases where one of the grounds upon which the new trial is sought is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision. If in such a case the trial court in its order granting a new trial excludes this as a ground of its action, by direct language, and the record shows that there was a conflict of evidence, this court, upon the same principles that cause it to affirm an order granting or denying a new trial upon that ground, will accept the conclusion of the trial court, and not re-examine the evidence.

The act of the plaintiff in hanging the towel upon the shaft had no connection with the service for which he was employed, but was an act done by him for his own convenience, and in which he voluntarily selected the means by which he would subserve that convenience. The projecting shaft was not a part of the machinery with which his service was connected, and was never intended for the use to which he applied it. Even if its condition was such that the defendants would have been liable for an injury sustained by one of their employes in case he had accidentally come in contact with it while engaged in the service for which he was employed, that condition does not establish any negligence on their part towards the plaintiff in the present case. The plaintiff was not injured by any accidental contact with it while engaged in his employment, but his injury was the result of an unauthorized act of his own, which he did for his own convenience, and at his own risk. He was looking for a place on which to hang his towel, and, seeing this projection, availed himself of it as being the most convenient. The defendants cannot be held liable for the injury received in taking it off, any more than if he had thrown it across a saw, or hung it upon a sharp hook, and been injured in its removal. Not being under the necessity of making use of the shaft for any purpose connected with his employment, whatever risk attended his selection of it for his own purposes was a risk assumed by himself. As his selection of it as a place on which to hang his towel could not have been contemplated by the defendants, they were under no obligation to make it suitable for that purpose, and cannot be held liable for the injury he sustained therefrom. See Pennsylvania Co. v. Lynch, 90 Ill. 333; Railroad Co. v. Sentmeyer, 92 Pa. St. 276; Railroad Co. v. Estes, 37 Kan. 736, 16 Pac. Rep. 131; Cahill v. Hilton, 106 N. Y. 512, 13 N. E. Rep. 339; Electric Light Co. v. Murphy, 115 Ind. 571, 18 N. E. Rep. 30; Iron Co. v. Burke, 12 Ill. App. 369; Shear. & R. Neg. § 207. The proximity of the shaft to the place where he was working was but an incident, and does not affect the liability of the defendants. That proximity doubtless determined his selection of it as the place on which to hang the towel; but, as this was a use of the shaft never intended by the defendants, its selection by him for such use cannot render them liable for the injury any more than if it had been at the end of the room opposite to the place in which he was at work. When, therefore, it appeared from the testimony of the plaintiff that the injury received by him resulted from his voluntary act, unconnected with the service for which he was employed, the court should have granted the nonsuit asked by the defendants, and its order granting a new trial for the error committed in refusing this motion must be affirmed.

3. For the purpose of showing that the defendants had knowledge of the character of the shaft, the witness Geiger was allowed to testify that previous to the injury to the plaintiff he had informed the foreman, Geisner, of its character. He was then asked "What made you tell August Geisner?" to which objection was made by the defendants. The court reserved its ruling upon the objection, and allowed the witness to answer, who said: "I told Geisner that the shaft was of no value there, and it should be cut off; and it was said then that I had nothing to say about it, and it was left as of yore. As foreman, it was Geisner's business to look out and do what was stated to him, but nothing was done there. He was the head man in the malt-house." After the answer had been given, the court overruled the objection to the question, and allowed the testimony to remain. The reason for permitting this witness to give testimony of what he had told Geisner was merely that the knowledge of the defendants concerning the condition of the shaft might be shown as a fact from which their negligence could be inferred, but the motives which prompted the witness to inform the foreman, as well as the opinions of the witness concerning the shaft, were immaterial, and should not have been allowed in evidence.

4. A witness (Ekman) having been shown to be a machinist, and conversant with machinery, was asked the following question: "Question. If that shaft on the end had been pounded or battered, or was in a battered or splintered condition,—that is, having something in the nature of a crown, that made it wider there than it was in further, nearer the wall,—would that make it dangerous or not?" to which he answered: "Answer. If the shaft was battered or split or splintered, in motion it would be dangerous." Also the following question: "Question. If this shaft was smooth, and a towel had been hung upon it, and it in motion, would there be any danger in drawing that towel off?" to which he answered: "Answer. If the shaft is smooth, and the towel hung on the shaft in motion, it would not be dangerous to take it off. If the shaft were not smooth, it is likely to come in contact with clothing, and, if it comes in contact with clothing, will certainly wind the clothing up." Another witness (Johnson) was asked: "Question. What is your opinion as to whether a shaft protruding about eighteen inches, at the height mentioned by him, into a room where workmen are working, against which they might come in contact, if the surface of the same is jagged, rough, and broken,—whether it is dangerous or not;" to which he answered: "Answer. It is. Q. Why is it so? A. It is very likely to catch the clothing of the operator." These questions were objected to by the defendants upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and not a subject of expert testimony; but their objections were overruled. The court erred in not excluding this testimony. An answer to the questions did not involve the knowledge of any science or art, and was not the subject of testimony by an expert in machinery. The facts sought to be shown by the questions did not involve a knowledge of the construction or working of machinery, or in any respect depend upon such knowledge. Whether it is dangerous for a shaft with a rough surface or end to project into a room where there are workmen who may come into contact with it, is not in any case to be determined by expert testimony, but depends in every instance upon the circumstances of the particular case, and must be determined by the jury from all the facts of that case. Whether a towel can be safely taken from a smooth, revolving shaft is a matter of common observation, and is not to be determined by one who is an expert in machinery, any more than by an expert in any other branch of knowledge. Such questions are to be determined by the jury themselves, either from their own experience in matters of common observation, or from all the evidence in the case, and cannot be asked of witnesses, even if such witnesses are experts in some particular art or science. Sappenfield v. Railroad Co., 91 Cal. 60, 27 Pac. Rep. 590. If the court permits the jury to be influenced by the judgment of such witnesses, it deprives the litigants of their right to have the jury render its verdict upon the facts in the case, and to this extent substitutes the judgment of the expert for what should be the judgment of the jury.

5. Evidence was given at the trial tending to show that shortly after the injury the plaintiff had made statements to the effect that it was the result of his own fault, and that the accident had been brought about by a different cause from that shown at the present trial. In its instructions to the jury the court said: "The court instructs the jury that, although parol proof of the verbal admissions of a party to a suit, when it appears that the admissions were understandingly and deliberately made, often afford satisfactory evidence, yet as a general rule the statements of the witnesses as to the verbal admissions of a party should be received by the jury with great caution, as that kind of evidence is subject to much imperfection and mistake. The party himself may have been misinformed, or may not have clearly expressed his meaning, or the witness may have misunderstood him; and it frequently happens that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party did actually say. But it is the province of the jury to weigh such evidence, and give it the consideration to which it is entitled in view of all the other evidence in the case." In thus instructing the jury the court disregarded the provision of the constitution that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."[1] While it is a matter of common knowledge that the statements of a witness as to the verbal admissions of another are liable to be erroneous, and for that reason should be received with caution, yet such conclusion is only an inference of fact which must be made by the jury, and is not a presumption or a conclusion of law to be declared by the court. The reasons which are to be urged in favor of receiving such statements with caution are based upon human experience, and vary in strength and conclusiveness with the facts and circumstances of each case, and their sufficiency in any particular case is an inference which the reason of the jury makes from those facts and circumstances; but there is no rule of law which directs the jury to invariably make such an inference from the mere fact that the proof of the admission is by oral testimony. That deduction, called a "presumption," which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts, is uniform, and not dependent upon the varying conditions and circumstances of individual cases. To weigh the evidence and find the facts in any case is the province of the jury, and that province is invaded by the court whenever it instructs them that any particular evidence which has been laid before them is or is not entitled to receive weight or consideration from them. People v. Walden, 51 Cal. 588; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 173, 20 Pac. Rep. 396; Mauro v. Platt, 62 Ill. 450; Com. v. Galligan, 113 Mass. 202; McNeil v. Barney, 51 Cal. 603; People v. Dick, 34 Cal. 666. The instruction above quoted is, in substance, an argument to the jury with "respect to matters of fact" that had been presented at the trial, and a comment by the court upon the weight which they should give to that testimony. Whether the facts and circumstances proved in the case were sufficient to cause the reason of the jury to make this inference was fair matter of argument for the counsel of the respective parties; but the court forsook its judicial position when it assumed the office of commenting upon the weight and credibility of this evidence. The closing paragraph in the instruction, to the effect that it was for the jury to give to the evidence the consideration to which it was entitled, did not obviate the error, as by its remarks the court had in substance said to them that as matter of law the evidence was not entitled to any great consideration. The order is affirmed.

What Constitutes Will.

Deceased wrote his sister as follows: "Nina: I wrote you yesterday hastily. Answer my letter at once. I want to know everything about mother, and all about you,—your children. I have reached the point of perfect independence, pecuniarily. My health is probably ruined, and I want to anticipate possibilities. You and your children get everything. Your boy I want given the best of educations. I would like him to go to Harvard. * * * Write me. As soon as I possibly can, I will be in Savannah." Held, that the letter was not testamentary in character, and made no disposition of the estate of the deceased.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of C. B. Richardson, deceased. From a judgment denying a petition for the probate of the will, and refusing to allow letters of administration with the will annexed, Mrs. Hardee appeals. Affirmed.

[1] Article 6, § 19

FOOTE, C. This appeal is taken from a judgment or decree denying the petition for the probate of a will, and refusing to allow letters of administration with the will annexed to be issued. That which is propounded as a will is a letter written and sent in due course of mail by the deceased in his life-time from Los Angeles, Cal., to his sister, Mrs. Hardee, in Savannah, Ga. It reads thus: "Los Angeles, Cal., October 1, '90. Nina: I wrote you yesterday, hastily. Answer my letter at once. I want to know everything about mother, and all about you,—your children. I have reached the point of perfect independence, pecuniarily. My health is probably ruined, and I want to anticipate possibilities. You and your children get everything. Your boy I want given the best of educations. I would like him to go to Harvard. I would like to have him a lawyer. Don't bring him up a prejudiced southerner, but teach honor,—make it dearer than life, and he must, with the blood in his veins, be a man. Write me. As soon as I possibly can, I will be in Savannah. BROTHER." We think it necessary to determine but one point made by the appellant, which is that the second conclusion of law is not warranted by the findings. It reads thus: "That said document is not testamentary in its character, and makes no testamentary disposition of the estate or property of said deceased." The language of the letter, which is propounded as the last will and testament of the deceased, is not, to our minds, testamentary in its character. There is nothing in the circumstances and surroundings of the writer which unmistakably evince that it was his intention that the letter in question should be a testamentary disposition of his estate to his sister Nina and her children. It may be that he wished to be informed of some fact or facts before he made a will, for in this letter he shows a desire to hear from his sister at once in answer to a letter written the day before. He was not in extremis, nor is there anything to show that he contemplated immediate or very proximate dissolution, which might necessitate a final disposition of his estate. Again, even in a document such as this, if intended as a will, it would be likely that some expression in the shape of "I wish or I desire" my property to go to such or such a person, would very naturally be used if the intention existed to make the instrument a testamentary disposition, rather than to say, "You and your children get everything;" for the first expressions would show a disposition at that time to have his estate go to certain persons. The last expression might be used in a letter like this, by one who had already made a formal will, which may have been lost or destroyed, or might be with reference to making a formal will,—that is, "You and your children get everything by a formal will," or "will get everything by a will I shall make." This construction of the language is as consistent with a proper interpretation of it as is that contended for by the appellant. It is not for courts to declare that to be a testamentary disposition of his estate, when it does not clearly appear that such was the intention of the individual executing it. The court below was justified, under the findings, in this conclusion of law. We advise that the judgment or decree be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment or decree is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. WILLIS et al. v. HOWARD et al. (No. 14,447.)

PUBLIC LIBRARIES—GOVERNMENT.

In proceedings to determine the right to manage and control a public library, it appeared that, prior to March 28, 1878, there had been a private voluntary association which had established and maintained in L. a library for the use of its members. In 1874 an act was passed providing for the establishment of a public library in L., and by its provisions the library was controlled by nine regents, who were elected by the city council. March 28, 1878, the act was repealed by the city charter, and the mayor and council were constituted trustees of the library. March 28, 1878, the city council elected a board of regents, and April 6th the board duly organized, and the same day the library association made over to the public library thus organized all the books belonging to the association. Held, that this library did not come under Acts 1880, p. 231, which put in the charge of trustees therein provided for all libraries established by authority of that act.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Proceedings on the relation of F. R. Willis and others against F. H. Howard and others to determine the right to manage and control the Los Angeles public library. From a judgment for defendants the relators appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Willis & Appel, for appellants. F. W. Howard, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. The relators were elected trustees of the public library of the city of Los Angeles, December 1, 1890, under an act of the legislature passed in 1880, entitled "An act to establish free public libraries and reading-rooms." The defendants were appointed by the city council, as provided by the city charter adopted and approved in 1889. Whether the city charter or the act of 1880 controls is the only question involved. We find in respondents' brief what purports to be the opinion of the learned judge of the trial court, which we approve and recommend for adoption as the opinion of this court, in accordance with which we think the judgment should be affirmed. The opinion is as follows:

"This is a proceeding to determine whether the relators or the defendants have the right to manage and control the Los Angeles public library. The case is submitted to the court for decision upon the facts stated in the pleadings. On March 4, 1874, a special act was passed by the legislature, providing for the establishment of a public library in the city of Los Angeles. Acts 1873–74, p. 274. Under this law the present Los Angeles public library was first organized and established. By its provisions the library was controlled by nine regents, who were elected by the council. This act of 1874 was repealed by the city charter of 1878, and different provisions were made in the charter for the management and control of the library. The mayor and council were constituted the trustees of the library, and had the control and management thereof. The library continued to be managed according to the provisions of the charter of 1878, until the adoption of the charter of 1889. This charter provides that the library shall be continued in existence, and shall be managed by five directors, to be appointed by the mayor, and confirmed by the council. The defendants were duly appointed directors of the library under the last charter, and ever since then have been, and still are, as such directors, in the control and management of the library. The constitution of 1879 provides that 'cities heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws.' Article 11, § 6. In 1880 a general law was passed, entitled 'An act to establish free public libraries and reading-rooms.' It contains the following provisions: 'Sec. 2. The municipal authorities of any incorporated city of this state are authorized and empowered, by a resolution duly passed for that purpose, to levy and collect, as in other cases, annually, a tax, not to exceed one mill on the dollar, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining in such city free public libraries and reading-rooms, and purchasing such books, journals, and other publications as may be necessary therefor.' 'Sec. 5. In a city of less than one hundred thousand population five trustees shall be elected at the same time, and in the same manner, as the other town officers are elected. They shall hold office the same length of time, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.' 'Sec. 8. The trustees of any library or reading-room established or acquired by authority of this act shall take charge of the same, and of all real and personal property thereunto belonging.' 'Sec. 14. An act entitled "An act to establish and maintain free public libraries and reading-rooms," approved March 18, 1878, is hereby repealed. All libraries and reading-rooms heretofore established by authority of the last-named act, in any city, shall be turned over to the charge, custody, and administration of such trustees as may be constituted or appointed therein under the provisions of this act.' Acts 1880, p. 231. The relators were duly elected trustees, under the provisions of the act of 1880, aforesaid, at the last city election, and have duly qualified as such trustees, and upon that ground claim the right to the control and management of the public library in question.

"The organization of the library under the act of 1874 did not take place until March 28, 1878. Prior to that time there had been a private voluntary association, known as the 'Los Angeles Library Association,' which had established and maintained a library, not for the public, but for the use of its members. On March 28, 1878, the city council elected a board of regents, as provided by the act of 1874, and on April 6, 1878, this board duly organized, and the same day the library association made over to the public library thus organized all the books belonging to the association. Thus began the present free public library. It was not therefore established under the authority of the act of March 18, 1878, nor under the act of 1880. The relators insist that, the act of 1880 being a general law, its provisions apply to all libraries existing in cities as public libraries, and that trustees elected under the act of 1880 have the legal right to manage and control all public libraries in such cities, and that, therefore, they have the legal right to the control of the Los Angeles public library. The defendants contend that the act of 1880 applies solely to libraries established under its provisions, and not to those existing prior to 1880, and established prior to that time under special laws and charters. At the time this library was established as a public library, there was no constitutional inhibition of the enactment of local or special laws for such purposes. The provision of the present constitution, making cities and charter cities subject to general laws, does not apply to this case; for it is manifest that they can be subject only to such general laws as, by their terms or by necessary implication, are made to apply to cities, or generally, throughout the state. So also it is clear that public libraries in cities are not necessarily subject to a general law which, by its own terms, does not apply to all libraries generally, but only to a particular class of libraries. In order to be subject to such a law, they must be of the class included in the law. The act of 1880 does not apply to all libraries, but only to such as may be established under its provisions. It does not give to the trustees elected under it any powers over other libraries. The language used is, 'The trustees of any library established or acquired by authority of this act shall take charge of the same.' They are not authorized to take charge of any library established under the act of 1874. Therefore the Los Angeles public library is not affected by the act of 1880, because it is not of the class mentioned in that act. Where there is no general law on a given subject to which the charter relates, the provisions of the charter must be allowed to prevail. The defendants being rightfully appointed under the provisions of the charter, they are entitled to the charge and control of this library. The judgment will therefore be in favor of the defendants."

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

In re GROOME'S ESTATE. (No. 14,666.)

PUBLIC LANDS—HOMESTEAD ENTRIES—CREATION OF TRUST.

1. Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2290, which provides that a person applying for the benefit of the homestead law shall make affidavit before the register or receiver "that such application is made for his exclusive use and benefit, and that his entry is made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person," an agreement by a partner to file on land under the United States homestead law, and take the title for the benefit of the partnership, is illegal and void.

2. Where a partner files on land and afterwards make a parol agreement that the land shall belong to the partnership, such agreement, not being in writing as required by Civil Code, § 852, does not create any trust, or vest in his partners any estate in the land.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Petition of Julia Groome, widow of Thomas B. Groome, deceased, praying that certain land might be set apart as a home for herself and minor daughter. Petition denied. Petitioner appeals. Order reversed.

F. A. Dorn and Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In July, 1886, Thomas B. Groome, under the homestead laws of the United States, filed a homestead claim upon 160 acres of public land in San Luis Obispo county. At the time of filing his claim, he was living on the land filed upon with his family, and continued to do so thereafter till he died. In 1887 he commuted his homestead, and paid the government for the land, and in December, 1890, a government patent therefor was issued and delivered in his name. In May, 1890, he died intestate, leaving surviving him his widow, Julia Groome, and one daughter, then 16 years of age. In August, 1890, letters of administration upon his estate were duly issued to his widow, who qualified and entered upon the discharge of her duties. In December, 1890, appraisers of the estate were duly appointed, and in May, 1891, an inventory and appraisement of all the property of the estate were made and returned to the court. This inventory included the 160 acres of land above mentioned, and the tract was appraised at the sum of $800, its then cash value. During his life-time no homestead was ever selected by the decedent or his wife under the laws of this state. On May 29, 1891, the widow presented and filed in court her petition, alleging that at the time of his death her deceased husband was the owner of the said 160 acres of land, and that the same was then community property of herself and husband, and praying that the court make an order selecting, designating, and setting apart the said real property as a home for the use of herself and minor daughter. To this petition one L. T. Almstead filed written opposition, and alleged therein "that the real property described in said petition was owned by and belonged to said deceased, this opponent, and one John Mintern, who were partners at the time said decedent died; that the same was and is now partnership property; * * * that said decedent only had a five-sixteenths interest in said partnership." Wherefore he prayed that the prayer of the petition be not granted. When the petition came on to be heard, the petitioner introduced her proofs, including the United States patent to her deceased husband, dated December 29, 1890, and rested. Almstead was then allowed, against the objection of petitioner, to testify as follows: "I know the land described in the petition in this proceeding. In the year 1884 it was public land of the United States. It was claimed by the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company. Levi Sprague had possession, and had a fence on about 40 acres of it. I bought Sprague's right and possession. Shortly after that I formed a partnership with Thomas B. Groome, now deceased, and John Mintern, for the purpose of acquiring land and stock-raising. My interest in the partnership was eight-sixteenths, Groome's five-sixteenths, and Mintern's three-sixteenths. I turned this land into the partnership, and we placed thereon the house, fencing, and other improvements now on the land. In the year 1886 we found out that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad had no right to the land, and we copartners then agreed that Groome should file on it under the United States homestead law, and get the title for the benefit of the partnership,—the partnership to pay all expenses. Groome then moved onto the land, and in July, 1886, filed on it under the United States homestead law. In the year 1887 Groome commuted said homestead and paid the government for the land out of the partnership funds, and he charged the money so paid to the partnership on the firm books; and thereafter, in settlement of our accounts, Groome agreed that the land belonged to the partnership. Since the year 1884 the partnership has used all of said land for partnership purposes, except the dwelling-house and buildings and garden. We cultivated a portion each year, and the remainder we used for pasture. Said partnership is solvent, having property at the value of about $15,000, and being indebted in the sum of $1,400." The court found the facts to be as above set forth, and as testified to by Almstead, and then as a conclusion of law found: "That at the time of his death said Thomas B. Groome was not the owner of said land. That said land was not the community property of said deceased and his wife, Julia. That said Thomas B. Groome, at the time of his death, held the legal title to said land in trust for said partnership composed of Almstead, Mintern, and Groome; and said partnership was then and is now the owner of the equitable title to said land." An order was accordingly entered denying the prayer of the petition, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, the petitioner appeals.

It is very clear, we think, that the rulings complained of were erroneous. Section 2290 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that a person applying for the benefit of the homestead law shall make affidavit before the register or receiver "that such application is made for his exclusive use and benefit, and that his entry is made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person." If, therefore, Groome, before or at the time of making his application to file on the land, agreed with his partners to "file on it under the United States homestead law and get the title for the benefit of the partnership," the agreement was in contravention of the spirit and policy of the law, and hence illegal and void. Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112, 27 Pac. Rep. 735. And if, after Groome acquired the title, he made a parol agreement in settlement of the accounts "that the land belonged to the partnership," such agreement did not create any trust or vest in his partners any estate in the land. Civil Code, § 852.

Again, as the decedent had the apparent legal title to the land and was residing on it at the time of his death, and it was inventoried and appraised as a part of his estate, the question of adverse ownership could not be considered in a proceeding like this, but must be tried and determined in another forum. Estate of Burton, 63 Cal. 36; Id., 64 Cal. 428, 1 Pac. Rep. 702. We advise that the orders appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the orders appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN LUIS OBISPO v. BRUCE et al. (No. 14,433.)

HOMESTEAD—LIABILITY TO SALE FOR MORTGAGE DEBT.

Civil Code, § 1241, subd. 4, provides that the homestead shall be subject to sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained on debts secured by mortgage on the premises executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record. Held, that premises occupied by a husband and wife were not subject to sale on execution in satisfaction of a judgment founded on a debt secured by mortgage thereon which was executed by the husband before, but not recorded until after, a declaration of homestead had been made by the wife, even though such declaration was made by her with full knowledge of her husband's intended removal from the premises, and with the intention on her part to remove therefrom with him.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of San Luis Obispo against A. L. Bruce and I. A. Bruce on a note and mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff against A. L. Bruce, and in favor of defendant I. A. Bruce against plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Spencer, for appellant. John A. Kimball and S. M. Swinnerton, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. On April 12, 1889, defendant A. L. Bruce mortgaged the premises described in the complaint, and valued at $2,000, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note executed by him to plaintiff for the sum of $500. On April 28, 1890, said mortgage was duly recorded. On April 7, 1890, defendant I. A. Bruce, wife of said A. L. Bruce, who, with her husband and children, was then, and for two years prior thereto had been, actually residing on and using said premises (which were common property) as a home, declared a homestead thereon, without any knowledge on her part, if that be material, at the time of such declaration, that they had been previously mortgaged by her husband to plaintiff. In July, 1889, the defendant A. L. Bruce made and filed his homestead application and claim under the homestead laws of the United States, on certain land adjoining said premises, and, in February, 1890, he hauled several hundred feet of lumber on said claim, with which he afterwards built a house thereon, commencing the construction thereof about the 1st of March, and completing the same between the 10th and 17th of April following. On April 17, 1890, defendants moved with their children and household goods from the land described in the complaint into the house built on the United States homestead claim referred to, where they continued thereafter to reside and make their home for about five months, when they abandoned the United States homestead claim, and returned to the land described in the complaint, where they have ever since resided. It further appears that at the time the defendant I. A. Bruce filed her said declaration of homestead on said premises, she had full knowledge of all her husband's acts in relation to said United States homestead claim, and that she intended to move with him therefrom to said claim, which she afterwards did on April 17th following. This action is brought to foreclose the above-mentioned mortgage, and I. A. Bruce, the wife, is joined as a party defendant. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff against defendant A. L. Bruce for the full amount of the note, with interest and costs, and in favor of the defendant I. A. Bruce against plaintiff for costs. The appeal is taken by plaintiff upon the judgment roll alone.

The only question presented by this appeal is whether, upon the facts, as above stated, the premises in question are subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of a judgment or decree founded on a debt secured by mortgage thereon, executed by the husband before, but not recorded until after, the declaration of homestead was made by the wife, such declaration having been made by her with full knowledge, at the time, of her husband's intended removal from the premises, and with the intention on her part to remove therefrom with him. Section 1241 of the Civil Code provides that "the homestead is subject to execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments obtained * * * (4) On debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." Mr. Justice McFARLAND, in construing the foregoing subdivision of said section, in Bank v. Gerry, 91 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. Rep. 531, uses the following language: "It makes no difference that the mortgage (if it was a mortgage on the land) in the case at bar was executed by the husband before the legal title vested in the wife; the mortgage was not recorded 'before the declaration of homestead was filed,' and therefore cannot be enforced against the wife's claim of homestead. And the wife has a right in the homestead which she can protect, not only against the husband's creditors, but against the husband himself. The respondent could have protected his mortgage by simply recording it. It is simply a matter of statutory provision." But it is contended by appellant that there should have existed, at the time of such declaration, "an honest intention on the part of the husband and wife to make the premises described in the declaration their permanent home. Neither entertained any such intention. They were then almost ready to remove to adjoining lands for the purpose of acquiring title thereto under the homestead laws of the United States. Ten days after filing the declaration they did remove to the adjoining land with their household goods, and there made their home until after the commencement of this action." At the time the declaration was made, the claimant, with her husband and children, actually occupied and used the premises in question as a home. It therefore follows that her right under the statute to declare a homestead thereon was absolute and unquestionable; and as she exercised it, as she had the right to do, independently of her husband, for their joint benefit, she cannot be held to answer for his acts and declarations to take up a residence on some other land. Assuming, then, the existence of the other necessary conditions, her declaration under these circumstances created a valid and subsisting homestead, under our statute, and her right to make such declaration was in no way affected by her intended removal, at the time, with her husband, which she afterwards carried into effect; and her removal in pursuance of such intention was but the performance of a solemn duty imposed on her by her obligations as a wife, and in this respect she was subject to his control. Our homestead laws were wisely intended to empower the wife to preserve and protect the home for the joint benefit of herself and husband, not only against the husband's creditors, but "against the husband himself," and this she would be powerless to effect if, by performing her duty as a spouse, she could be held to account for the husband's acts and declarations showing an intention to the contrary of that evidenced by her solemn declaration in writing. The residence of the husband is made by law the residence of the wife. According, then, to appellant's contention, if the husband intended, when the wife made her declaration, to move from the premises and take up his residence elsewhere, such declaration would be invalid, because, as she intended to perform her duty as a wife by moving with him, she could not, in the face of such a legal impediment, "have honestly intended to occupy them as a permanent home." This position is totally at variance with the letter and spirit of the homestead laws. That they subsequently abandoned the adjoining land, and returned to the premises occupied by them when the homestead was declared, furnishes a striking illustration of the wisdom and policy of the law in thus enabling the wife, independently of the husband, to preserve and protect the home, not only against the husband's creditors, but "against the husband himself." The court, in finding, if such finding was necessary, that the defendants intended to remove from the premises when the declaration was made, and that they afterwards carried such intention into effect, evidently meant to say that, as the husband intended to and did remove from the premises, the wife, as was her duty, also intended to and did remove with him.

The judgment should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

YOUNG v. BRADY. (No. 14,455.)

RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

1. In assumpsit, where the issue was whether plaintiff paid money for defendant at his request, and whether the latter promised to repay him, defendant denied on cross-examination having any recollection of certain admissions as to such indebtedness. Held, that the testimony offered by plaintiff in rebuttal was properly excluded, as it was part of his original case.

2. As evidence to impeach defendant, it was inadmissible, no proper foundation having been laid by calling his attention to the circumstances under which the alleged admissions were made.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Assumpsit by A. E. Young against Francis Brady. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hendrick & Younkin and A. H. Sweet, for appellant. Parish, Mossholder & Lewis, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action of assumpsit for money alleged to have been loaned by plaintiff to defendant. Judgment for defendant, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff brings this appeal.

The evidence for plaintiff tends to prove money paid or expended for the defendant, rather than money loaned; but no point is made on this ground. Whether the money had been paid for the defendant, or at his request, and whether he had promised to repay it, were the principal questions contested at the trial. The defendant testified that no money had been paid or expended by plaintiff for him, or at his request. On cross-examination he testified that he was at plaintiff's house probably half a dozen times while he was building a house on a piece of public land, which he had entered as a pre-emptioner, in the vicinity of plaintiff's residence, and that he was at plaintiff's house on the evening after he entered the land. He was then asked the following question: "Do you recollect having any conversation there with Mr. Young, [plaintiff] in the presence of Miss Green, during this time, in reference to how thankful you were that he had secured this claim [the pre-emption claim] for you, and that you were going to reimburse him as soon as you could? Answer. No, sir; never had such a conversation." The plaintiff called Miss Green in rebuttal, who testified that she had lived with plaintiff since she was a child, and recollected the time defendant took possession of the land; that she had heard conversations between plaintiff and defendant, at plaintiff's house, at different times, within 10 days after defendant took possession of the land, about that land, or the purchase of land. She was then asked whether, at any of those times, she heard a conversation between them "in reference to repaying Mr. Young the money Young had advanced to Mrs. Barton, * * * wherein the defendant stated that he was exceedingly thankful to Mr. Young for obtaining for him the land, and that he would endeavor to pay him the money which plaintiff had paid to Mrs. Barton as soon as he possibly could, at least by the time he would make his proof upon the land;" and asking the witness to confine herself "to the conversation in reference to his thankfulness to Mr. Young for securing the land, and that he would pay the money that he had paid Mrs. Barton as soon as he could, or by the time that he would make his proof upon the land." Upon objection by defendant's counsel, the court excluded this proffered testimony, on the grounds (1) that, as admissions of the defendant they were part of plaintiff's original case, which should not have been withheld for the purpose of rebutting the evidence on the part of the defendant; and (2) that, as evidence to impeach the defendant, the proper foundation had not been laid for its admission. The propriety of this ruling is the only question presented. The court was not asked to permit the plaintiff to reopen his case for the purpose of introducing this testimony; therefore the court did not err in excluding it as a part of plaintiff's original case. Kohler v. Wells, 26 Cal. 607; Water Co. Crary, 25 Cal. 506; sections 607, 2042, Code Civil Proc. As evidence to impeach the defendant, a proper foundation had not been laid for the admission of any material part of it. The defendant had not been asked whether in any conversation with plaintiff, in the presence of Miss Green, or at plaintiff's house, he had said anything about reimbursing or repaying plaintiff for any money advanced or paid by plaintiff to Mrs. Barton; nor anything as to the nature of the favor or service the plaintiff had done, for which he (defendant) had said he was thankful. That the defendant was thankful for some undisclosed favor or service in assisting him to secure his land claim, and for which he intended "to reimburse" plaintiff, was wholly irrelevant to any material issue. It had no tendency to prove that plaintiff had loaned money to defendant, or paid or expended money for or on account of the defendant; and therefore the answer of the defendant to the question of plaintiff's counsel as to this collateral irrelevant matter was conclusive upon the plaintiff. Pierce v. Schaden, 59 Cal. 540. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

MOSGROVE v. HARRIS. (No. 14,481.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—CHANGE OF POSSESSION—REPLEVIN OF ATTACHED PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

1. One L. sold plaintiff a lot of hogs, which were on his ranch in another county than that in which the sale was made, the ranch being in the possession and occupancy of L. Plaintiff never saw the hogs, but had them inspected by his agent before purchasing them. After the sale, and until they were attached as the property of L., they remained on the ranch in charge of the same persons who had charge of them before the sale, though they were requested after the sale to take charge of them for plaintiff, and consented to do so. Held, that the court was warranted in finding the sale fraudulent as against L.'s creditors, on the ground that there was not an immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession.

2. In replevin for property seized by defendant as sheriff on attachment against one from whom plaintiff had purchased the property, it being claimed that the sale was fraudulent, defendant may, to show the indebtedness of the seller to the attaching creditor, introduce the judgment in the action by such creditor against the seller, though the service on the seller therein was by publication, since the judgment is used to effect the attached property only.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by one Mosgrove against one Harris to recover the possession of personal property. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Stephens and Z. B. West, for appellant. Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Action to recover the possession of certain personal property. Plaintiff claimed and obtained the delivery of the property to him as provided in chapter 2, tit. 7, Code Civil Proc. The defendant in his answer denies that plaintiff is the owner or ever was in the possession, or entitled to the possession, of said personal property; and alleges that he, (defendant,) as sheriff of the county of Orange, duly levied upon and attached said property under and by virtue of a writ of attachment duly issued out of the superior court of said county, in an action wherein the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana was plaintiff, and John Leberry and Claude E. Weber were defendants. The court found that on the 1st day of March, 1890, John Leberry was the sole owner of all the personal property described in the complaint, and that on the 5th day of March, 1890, he sold said property to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration. "That such sale was not followed by an immediate or any delivery of said property to said plaintiff, and was not followed by an actual and continued change of possession, or any change of possession whatsoever, but that the possession of said property remained in the possession of said Leberry and his employes." On the 13th day of March, 1890, the defendant, as such sheriff, and under and by virtue of such writ of attachment, levied upon, attached, and took into his possession the property described in plaintiff's complaint as the property of John Leberry, the defendant in the said writ, who at the time of such taking by the defendant herein had the control and possession of said property until the defendant herein, as sheriff, took the same from the possession of said John Leberry, his agents and employes. On the 18th day of March, 1890, plaintiff demanded of defendant the possession of said property, and at the same time exhibited a bill of sale dated March 1, 1890, from John Leberry to plaintiff; but defendant refused to deliver the possession of said property to plaintiff, and on the 21st day of March, 1890, plaintiff commenced this action to recover the possession of said property, and made an affidavit, and executed and filed an undertaking, and procured an order to the coroner of said county to take from defendant said property, and delivered the same to the said coroner, who on or about the 25th day of February, 1890, took said property from the possession of defendant, and delivered the same to the plaintiff herein, who still holds and retains the same. Defendant in his answer claimed the redelivery to him of said property, and demanded the return or its value in case a redelivery could not be had. The value of said property is found to be $620. As conclusions of law the court found: (1) That the sale of the property described in plaintiff's complaint from John Leberry to the plaintiff was fraudulent, and therefore void as to said Commercial Bank of Santa Ana; (2) that the defendant herein is entitled to the return of said personal property, and to recover the possession thereof from the plaintiff; and that, in case such return cannot be had, he is entitled to recover the sum of $620.50, the value thereof, from plaintiff, together with costs of suit; and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff moved for a new trial on a statement. Said motion was denied, and from said judgment and order denying said motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

Appellant's main contention here is that the finding of the court "that such sale [by Leberry to plaintiff] was not followed by an immediate or any delivery of said property to said plaintiff, and was not followed by an actual and continued change of possession or any change of possession whatsoever, but that the possession of the property in the said Leberry, his agents and employes," is not justified by the evidence. There is evidence tending to prove that on the 1st day of March, 1890, John Leberry sold to plaintiff the personal property in controversy, to-wit, 159 hogs. The sale of the property was negotiated at the city of Los Angeles, but the hogs were on a ranch near Newport, in Orange county, and the ranch was in the possession and occupancy of Leberry, the owner of the hogs. The plaintiff never saw the hogs, but had them inspected by his agent Lowe, before purchasing them. The hogs after the sale remained upon the ranch of Leberry in charge of the same persons who had charge of them before the sale, although they were requested after the sale to take charge of them for plaintiff, and consented to do so and did so until the hogs were attached by the defendant. We think the evidence of immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession of the property in this case much weaker than it was in Engles v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 320, therefore we cannot disturb the finding of the court upon that issue.

At the trial the defendant offered "in evidence the judgment in the case of Commercial Bank v. John Leberry, No. 152, in the superior court of the county of Orange, including the complaint, summons, affidavit of service of the summons, and judgment, for the purpose of showing indebtedness of said Leberry to the said bank." To the introduction of said judgment in evidence the plaintiff objected "upon the ground that, as against him, the judgment, having been obtained by the publication of summons in an action to which he was not a party, could not prove, or tend to prove, any indebtedness of Leberry to the said bank, that is, as against the plaintiff, and as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; and further, that, even if personal service had been made upon Leberry, the judgment roll would not, as against the plaintiff, tend to prove any indebtedness of Leberry to the bank." The objection was overruled, and plaintiff excepted. A judgment entered in an action in which the service of summons is by publication, in any action in which property is attached, cannot be used as evidence in another proceeding not affecting the attached property. This action does affect the attached property, and nothing beyond it; therefore the judgment was admissible in evidence. The objection to the introduction of the affidavit for the writ of attachment was properly overruled. Judgment and order affirmed.

MARTIN et al. v. LLOYD et al. (No. 14,380.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. In November, 1884, the owner of a tract of land, including the strip in dispute, contracted to sell a portion of the land to D. and W. A part of the description of the land mentioned in the contract was as follows: "Bounded on the east by the road, 16 feet wide, between the lands of Price and the party of the first part, and a continuation of the west line of said road northerly to the barranca," etc. D. entered into possession of the land, but subsequently, after some litigation over the contract, judgment was rendered in the grantor's favor. In June, 1886, the owner entered into a contract with R., and three year later conveyed the piece to her by a description substantially the same as that in the contract with D. and W. Plaintiffs derive title from R. In September, 1886, the owners of the large tract sold it to one of defendants, "excepting a tract of land heretofore agreed to be conveyed by L. Snodgrass to D. and W., known as the 'Dunlap Place,' particularly described as follows: 'Commencing at the bridge at the Graveyard barranca on Telegraph road; thence running east along the N. line of said road to S. W. corner of Mrs. Price's land; thence N. to Graveyard barranca; thence down center of same to place of beginning.'" Held, that the language used in the deed to defendant showed an intention to except the "Dunlap Place," and that the latter part of the description was not intended to and did not limit the boundaries of that place.

2. The fact that the contract to convey to D. & W. was not recorded until after defendant's purchase, was not material, since the latter was put on inquiry as to the "Dunlap Place" by his contract and deed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. Williams, Judge.

Action to quiet title by S. C. Martin and others against Lewis M. Lloyd and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Blackstock & Shepherd, for appellants. J. Hamer and W. H. Wilde, for respondents.

McFarland. This is an action to quiet title. Judgment went for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The land in dispute is a narrow wedge-shaped piece, with the point to the south, and widening as it runs northerly. The northerly end of the piece is a certain ravine, called the "San Juan" or "Graveyard" barranca. On the east side of the strip in dispute there is a piece of land called the "Price Tract," which commences at the lower or southerly end of the land in dispute, and runs along it northerly about one-third of the distance up to the barranca. Along the west side of the Price tract there is a road 16 feet wide, which stops at the northerly line of said Price tract. Now, the contention of plaintiffs is that the easterly line of the land in contest is the westerly line of said road as far as it extends, and a prolongation of said line northerly to the barranca. The direction of such line would be several degrees east of north. The defendants contend that the true easterly line of the land in contest commences at the south-west corner of the Price tract, on the easterly side of the road, and runs diagonally across the said road, due north, to the said barranca.

It is true, as appellants contend, that this is not an action to reform a deed; and, being an action to quiet title, plaintiffs were called upon to show title in themselves. And the question to be determined was whether or not the exception in a certain deed to defendant Lewis M. Lloyd included the land in contest. On November 28, 1884, one Larkin Snodgrass owned a large tract of land,—4,280 acres,—including the land in contest in this case; and on that day he entered into a written contract to sell a certain part of said large tract to Alice L. Dunlap and Susan A. Watkins. The part of the description of the land mentioned in said contract which it is necessary to here state is as follows: "* * * Bounded on the east by the road, 16 feet wide, between the lands of Price and the party of the first part, and a continuation of the west line of said road northerly to the barranca known as the 'Graveyard Barranca;' thence southerly along the center of said barranca, or corporate limits to the town of San Buenaventura, to the northerly line of the public road; and thence easterly along said road to the westerly line of said road between the lands of the party of the first part and lands of Price." Thereupon Mrs. Dunlap entered upon the full possession of the land described in said contract, resided upon and cultivated it, and it became and was commonly known as "The Dunlap Place." Some time afterwards there was litigation over this contract, which finally terminated in favor of Snodgrass; and on June 5, 1886, Snodgrass and Cooper and Brooks, who then each owned one-third of the large tract, entered into a contract with Mary E. Redrup to sell her the said Dunlap place. The description in the contract with Redrup was substantially the same as that in the contract with Dunlap; the part in the description in the contract with Redrup material here being as follows: "* * * To the west line of the road running between lands of the parties of the first part and Price, and thence northerly along the west line of said road and the prolongation of said line to the said San Juan barranca." The land thus agreed to be sold to Redrup was identical with the land formerly agreed to be sold to Dunlap and Watkins, and known as "The Dunlap Place." On May 13, 1889, Snodgrass, Brooks, and Cooper conveyed by deed to Mrs. Redrup the land mentioned in said tract,—the description in the deed being the same as that in the contract; and on August 4, 1889, Mrs. Redrup, by deed with the same description, conveyed said land to the plaintiffs in this action. The said contract between Snodgrass and Dunlap and Watkins was recorded June 14, 1887; and the said contract with Mrs. Redrup was recorded November 1, 1887. The deeds above mentioned were recorded immediately after their execution.

If, therefore, the foregoing facts were the only facts to be considered in the case, it is clear that the easterly line of the plaintiffs' land is the westerly line of the 16-foot road adjoining the Price tract, extended northerly to the said barranca. But there are other facts upon which appellants base their contention. On September 8, 1886, Snodgrass, Brooks, and Cooper entered into a written contract with the defendant Lewis M. Lloyd, by which they agreed to sell to him the said large tract of land herein first described, excepting and reserving, however, several pieces of land which had theretofore been conveyed, or which the grantors had contracted to convey; and among such exceptions was the said Dunlap place, described simply as "about 60 acres, known as the 'Dunlap Tract.'" Three days thereafter, on September 11, 1886, they executed a deed of conveyance of said large tract to said Lloyd in pursuance of said contract, and in the deed the exception of the Dunlap tract was as follows: "Also excepting a tract of land heretofore agreed to be conveyed by L. Snodgrass to Mrs. Alice Dunlap and Mrs. Watkins, known as the 'Dunlap Place,' particularly described as follows: 'Commencing at the bridge at the Graveyard barranca on Telegraph road; thence running east along the N. line of said road to S. W. corner of Mrs. Price's land; thence N. to Graveyard barranca; thence down center of same to place of beginning.'" If this description had followed the contract, and had stopped with the words "Dunlap Place," there would have been no difficulty as to its meaning. But it is contended by appellants that the latter part of the description controls the first part; that the words "to S. W. corner of Mrs. Price's land" carries the line across the road; and that "thence N. to Graveyard barranca" carries the line running northward diagonally back across the road in a course due north to the barranca. In the absence of proof whether or not the 16-foot road was upon, and, therefore, a part of, the Price tract, it might be that the grantor, by the phrase "S. W. corner," meant a point on the west side of the road, in which case the descriptions in the Lloyd deed and the Dunlap contract would be substantially the same. But, passing that uncertainty, and admitting that by the S. W. corner was meant a point on the east side of the road, still it is by no means clear that "thence N." means "due north." Assuming that "N.," as here used, stands for "north," and not for some other word expressing generally a northerly direction, still such a word means "due north" only when that construction is necessary for certainty, or when there is nothing else to show that it was not used in that strict sense. Irwin v. Towne, 42 Cal. 334; Devl. Deeds, § 1035. The main thing to be got at is the intention of the parties to the instrument; and, when the language used is not absolute, we must construe it with reference to the situation of the parties and the character and condition of the subject-matter of the contract. This 16-foot road runs nearly north and south; and if, as appellants contend, the grantors, in describing the land, arrived at a point on the east line of said road, it is almost impossible to believe that by the words "thence N. to Graveyard barranca" they meant a line due north, which would run diagonally through and across the road. It would be a much more reasonable construction to say that they meant northerly along the side of the road on which the line commenced; and under such a construction the plaintiffs would get what they claim, and a strip the width of the road in addition. We say this much to show that the latter part of the description is uncertain; and the rule is clear that when a general description is certain, and a particular description uncertain, the former prevails.

There is no question that the general description is entirely certain. In the original Dunlap contract, the land is accurately bounded on the east by the 16-foot road and a continuation of the west line thereof,—a most probable and natural boundary. Afterwards, and down to the time of the deed to Lloyd, it was always known as the "Dunlap Place," having its eastern boundary on the road. The court so finds, and the evidence shows it. It was shown by the testimony of some of the grantors and others, that Dunlap was cultivating the Dunlap place "right up to that road" at the time of the sale to Lloyd, and that Lloyd then had actual knowledge where the said boundary was. And if he had not had such actual knowledge, as his contract and deed reserved the Dunlap place, he was put upon inquiry as to what that "place" was. We think, therefore, that the language used shows the intent of the parties to except the real Dunlap place, and that the latter part of the description was not intended to and does not limit the boundaries of that place. A reservation in a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor, and the general rule is that, if two parts of a grant are irreconcilable, the first prevails. Civil Code, §§ 1069, 1070. The case at bar resembles very much the case of Haley v. Amestoy, 44 Cal. 132. The description involved in that case was: "All the undivided two-thirds (⅔) of all the lands known by the name of 'Rancho de San Vicente,' lying and being situated in the county of Los Angeles and state of California; the lands of said rancho being known and described as follows." Then follows a particular description of courses and distances, etc. This particular description, if adopted, would have left out a large portion of the rancho. The rancho, however, was well known by its name. The court, in its opinion, after some discussion of the question whether the particular description was uncertain, proceeds as follows: "But, however this may be, we are of the opinion that the rancho is well described by name, and that the particular description was not intended to be used in the sense of restriction. The language is, [giving the general description as above stated.] This language indicates that the dominant idea in the mind of the grantor when the deed was made was of the rancho of San Vicente as a whole, and not of the particular lines or marks by which it might be described. This being so, the deed must be held to convey two-thirds of the whole rancho, however erroneous may be the particular description." And, in accordance with the views expressed in that case, we think the language involved in the case at bar must be held as embracing the whole Dunlap place, notwithstanding anything contained in the attempted particular description. The conclusion of the court below in favor of respondents was, in our opinion, right.

The minor points in the case are not of sufficient importance to affect the correctness of the judgment. It was of no consequence that the contract to convey to Dunlap and Watkins was not recorded until after Lloyd's purchase. His contract and deed put him on inquiry, and were the equivalent of actual notice. The co-defendants of Lewis M. Lloyd, to whom he conveyed certain interests in the land, occupy a position no different from that of Lloyd himself. The court did not err in denying defendants' offer to introduce the judgment roll in a certain action of Snodgrass v. Parks, 79 Cal. 55, 21 Pac. Rep. 429, which was an action to foreclose a mortgage upon certain described premises. In the first place, plaintiff was not in privity with the parties to that action; and, in the second place, the complaint therein does not purport to describe the "Dunlap Place." And for the same reasons there was no error in sustaining plaintiff's objection to a certain homestead declaration made at one time by Mrs. Dunlap. Other rulings on admission of evidence are not necessary to be specially noticed.

The court reserved some objections to offered evidence, and ruled upon them at the final decision of the case; and appellants contend that such practice was erroneous, and a ground for reversal of the judgment. In Mayo v. Mazeaux, 38 Cal. 448, such practice was severely criticised, but was not held to be ipso facto a cause for reversal. The better practice is, no doubt, to rule upon questions involving the admissibility of evidence as they arise; but it happens sometimes that the determination of the merits of the case turns upon a question touching the relevancy or incompetency of certain offered evidence, and in such event it would be entirely proper for the court to take the question under advisement, where neither party could be prejudiced by such a course. On the other hand, the practice, which seems nowadays to be too freely indulged in, might in some cases seriously embarrass a party who, not knowing what the final ruling would be, could not determine what further evidence he should introduce. Therefore, whether such practice would be ground for reversal in any given case would depend upon the particular circumstances of that case. In the case at bar we cannot see that appellants were at all prejudiced by the practice complained of.

Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MURRAY. (No. 20,848.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—TESTIMONY OF JURORS.

Where defendant was convicted of murder, and, on appeal, the supreme court reversed the order of the court below denying a new trial, with instructions to the lower court "to rehear the motion, allowing defendant to introduce the evidence excluded on the former hearing, and the people to rebut the same by other evidence, if it is desired," and the motion was again heard, and defendant was permitted to introduce evidence that the jury read newspaper articles during the trial which, it was claimed, tended to influence their verdict, the trial court properly permitted the people to show by the jurors themselves that the newspaper articles had not influenced their verdict. DE HAVEN and HARRISON, JJ., dissenting.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

J. M. Murray was convicted of murder, and appeals from an order of the court below denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of murder. He appealed to this court from the judgment rendered in the premises, and from an order refusing a new trial. The judgment was affirmed, but the order denying a new trial was reversed. The case is reported in 85 Cal. 350-361, 24 Pac. Rep. 666, where it was said, among other things: "The order denying the defendant a new trial is reversed, with instructions to the court below to vacate the same and rehear the motion, allowing the defendant to introduce the evidence excluded on the former hearing, and the people to rebut the same by other evidence, if it is desired." Accordingly the motion for a new trial was again heard, and the evidence which showed that the jury had read newspaper articles during the trial which, it is claimed, had a tendency to influence their verdict, was allowed to be introduced in the defendant's behalf. The people then showed, over the objections of the defendant, by the jurors themselves, that the reading of those articles had not tended to nor had influenced them in any way prejudicial to the defendant in rendering their verdict. The admission of this rebutting evidence is urged by the defendant as prejudicial error; and upon the determination of that question the whole matter turns.

In the former decision this court said: "An attempt on the part of any person, whether through the medium of a newspaper, or otherwise, to influence a jury by any improper means to bring in a verdict against a defendant is a palpable violation of his right to a fair and impartial trial, and if it appears to the court to have had such an effect a new trial should be granted. There can be no doubt as to the intention or palpable effect of the articles above set out. It was the clear intention of the publishers of this paper to intimidate the jury, and, by abusing other jurors who had returned verdicts of acquittal, to induce them to find the defendant guilty, and impose upon him the extreme penalty of the law. Whether they had that effect upon the jury or not was a question that the defendant had a right to have determined by the court on his motion for a new trial. The defendant should have been allowed to make the proof, with leave to the people to show, if possible, that these particular articles were not read by the jury, or, if they were, that they were not in any way influenced by them. People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 353, 19 Pac. Rep. 161." The evidence of the jurors was in support of their verdict, and it is plainly evident the appellate court intended that the trial court should permit the defendant to introduce the evidence he did on the hearing of the motion, and that the people might show, if they could, either that the prejudicial articles in the newspaper were not read by the jury, or that, if they had read them, that "they were not in any way influenced by them." In obedience to this command of the superior tribunal, the court below allowed the people to rebut what might be a presumption that the jury were influenced by the articles which they had read, and to show by their evidence, if it could be done, that the jury had not been thus influenced, and thus sustain their verdict. This view of the matter is in accordance with the case of People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 352, 19 Pac. Rep. 161, and cases cited, where it is said: "One of the grounds upon which defendant asked for a new trial was that the jury had been guilty of misconduct, by which a fair consideration of the case had been prevented. The substance of the misconduct charged consisted in the jurors having disobeyed the admonition of the court about reading newspaper articles, during the trial, which reflected on the defendant. All of the jurors filed affidavits denying fully the charge of misconduct preferred, and insisting that no admonition of the court had been disobeyed, and that no newspaper articles, or anything else, save the evidence and the charge, influenced them in finding their verdict. These affidavits were allowable, and are conclusive upon the point made. People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 430; People v. Dye, 62 Cal. 523." In thus following the views of the appellate court we perceive no prejudicial error on the part of the court below, and advise that the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment.

FRANCISCO v. AGUIRRE, Sheriff, et al. (No. 13,956.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE—BILL OF SALE—CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

1. E., being indebted to sundry persons, executed a bill of sale of certain furniture to defendant in satisfaction of an existing debt, and at the same time received from defendant a lease of the furniture for a given term, at the expiration of which, E. refusing to deliver possession, defendant seized the property under claim and delivery. On the morning of the same day, and before seizure, E. executed an assignment of "all her property" to plaintiff for the benefit of creditors, which was filed for record before the seizure, but plaintiff did not attempt to take possession until several days thereafter, when he found the sheriff in possession under defendant's suit, and sued the sheriff and defendant for conversion. Held, that while defendant's title could not be asserted against E.'s creditors, in the absence of an "actual and continued change of possession," as required by Civil Code, § 3440, yet such title being good as against E., and plaintiff being merely E.'s representative, he obtained no greater rights than those possessed by E. at the time of the assignment, and could not recover, the statute concerning assignments conferring no special power on the assignee. BEATTY, C. J., and PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. The sheriff, being only the agent of defendant in the seizure under claim and delivery, is not liable in the absence of defendant's liability.

In bank. Appeal from superior court Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by Francisco against Aguirre, sheriff, and another. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellants. Thomas J. Carran and James M. Damron, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In October, 1888, Mrs. M. E. Edmonston, being the owner of certain household furniture then situate in the Ramsay House, at Los Angeles, executed a bill of sale thereof to Martha O'Hara for the sum of $825, and at the same time received from her a lease of the same furniture until February 1, 1889, that being the date at which a lease of the Ramsay House would expire. On the 1st day of February, 1889, Mrs. O'Hara made demand of Mrs. Edmonston for the possession of the furniture, and, upon being refused such possession, on the next day began an action of claim and delivery therefor. At the time of making the bill of sale Mrs. Edmonston was indebted to various parties, and on the morning of February 2d made an assignment to the plaintiff for the benefit of her creditors, which was filed for record in the recorder's office at 10 minutes after 9 o'clock of that morning. The plaintiff did not, however, take possession of the furniture on that day, and later in the day the defendant Aguirre, as the sheriff of the county, took the property under directions therefor given by the plaintiff in the action of Mrs. O'Hara, and, "when the plaintiff went there two or three days later," he found the sheriff in possession under those proceedings. The defendant in that action not having demanded a redelivery of the property, the sheriff, on the 9th of February, turned the property over to Mrs. O'Hara. The present action was brought by the plaintiff against the sheriff and Mrs. O'Hara for a conversion of the property, in which a verdict and judgment was rendered in his favor, and from which and an order denying a new trial the defendants appealed. The question presented upon the appeal is the validity of the sale from Mrs. Edmonston to Mrs. O'Hara, and the right of the plaintiff to question such validity. At the trial the court instructed the jury as follows: "In this case, if you should find from the evidence that the transfer made by Mrs. Edmonston to Mrs. O'Hara was in fact an actual sale of the property in question, but that the vendor, Mrs. Edmonston, did not make an immediate and actual delivery of the property so sold to the vendee, or if such delivery, then that the same was not followed by an actual and continued change of the possession of the property so sold, then such a transfer would be wholly void as against this plaintiff, and would not affect any rights acquired by him as assignee of the said Mrs. Edmonston. If the jury should find from the evidence that the instrument executed by Mrs. Edmonston to Mrs. O'Hara, and designated as a 'bill of sale,' was in fact made for the purpose of securing an indebtedness then existing between the parties and to become due thereafter, then such a transaction would not constitute an actual sale of the property, but would be more in the nature of a mortgage. In that event, unless it appears to your minds that such mortgage was given to secure the purchase price of the property so mortgaged, then the transfer would be void as to this plaintiff." Other instructions of the same import were given by the court.

Upon the execution of the bill of sale to Mrs. O'Hara, the title to the property therein described vested in her, and, although without an actual delivery and a continued change of possession, such title could not be asserted by her against the creditors of her vendor, yet, as between the parties to the instrument, she could at any time maintain an action to recover the possession from her vendor, irrespective of such non-delivery. The plaintiff, as the voluntary assignee of Mrs. Edmonston, acquired no greater right in the property than she had at the time of the assignment. As the statute stood at the date of this assignment to the plaintiff, an assignee for the benefit of creditors was selected by the assignor, and, subject to the statutory restrictions, acquired only those powers or rights in reference to the property assigned which were embraced in the instrument of assignment.

Upon the principle that an assignor cannot confer upon his assignee any greater right than he himself had in the property, it is held in an almost unbroken line of authorities that, in the absence of any statute giving such power, the assignee cannot maintain an action to recover property that had been conveyed by his assignor in fraud of his creditors. This rule rests upon the ground that the assignee is merely the representative of his assignor, and does not represent the creditors, and that notwithstanding the assignment they are not bound to accept its provisions, but may themselves subject such property to the satisfaction of their debts. This right is held by them, not as beneficiaries under the assignment, or by virtue of any of its provisions, but as creditors of the assignor, and wholly independent of its provisions. "Under the common law of assignments the assignee stands in the place of the assignor, and can assert no claim to property which the assignor might not. The assignment, therefore, does not carry with it to the trustee the title to property which the assignor has previously transferred in fraud of his creditors, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding them." Burrill, Assignm. § 110. See, also, Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 115; Brownell v. Curtis, 10 Paige, 219; Estabrook v. Messersmith, 18 Wis. 551; Hawks v. Pritzlaff, 51 Wis. 160, 7 N. W. Rep. 303; Vandyke v. Christ, 7 Watts & S. 373; Marks' Appeal, 85 Pa. St. 233, Housel v. Cremer, 13 Neb. 298, 14 N. W. Rep. 399; Keller v. Smalley, 63 Tex. 520; Heinrichs v. Woods, 7 Mo. App. 236; Browning v. Hart, 6 Barb. 91; Leach v. Kelsey, 7 Barb. 470; Warner v. Jaffray, 96 N. Y. 254; Flower v. Cornish, 25 Minn. 473; Wakeman v. Barrows, 41 Mich. 363, 2 N. W. Rep. 50; Stewart v. Platt, 101 U. S. 739; Wilson v. Randall, 14 R. I. 621. The question has been presented more frequently in cases in which the assignee has sought to recover property held by way of a mortgage executed by the assignor, but which was invalid by reason of failure to observe some of the requirements of the statute in reference to such mortgages. In these cases the same principles have been asserted as in other transfers which are declared fraudulent as against creditors, since it is only by reason of a statutory exception that personal property can be transferred by mortgage, and, unless the statutory requirements are followed, the transfer is subject to the general provision requiring a delivery and change of possession. In Van Heusen v. Radcliff, 17 N. Y. 580, the owner of certain furniture had made a chattel mortgage, which was not recorded as required by statute, and afterwards made a general assignment to the defendant for the benefit of his creditors; but the court held that the defendant was not a bona fide purchaser, and could not retain the proceeds of the property for the benefit of the creditors of his assignor, saying: "When a conveyance is said to be void against creditors, the reference is to such parties when clothed with their judgments and executions, or such other titles as the law has provided for the collection of debts. The beneficiaries under the voluntary assignment to the defendant are not in a condition to claim the rights of creditors, or to question the prior dispositions of their debtor, which he could not himself have avoided." In some states provision has been made by statutes giving express authority to the assignee to maintain actions for the recovery of property that had been disposed of by his assignor in fraud of his creditors, and declaring that for such purposes the assignee shall represent the creditors. See Burrill, Assignm. § 395. In other states the assignee has been held to have such right, upon the ground that by virtue of statutory provisions the assignment partakes so far of the nature of a proceeding in bankruptcy that the assignee succeeds to the same rights as does an assignee in bankruptcy. In New Jersey this rule is upheld upon the ground that the statutes provide that the assignor shall receive a full discharge and release as to all of the creditors who come in under the assignment, (Pillsbury v. Kingon, 33 N. J. Eq. 299,) although in that state it is held that, except in cases of actual fraud, the assignee is in the same position as his assignor, and that he cannot avail himself of a mere statutory fraud, such as a failure to have a chattel mortgage properly recorded. Shaw v. Glen, 37 N. J. Eq. 32. The statutes of this state concerning assignments for the benefit of creditors give no special power to the assignee, and expressly declare that the assignment is to be subject to the provisions of the Code respecting fraudulent transfers. One of these provisions is that which requires an actual delivery and continued change of possession,[1] thus placing the assignment upon the same footing as any other transfer of personal property. Whether the plaintiff herein could have successfully defended an action against him by Mrs. O'Hara had he taken possession of the property at the time of the assignment, need not be determined. He did not take such possession, but merely "went down to the house, and looked through the house at the furniture, and left Mrs. Edmonston in possession." This was consistent with his recognition of the rights of Mrs. O'Hara, since the assignment from Mrs. Edmonston purports to assign to him only "all of her property;" and, if the plaintiff had intended to claim this, he, by leaving her in possession, did the same act which he now charges upon the defendant as fraudulent. The plaintiff is not himself a creditor of Mrs. Edmonston, and, instead of having succeeded to the interest of any of her creditors, his relation to her estate as assignee for their benefit would itself preclude him from succeeding to their interest. Neither is he a person upon whom her estate has devolved for the benefit of others than himself. An estate is said to "devolve" upon another when by operation of law, and without any voluntary act of the previous owner, it passes from one person to another; but it does not devolve from one person to another as the result of some positive act or agreement between them. The word is itself of intransitive signification, and does not include the result of an act which is intended to produce a particular effect. It implies a result without the intervention of any voluntary actor. Instances of its appropriate use are found when speaking of the succession of estates upon death, or upon a change of official incumbents; also in proceedings in bankruptcy or insolvency, where by the act or operation of law the estate of the bankrupt devolves upon his assignee. Merrill v. Hurlburt, 63 Cal. 494; Brown v. Bank of Napa, 77 Cal. 544, 20 Pac. Rep. 71.

The question presented in this case did not arise upon the facts presented in Ingram v. Smith, 83 Cal. 234, 23 Pac. Rep. 298. The assignee in that case was in possession of the property that had been assigned to him, and was seeking to defend that possession against a promissory note in the hands of Smith, which had been executed by Smiley without any consideration therefor. Smiley could himself have maintained the same action, as the note in Smith's hands, having been given without consideration, was not enforceable against him, and Ingram, as his assignee, had the same right that Smiley had to protect the estate received by him under the assignment against a claim upon this note, either by a defense to a suit thereon, or by an action for its cancellation. There is a manifest difference between defending against a fraudulent claim property that has been actually received under the assignment, and seeking to recover property to which the assignor could assert no title, even though his creditors might subject it while in his possession to the payment of their debts against him. The statement in Ingram v. Smith that the estate of Smiley had devolved upon the plaintiff for the benefit of the creditors was but a dictum, since the right of Ingram to maintain the action did not depend upon the mere fact that he was the assignee of Smiley, but arose from the fact that, being in possession of property under a trust which he had assumed, he was bound to protect it for the benefit of the beneficiaries, and had the same right to defend it against a false claim as if it had belonged to himself. In Manuf'g Co. v. Wright, 22 Fed. Rep. 631, it was held that although the assignee had no right to recover property that had been fraudulently conveyed by his assignor, yet he had the right to resist a fraudulent claim against property in his hands, the court saying: "It is the duty of the assignee in the performance of his trust to defend this property against all unjust adverse claims. He takes the property, not as a purchaser, but subject to all rights and equities subsisting against it in favor of third parties, and in that sense he is said to succeed only to the rights of his assignor. The right of creditors to attack a mortgage as fraudulent, growing out of equities existing in their behalf, does not pass to the assignee in the absence of statutory provisions to that effect, and none such are found in the statutes of Iowa. In the present case the right of the assignee to defend against a foreclosure of the mortgage is not based upon a transfer of the rights and equities of the creditors, but upon the fact that the title of the property has been vested in him in trust for the creditors, and that, having accepted the trust, he is charged with the duty of protecting the property against all fraudulent claims."

As the plaintiff had no right to the furniture, as against the claim of Mrs. O'Hara, he could not maintain an action against her for its conversion. The sheriff was only her agent in the matter, and, in the absence of any liability on her part, was not himself liable to the plaintiff. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent.

[1] Civil Code, § 3440, provides that "every transfer of personal property * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having * * * possession * * * and not accompanied by immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession, * * * to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against * * * creditors while he remains in possession, * * and against any person on whom his estate devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself. * * *"

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to concur in the views expressed by the majority in this case. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

It is not denied that the conveyance was void as to creditors under section 3440 of the Civil Code; but it is claimed that the assignee acquired no greater right than the assignor had in the property at the time of the sale,—that the assignee is merely the representative of his assignor, and does not represent the creditors. It must be admitted that under the common law of assignments the assignee stands in the place of the assignor, and can assert no right to the property which the assignor did not have; but the rule of the common law is not applicable here; the rights of the parties are to be determined under the statute relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors. The duties and powers of assignees under the statute are very different from the duties and powers of assignees at common law.

Section 3449, Civil Code, provides that an insolvent debtor may execute an assignment of property to one or more assignees, in trust for the satisfaction of his creditors, subject, however, to the provisions of the Code relative to trusts and fraudulent transfers; and section 3439 provides that "every transfer of property or charge thereon made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken, with intent to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands, is void against all creditors of the debtor, and their successors, and against any person upon whom the estate of the debtor devolves in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor." It cannot be questioned that the estate of the debtor in this case devolved upon the assignee in trust for the benefit of others than the debtor himself. The case is, therefore, within the letter and spirit of the statute. The transfer of the property was fraudulent,—it was absolutely void as to creditors,—and, as the statute declares, it was void as to the assignee upon whom all the estate of Mrs. Edmonston devolved.

In Ingram v. Smith, 83 Cal. 237, 23 Pac. Rep. 298, the court said that the note there under consideration was "void against all of Smiley's creditors, and also the plaintiff, upon whom the estate of Smiley devolved for the benefit of the creditors." It may be that this statement was mere dictum, but it is evidently in accord with the letter and the spirit of our statute. In Hanes v. Tiffany, 25 Ohio St. 552, the court said: "It is, however, contended that, as the mortgage is good against the mortgagor, it is also good against the assignee for the benefit of creditors; that the latter stands in no better situation than his assignor. The correctness of this position at common law is admitted, but not so under the statute. The mortgagee not having possession of the mortgaged property, the statute declares the mortgage void as against the creditors of the mortgagor. The assignee took the property under the assignment, and held it for the exclusive benefit of creditors. The mode of providing for creditors by way of assignment, in trust for their benefit, is recognized and regulated by statute; and we see no good reason why their rights may not be as effectually asserted through the assignee as they could be by judgment and execution in case there had been no assignment." In Pillsbury v. Kingon, 33 N. J. Eq. 287, Mr. Justice DEPUE considered the leading cases bearing upon the question, and, among other things, said: "No rule of law is better settled than that a conveyance in fraud of creditors is good as between the parties to it. * * * It is equally clear that such conveyances are also unassailable by those who hold a derivative title from the fraudulent grantor, and, in virtue of their title, become simply representatives of his interest. * * * The material question for present consideration is whether those who hold by a title derived from the grantor, but who in virtue of that title become the representatives of the creditors of the grantor as a class,—as, for instance, the executors or administrators of an insolvent estate or an assignee for the benefit of the grantor's creditors,—will not be allowed, in the interest of creditors, to have a standing in court, to avoid the fraudulent grants and conveyances of the debtor for the benefit of his creditors. * * * In none of the cases was the decision placed on any language in the statute specially empowering the assignee to avoid the fraudulent conveyance of the assignor. In fact, neither of those statutes contained any express provision for setting aside conveyances of the assignor in fraud of creditors, and that fact was unsuccessfully pressed upon the attention of the court by the counsel who argued against the authority of the assignee to exercise that power. The capacity of the assignee to appear in court for that purpose was in express words, or inferentially adjudged on the ground that the assignee of an insolvent was a representative of creditors, and, as such, was entitled to take, for their benefit, the same advantage of the statute of Elizabeth as the creditors might have taken. * * * In Bayard v. Hoffman, 4 Johns. Ch. 450, Chancellor KENT decided that an assignment of all the debtor's estate, real and personal, in trust for all his creditors, included stock which the debtor had before that voluntarily assigned, to the injury of his creditors, and that the assignee might file a bill to set aside the fraudulent transfer for the benefit of the creditors. * * * An assignment under the act of the legislature of this state differs in most important particulars from an assignment made by a debtor at common law for the benefit of his creditors. Its title indicates the legislative purpose to establish a system for securing an equal and just division of the estates of debtors among their creditors, and that purpose is clearly evinced by the provisions of the act. At common law, a debtor might assign the whole or a portion of his property for the benefit of all or a part of his creditors. By our statute, an assignment under the act transfers all the property of the assignor, whether it be described in the inventory or not; * * * and all preferences of one creditor over another are forbidden. At common law an assignment by a debtor to his trustee to pay his debts might be rescinded by the mutual consent of the debtor and the trustee, where the creditors had not directed the assignment or assented to it, or changed their situation in consequence of it. A deed of assignment, under the statute executed, delivered and accepted by the assignee, creates, ipso facto, a trust for the benefit of creditors, not to be surrendered or destroyed except by their consent, and a court of equity will execute it by appointing new trustees, if necessary. Under such an assignment, the trustee at common law was compelled to use the assignor's name in suits to recover the property, or upon the choses in action assigned. By the statute the assignee may bring suit in his own name. * * * Regarding the substantial nature of the transaction, the doctrine of the English courts, with respect to the representative character of the assignee of an insolvent, may very properly be applied in favor of an assignee under the assignment act, and the latter be regarded as representing creditors so far as to enable him to take proceedings in their behalf, to set aside conveyances in fraud of creditors, where such property is needed for the payment of debts. * * * Nor will any embarrassment be experienced in the fact that the property which has fraudulently been conveyed away may be in excess of what is required for the payment of debts. As is indicated in the opinion of this court in Miller v. Mackenzie, 29 N. J. Eq. 295, such fraudulent conveyances will be set aside no further than is necessary for the satisfaction of the demands of creditors, and the surplus, if there be any, will not be restored to the fraudulent debtor, but will be returned to the grantee to whom the fraudulent conveyance was made." The statutes of New Jersey seem to be identical with our own on this subject. The reporter, in a note added to the report of the case just referred to, has collated a large number of authorities bearing on the subject, and shows that the preponderance of judicial opinion is in favor of the views expressed by the court. There is nothing in Shaw v. Glen, 37 N. J. Eq. 32, indicating an intention to overrule Pillsbury v. Kingon. On the contrary, the court spoke approvingly of the decision, but distinguished it from the case then under consideration, saying: "But in cases unaffected by fraud, he [the assignee] is bound by the equities to which the property assigned was liable when it came to his hands from his assignor."

VENZKE v. VENZKE. (No. 14,485.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

DIVORCE—CRUELTY—EVIDENCE.

In an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty plaintiff's testimony that defendant charged her with infidelity, called her vile names, and communicated to her a loathsome disease, was sufficiently corroborated, as required by Civil Code, § 130, by a letter written by defendant to plaintiff, charging her with having committed adultery with a certain person; by the testimony of a witness that plaintiff came to his store, crying, and saying that defendant had threatened her, and called her vile names; that he (witness) sent for defendant, and informed him of his wife's complaints and charges, and that defendant did not deny them; and by the testimony of a physician that he treated plaintiff for the disease which she claimed defendant communicated to her.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYRES, Judge.

Action by Carrie S. Venzke against Frederick W. Venzke for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jo. Hamilton and Geo. W. Hamilton, for appellant. John M. Fulweiler and Ben P. Tabor, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, in which the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The complaint charges that the cruelty was inflicted upon the plaintiff by calling her vile and opprobrious names, and charging her with infidelity to her marriage vows, and by communicating to her a loathsome venereal disease, which for a long time caused her great and grievous bodily suffering and injury. Among others the court made the following finding: "(5) That the defendant, for more than two years before the commencement of this action, had been guilty of extreme cruelty towards the plaintiff, and treated her in a cruel and inhuman manner, calling her vile and opprobrious names, and charging her with infidelity to her marriage vows."

The only point urged here by appellant's counsel is that the finding numbered 5 is not justified by the evidence; not, however, because the testimony of the plaintiff did not sufficiently tend to prove it, but because her testimony in that respect was not corroborated. The sole question, therefore, to be determined is, was the plaintiff's testimony, as to cruelty, corroborated? I think defendant's letter to the plaintiff of May 2, 1889, tends to corroborate her testimony as to his having charge her with adultery with one Phelps. The witness Dixon testified, that in November, 1888, the plaintiff came to his store, crying, and saying that defendant had threatened her, and called her vile and opprobrious names, whereupon the witness sent for defendant, and informed him of the complaint his wife had made against him, and explained to him fully what his wife had charged him with doing and saying to her; and that defendant did not deny the truth of his wife's complaint or charges against him. This testimony, though indefinite as to the character of the threats, and as to what names he had called her, yet tends to prove that he had called her vile names, and had threatened her with some degree of punishment, and thereby, in a slight degree, at least, corroborates her testimony as to his cruel treatment. Dr. Reuda testified that as plaintiff's physician he had treated her for gonorrhea, with which she was afflicted, in August, 1887. This sufficiently corroborated her testimony that she had that disease. As to this disease, the plaintiff testified that she did not know what it was until defendant informed her, and advised her to be treated for it by Dr. Reuda, telling her at the same time that he had consulted the doctor and found that he had the same disease. The defendant, on cross-examination, while testifying in his own behalf, admitted that he had the disease, and that he had consulted Dr. Reuda in regard to it, and did not deny that he had advised his wife to consult the doctor, but said he had taken the disease from his wife. When plaintiff's counsel asked Dr. Reuda what he knew about defendant's case defendant objected, under section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and refused to consent to the doctor's examination as to any information acquired while treating him. The degree of corroboration required by section 130 of the Civil Code has never been defined; and it has been said that "in the very nature of the case it would be impossible to lay down any general rule as to the degree of corroboration which will be requisite. Hence the statute only requires that there shall be some corroborating evidence." Evans v. Evans, 41 Cal. 104; Cooper v. Cooper, 88 Cal. 45, 25 Pac. Rep. 1062. According to these cases, I think the testimony of the plaintiff as to extreme cruelty was sufficiently corroborated, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

ANDERSON v. YOAKUM et al. (No. 14,289.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

QUITCLAIM DEED—CONSTRUCTION—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE.

A grantor in a quitclaim deed, who at the time of the execution thereof had simply filed his application to purchase the land from the state, had no interest subject to transfer, and his after-acquired title did not vest in his grantee, even though the deed purported to convey to the grantee all the "estate, right, title, and interest which the grantor might thereafter acquire in and to" the premises.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Anderson against J. E. Yoakum and others to quiet title. Judgment for defendants. From an order denying her motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Justin Jacobs, for appellant. Chas. G. Lamberson, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial. Respondents are successors in interest of one McKenna. At the time McKenna prepared his application to purchase the land involved in this litigation from the state, and prior to the filing of such application, he remised, released, and quitclaimed his interest in the property to appellant by deed duly executed and acknowledged. The habendum clause in said deed was as follows: "To have and to hold all and singular the above mentioned and described premises, together with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, forever; and also any estate, right, title, or interest which the said party of the first part may hereafter acquire in and to the above-described premises." Subsequently to the date of said deed, McKenna's application to purchase was approved, a certificate was issued to him, and his assignee of such certificate obtained the patent which now rests in the respondents. The only question involved in this appeal is, did the deed of McKenna to plaintiff vest his after-acquired title in her? In other words, did the certificate of purchase to McKenna inure to the benefit of plaintiff by reason of her deed? In Cadierque v. Duran, 49 Cal. 356, it was expressly decided that a party who has simply filed his application to purchase has no interest in the realty subject to transfer, and to the same effect is People v. Blake, 84 Cal. 614, 22 Pac. Rep. 1142, and 24 Pac. Rep. 313. In Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344, it was held that words used in a deed conveying the property in fee-simple absolute will be construed to convey only the present interest of the grantor, and not to pass an after-acquired title, if a clause is inserted declaring that as to title it is only a quitclaim deed; and to the same effect is Montgomery v. Sturdivant, 41 Cal. 290. While these cases sustain the principle that the legal effect of words of conveyance may be limited and restricted by subsequent recitals in a deed, we have been referred to no case holding that a covenant by a grantor in a deed of quitclaim and release, that any after-acquired title shall vest in the grantee, has the effect, of itself, to vest such title in the grantee upon its acquisition by the grantor. The habendum clause of a deed refers to and acts upon the interest conveyed, most frequently limiting and qualifying such interest, but, as we have already shown, the grantor here had no interest whatever in the realty at the date of his deed to plaintiff; and it follows that no title, either present or future, vested in her through this conveyance. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY LAND & WATER CO. v. WITMER BROS. CO. (No. 14,324.)[1]

RIGHTS OF MORTGAGORS—TAXES ON MORTGAGEE'S INTEREST—PAYMENT.

1. In an action to recover taxes assessed to defendant on its mortgage interest, but which plaintiff, as owner, paid to prevent becoming delinquent, the validity of the tax was questioned on the ground that the description of the mortgaged land varied from that contained in the mortgage. The mortgage, dated March 8, 1887, described the land according to the government survey. The land had afterwards been divided by plaintiff into blocks and town lots, and the subsequent assessment described the land as such blocks and lots. It was agreed that the land assessed constituted the identical land described in the mortgage, and no more, and that the assessment was in substantial conformity with the statute, and in proper form for the assessment of a mortgage interest in town lots. Held, that the description was sufficient.

2. Pol. Code, § 3627, which gives the owner of the property the privilege of deducting the amount of the taxes so paid from the mortgage, is permissive, and not mandatory, and does not prohibit an action to recover the same.

3. Under Pol. Code, §§ 3627, 3628, which required the mortgage to be assessed to the person who owned it on the first Monday of March, where defendant owned the mortgage on that day, the subsequent assignment thereof did not relieve defendant of its liability for the payment of the taxes. HARRISON and PATERSON, JJ., dissenting.

4. Pol. Code, §§ 1837, 2654, required road taxes and special school taxes to be levied by the supervisors, and to appear on the assessment book, and section 3789 made such book prima facie evidence of the assessment, and of the amount of unpaid taxes, and of the fact that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy had been complied with. Held, that where the assessment book, in due form, was in evidence, and there was no evidence tending to overcome such prima facie evidence, there was sufficient proof of the validity of such road and school taxes.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by the San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Company against Witmer Bros. Company to recover taxes paid by plaintiff, but which had been assessed to defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order refusing a new trial defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Dooner & Burdett, for appellant. Judson, Hester & Russell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this case was pending in department, an opinion was prepared by Commissioner VANCLIEF. After full consideration in bank, we adopt that opinion, and the conclusion therein reached; and for the reasons therein given the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed. The said opinion is as follows:

"The plaintiff having paid the taxes, amounting to $185.12, assessed to the defendant on its mortgage interest in land, brought this action in a justice's court to recover the sum so paid from the defendant. The cause was properly transferred to the superior court for trial, and judgment passed for plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The material facts found by the court and stipulated by the parties are as follows: One Sanborn, being the owner of two hundred and forty acres of land, situate in Los Angeles county, mortgaged the same on the 14th day of March, 1887, to Hall and Stilson to secure the payment of $20,000; and the mortgage was duly recorded. On May 7, 1888, Hall and Stilson assigned the mortgage and debt thereby secured to the defendant, and defendant continued to own them until June 7, 1889, when it assigned them to the State Loan & Trust Company, a corporation. Before the taxes were assessed upon the land or mortgage for the year 1889, the plaintiff became the owner of the land subject to the mortgage, and divided it into blocks and lots. While the defendant was the owner of the mortgage, to-wit, on March 4, 1889, the taxes in question were assessed to defendant on its mortgage interest. On July 24, 1889, the plaintiff, as successor in interest of the mortgagor, paid the mortgage debt in full to the State Loan & Trust Company, without any deduction or provision on account of the taxes on the mortgage interest assessed to defendant. On December 19, 1889, the tax collector demanded the taxes ($185.12) of the defendant by sending it a bill for the amount. On the following day the defendant inclosed the bill in a letter to the plaintiff, stating that it (defendant) had no interest in the mortgaged premises. Thereupon the plaintiff requested the defendant to pay the taxes assessed to it, but defendant refused, and failed to pay the same or any part thereof. On December 30, 1889, the plaintiff, to prevent the taxes from becoming delinquent, and to remove the lien thereof from its land, paid them.

"1. The validity of the tax is questioned upon the ground that the description of the mortgaged land varies essentially from that contained in the mortgage. The mortgage describes it as 'the north-west quarter, and the west half of the north-east quarter, of section thirteen, (13,) township one (1) south, of range twelve (12) west, of the San Bernardino meridian, containning two hundred and forty (240) acres.' As the land had been divided by plaintiff into blocks and town lots before the assessment of the taxes for 1889, it is so described in the assessment book. It is agreed, however, that the blocks and lots assessed to the defendant constitute the identical land described in the mortgage, and no more; and that the assessment was in substantial conformity with the requirements of section 3651 of the Political Code, and in proper form for the assessment of a mortgage interest in town lots. As the taxes were paid before they became delinquent, they were not increased by costs of advertisement or sale in lots. I think the assessment described the mortgaged land in accordance with the statute, and with such particularity and certainty as to afford the defendant the means of identification, and so as not to mislead him. This was sufficient. Cooley, Tax'n, 282-286.

"2. It is claimed that respondent's exclusive remedy was to deduct the amount of the taxes from the mortgage at the time of payment, on the basis of the levy of the preceding year, in pursuance of section 3627[1] of the Political Code. But the statute giving that privilege is permissive, and not mandatory, in its terms. It has been expressly decided by the circuit court of the United States for the district of California that, under section 4, art. 13, of the constitution of California of 1879, it is the duty of the mortgagee, and not of the mortgagor, to pay the taxes levied on the mortgage interest; that the constitution and statute give the mortgagor the right to pay the tax, and deduct it from the debt; but that he is not bound to do so; and that if the mortgagee dispute the tax, and decline to allow it, and the whole mortgage debt is paid by the mortgagor, without deduction of the tax, the mortgagor, if afterwards compelled to pay it to relieve his property of the lien, may recover the amount paid from the mortgagee, whose debt it is. Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 506, 507, 14 Fed. Rep. 281. The principle of this decision is in accordance with the well-settled rule, that 'where the plaintiff, either by compulsion of law, or to relieve himself from liability, or to save himself from damage, has paid money, not officiously, which the defendant ought to have paid, a count in assumpsit for money paid will be supported.' Bailey v. Bussing, 28 Conn. 462; Exall v. Partridge, 8 Term R. 310. In such case, 'the law implies a request on the defendant's part, and a promise to repay, and the plaintiff has the same right of action as if he had paid the money at the defendant's express request.' Nichols v. Bucknam, 117 Mass. 491; Nutter v. Seydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 535. The right of contribution or reimbursement for money necessarily paid for another's benefit does not necessarily depend upon contract, but may arise from the equity of the case. Freem. Co-Ten. § 322. See, also, Hay v. Hill, 65 Cal. 383, 4 Pac. Rep. 378.

[1] Section 3627 provides that the owner of the premises may pay the taxes levied on the land, and such payment shall constitute a payment on the mortgage debt.

"3. It is also insisted that there is no proof of the validity of the 'road-tax' or of the 'special school-tax' which were included in the sum sued for. Each of these is required to be levied by the supervisors and to appear upon the assessment book, (Pol. Code, §§ 1837, 2654;) and the assessment book itself is prima facie evidence, not only of the assessment and of the amount of the unpaid taxes, but also of the fact that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy have been complied with. (Pol. Code, § 3789; Modoc Co. v. Churchill, 75 Cal. 172, 16 Pac. Rep. 771.) The assessment book in due form was in evidence, and there was no evidence tending to overcome the prima facie case proved by it.

"(4) It is further claimed that the liability of the defendant to pay the tax was discharged by his assignment of the mortgage before the levy of the tax. But the law required the mortgage to be assessed to the person who owned it on the first Monday of March, (Pol. Code, §§ 3627, 3628;) and such person could not escape the obligation to pay the tax by mere assignment of the mortgage. The personal obligation to pay taxes does not depend upon the continued ownership of the property assessed until after the levy of the tax, or until the time for payment arrives. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

"We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C."

HARRISON, J., (dissenting.) 1. Although the interest in the land represented by the mortgage was assessed as of the first Monday of March, 1889, and the tax which was afterwards levied upon that interest became by relation a lien upon the land as of that date, yet until the tax was levied there was no liability or obligation for its payment created against either the property or its owner. This tax was levied on the first Monday in October of that year, (Pol. Code, § 3714;) but prior to that date the plaintiff had paid the mortgage debt and caused the mortgage to be canceled. The constitution, (article 13, § 4,) and the statute passed in pursuance thereof, (Pol. Code, § 3627,) authorizing the assessment of a tax upon the mortgage, provide that, "if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and to the extent of such payment a free discharge thereof; provided that, if any such security or indebtedness shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy for the preceding year." There is no provision in the constitution or statute which gives to the mortgagor the right to be reimbursed for this payment in any other mode, and under the familiar rule that, when the right and the remedy are purely statutory, the remedy provided by the statute is the only mode of preserving the right, if the plaintiff would insist upon this right he should have deducted the amount of the tax from the debt at the time that he paid the debt. In the absence of the constitutional provision there would be no obligation upon the mortgagee, as between him and the owner of the land, to pay the tax upon the mortgage, and the owner of the land would not be able to compel such payment by him. The obligation created by such tax exists only in favor of the state, and the tax is a charge upon the property against which it is assessed, and not a personal obligation against the mortgagor. With the exception of poll-taxes, taxes are always levied upon property, and not against individuals, and the mortgage tax is a tax upon the security, and not against the mortgagee. The mortgage is made by the constitution "an interest in the property affected thereby," and the entire tax against the property is divided between the mortgagee and the owner. The provision that the value of the security shall be assessed and taxed to the "owner thereof" creates no different obligation upon the mortgagee from that which is created upon the owner of the property by the provision requiring the value of the property to be taxed to the "owner of the property." The tax is not a debt, and there is no personal obligation created by it. It is a burden imposed by the state upon property within its limits; but that burden is a charge against the property, and not against the individuals who own the property, and follows the property through all changes in its ownership, and is eventually paid by the individual who is the owner when the tax is collected. "A debt is a sum of money due by contract, express or implied. A tax is a charge upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes; it is not founded upon contract; it does not establish the relation of debtor and creditor between the tax-payer and the state; it does not draw interest; it is not the subject of attachment, and it is not liable to set-off. It owes its existence to the action of the legislative power, and does not depend for its validity or enforcement upon the individual assent of the tax-payer. It operates in invitum." Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 350. Nor is its character affected by the fact that the statute authorizes a personal action to be brought for its recovery. Such procedure is merely the statutory method prescribed for its collection, and does not create a debt or personal obligation against the individual to whom it is assessed. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 514. In the absence of statutory authority, an action for the recovery of a tax cannot be maintained; (City of Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. Law, 398;) whereas, if the tax was a debt or personal obligation, its collection could be enforced by suit without statutory authority. See, also, City of Augusta v. North, 57 Me. 392; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; Peirce v. City of Boston, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 520.

2. The taxes levied against the property are divided between the mortgagee and the owner, and become a lien upon both the land and the security as of the first Monday in March, and remain a lien thereon until paid. If the owner of the land parts with the property during that period, he is exonerated from any liability to the state for the payment of this tax, and the individual who is the owner of the land when the tax becomes payable must discharge the lien, if he would save it from sale by the collector. The purchaser may pretect himself against this lien by proper covenants in the deed from his grantor, as he would against any other lien or incumbrance; but, if his conveyance is a naked quitclaim, he cannot call upon his vendor for remuneration for the amount of the tax so paid, any more than for the payment of any other incumbrance which was not a personal obligation against the vendor. The tax against the mortgage is in all respects identical in character with the tax against the land. It is levied and assessed in the same manner and at the same time, is a lien upon the same property, and collected by the same means. The same results, therefore, must follow the transfer of the security as follow the transfer of the land. The vendor is thereby absolved from all obligations for the tax previously levied thereon, and when the tax is payable it must be paid by the individual who is at the time the owner of the security. By the transfer, all relations between the mortgagee and the owner of the land terminate, and the assignee of the mortgage is substituted in the place of the mortgagee, with all the rights and obligations previously resting upon the mortgagee. The provision in the constitution that "the taxes so levied may be paid by either party to such security" refers to this assignee, and not to the original mortgagee. It is only the "owner" of the security that is permitted to pay the tax levied upon the property, and have the amount so paid become a part of the debt secured, but, if the original mortgagee to whom the mortgage has been assessed has assigned the mortgage, he is not the "owner" of the security, or of any debt to be increased by the payment of such tax, and consequently is not the "party" to the security referred to in the above provision of the constitution. For the same reasons the provision in the constitution that a payment by the owner of the property of the tax levied on the security shall constitute a payment thereon, and to the extent of such payment a full discharge thereof, is applicable only to the holder of the mortgage in case of an assignment, and not to the original mortgagee. Consequently, if such payment be made by the owner of the property after assessment and before the tax levy, his right to reimbursement can be enforced only against the holder of the mortgage, and not against the original mortgagee, and only in the mode pointed out in the constitution.

3. If it can be maintained that, by virtue of his relations to the land, there was an implied obligation upon the mortgagee to discharge the lien thereon created by the tax upon his security, that obligation by the transfer of the security became only a secondary obligation upon him. The primary obligation for the tax is upon the security itself, and the owner of that security is the individual to whom the owner of the land must look primarily for the discharge of the lien. The constitution refers to him alone, and the provision that, if the debtor pays the indebtedness "after assessment and before the tax levy," the amount of the tax may be "retained" by him, implies that he must "retain" it from the holder of the security, or lose the right to proceed against any other person for reimbursement. The owner of the land, having in his custody this fund—the mortgage debt—out of which to discharge the lien of the tax, must, in equity, apply it to that purpose, or lose any right he may have to resort to other securities. The most favorable position which the owner can claim that the original mortgagee holds towards him in reference to this mortgage tax is that he is under some obligation to ultimately discharge this lien, but this is only the position of a surety, and as a surety he is entitled to have this fund applied to the payment of the tax, or be discharged therefrom. Civil Code, §§ 2840, 2849. The payment by the plaintiff of the mortgage debt, without making any deduction for the mortgage tax, was a voluntary surrender by him of a security which he held for the purpose of protecting himself and his property against the burden of the tax, and such payment must be regarded as a release by him of any liability which he would claim against the defendant. In Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 506, 14 Fed. Rep. 281, the mortgagor sought to avail himself of the very remedy pointed out by the constitution, by deducting the estimated amount of the mortgage tax, but the mortgagee refused to cancel the mortgage, except upon payment of the full amount of the mortgage debt. In that case the mortgagor and mortgagee were the respective owners of the land and of the security at the time of the assessment, as well as at the time of the payment, and there was no question presented involving the right or liability of any other person than the mortgagor and mortgagee, and the court held that the payment of the tax by the mortgagor, under the circumstances of that case, was made under duress, and could be recovered in an action therefor. In my opinion, the judgment and order should be reversed.

Evidence of Conspirators—Declarations—Cross-Examination—Striking Out Answer.

1. Where, in a trial for horse stealing, D. and S. were jointly charged with defendant, and a witness testified to facts showing a conspiracy between these parties, a statement made by D., as a co-conspirator, before the commission of the crime was complete, in the absence of defendant, was properly admitted in evidence against defendant.

2. The rule that, where no objection is made to an interrogatory, a motion to strike out the answer will not be entertained, does not apply where the answer is not responsive to the question put to the witness.

3. A witness cannot testify to the acts and declarations of third parties (in the absence of defendant, and unauthorized by him) in attempting to influence the witness to leave the country so as to avoid testifying in the case.

4. Where it was attempted to show by such witness that he was induced to leave home to avoid testifying, defendant had a right to ask him, on cross-examination, if the true reason why he left home at that time was not on account of his father.

5. Such witness, together with several associates of defendant, were, several weeks subsequent to the alleged larceny, arrested for horse stealing in Oregon, and defendant exerted himself to secure the liberty of the witness. Held, that declarations of defendant concerning his determination to release such witness, and concerning his arrangements to break into jail for that purpose, were not admissible, being too remote.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Ellery Dixon was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Shinn, R. P. Clement, and Clark & Jones, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions. Counsel for appellant relies upon many alleged errors of law committed by the trial court for a reversal of the judgment. The assignments of error, based upon the orders of the court refusing to set aside the information, resetting the case for trial, and denying the application for a continuance, are not well taken. The court committed no error in admitting the evidence of the witness Buckmaster as to the statement of Otis Dixon, made in the absence of the defendant. Otis Dixon was jointly charged with the defendant and one Arthur Sylvester with the crime of grand larceny in stealing the horses described in the information. The witness had already testified to facts tending to show a conspiracy between these parties, and his subsequent testimony pointed in the same direction. The evidence of conspiracy was sufficient to go to the jury, and, the commission of the crime not yet being complete, any statement of a co-conspirator was admissible against the defendant. In People v. Geiger, 49 Cal. 649, this court said: "We think there was sufficient evidence of the conspiracy between Alexander and the defendant to justify the court in admitting in evidence the declarations of the former, made previous to the alleged killing. The question of conspiracy was then submitted to the jury with instruction to disregard the declarations of Alexander unless the conspiracy was satisfactorily proved. This was the proper practice." See, also, People v. Collins, 64 Cal. 295; People v. Bentley, 75 Cal. 409, 17 Pac. Rep. 436. Otis Goodlow testified that Joshua Buckmaster and Henry Goodlow arrived at the ranch of witness' father in Oregon. The next morning he (the witness) went out into the field, and saw the horses alleged by this information to have been stolen. "Question. What did you do? You drove them up? Answer. Yes, sir; and I asked 'Josh whose horses them was, and he said they were Ellery Dixon's." Counsel for appellant made no objection to the question, but moved to strike out the answer as incompetent and hearsay, which motion the court denied. This ruling was error. Buckmaster's statements to the witness could not be admitted in evidence against the defendant, Dixon. It has been decided by this court that, where no objection is made to an interrogatory, a motion to strike out the answer comes too late. People v. Long, 43 Cal. 446; People v. Samario, 84 Cal. 485, 24 Pac. Rep. 283. The rule is a salutary one, and should be upheld unless good cause to the contrary appears. In this case the reason of the rule is not present, and appellant should have the benefit of its exception. The answer of the witness was not responsive to the question addressed to him, and for that reason the principle laid down in the foregoing cases has no application. It was attempted to be shown by the evidence of the witness Goodlow that the defendant Dixon and Otis and Ira Dixon persuaded and induced him to leave that section of the state. It was shown by the witness that Ira Dixon and one Sylvester each gave him money, presumably to be used in leaving the country. This character of evidence, to the extent that it showed the acts and declarations of the defendant, was admissible, but as to any evidence of acts or declarations of third parties in attempting to influence the witness, not in the presence of the defendant, and unauthorized by him, it was error to admit it. Upon cross-examination the witness was asked "if the reason why he left home that time was not on account of his father." An objection was sustained to the question, which ruling is error. If it was proper to show, by the examination of the witness in chief, that the defendant induced him to leave the country for the purpose of escaping the effect of his evidence as a witness at the trial, then the question asked by the defense was in the direct line of cross-examination as tending to neutralize and dissipate the effect of the previous testimony of the witness as to the cause of his absence. Some weeks subsequent to the date of the alleged larceny charged in the information, "Josh" Buckmaster, Arthur Sylvester, a half-brother of defendant, and others were arrested in Oregon for stealing horses there, and while in confinement, pending examination and trial, the defendant, Dixon, earnestly exerted himself in various ways in attempting to secure Buckmaster's liberty. Under objection of defendant his statements to various persons, made at that time, "that he had promised a party one thousand dollars to release 'Josh' from jail;" "that he had made arrangements to break into the jail and get him away;" and much more to the same effect,—were offered in evidence. This character of evidence placed the defendant in a bad light, and tended strongly to prejudice the minds of the jurors against him; but it appears to be entirely too remote to be admitted in the case. It is only upon the conjecture that his deep interest in the escape of Buckmaster from prison was owing to his fear that the prisoner might reveal his (defendant's) previous criminal history that the evidence could be in any manner admissible. It could as readily be conjectured that his conduct was attributable to the unwise and unscrupulous zeal of an overzealous friend, or that his contemplated assistance to Buckmaster was occasioned by his desire thereby to indirectly assist his brother, who at that time was charged with the same crime. The evidence was damaging to defendant, and in its nature so remote and conjectural that the objection to its admission before the jury should have been sustained. During one of those conversations to which allusion has just been made, a witness testified that he asked the defendant "if he did have anything to do with that horse-stealing business or handling of the horses." "He said he did, and I asked him why it was he did it, and he said, 'Well, he had been running a real-estate office in Bieber, and that he had been running behind, and was in debt some, and was superintendent of a Sunday school, and that nobody would suspicion him, and that was just as good a way to make money as he knew of.'" These statements of the defendant to the witness, if they referred to the "horse-stealing business" for which Buckmaster was then in jail, were clearly incompetent. If the questions and answers referred to a general scheme or plan of horse stealing, or to horse stealing as a business, then the evidence was properly admitted. The record is not clear as to the exact connection in which the statements were made, although it does appear that at this time the public had no information as to the larceny of the horses involved in the charge against defendant, and even the owner thereof did not at that time know that his horses were stolen.

We see no error in the instructions of the court. One of the charges given to the jury at the request of the people is in the nature of a hypothetical question, embracing practically the prosecution's theory of the case. It includes a large portion of the evidence, and is necessarily long drawn out, and somewhat obscure and unsatisfactory. While we cannot say that it is erroneous, the practice of giving such instructions is not to be commended. It is not calculated to enlighten the jury upon the law which should guide them in their deliberations in the jury-room, and as a general rule such instructions furnish ample grounds for the reversal of judgments in criminal cases. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.; Harrison, J. De Haven, J.

Goodlett v St. Elmo Investment Co. et al. (No. 14,427.)

Mortgages — Foreclosure — Deficiency Judgment—Associations.

1. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage of land, given to secure notes of an association for the purchase money of such land, the complaint in the caption named the association and the individual members as defendants, and process was served respectively on the association and on each of its members, and a general appearance was entered by each. The complaint did not clearly indicate whether proceedings were intended merely against the association or against its members personally, and it concluded with the prayer "that plaintiff have judgment against the persons personally liable for said debt for any deficiency that may remain after such sale." The answers of defendants admitted the genuineness and due execution of the articles of association, and did not deny the existence of the partnership relationship among them. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to a deficiency judgment against those persons who were members of such association at the date of the execution of the notes in suit.

2. Where the decree and pleadings do not clearly show who were the members of the association when such obligation was incurred, the court will not modify the decree, but remand the cause for further proceedings.

3. A plaintiff in a foreclosure suit does not, by causing a sale under the decree of foreclosure before taking an appeal, thereby waive his right to appeal from that part of the decree fixing personal liability for a deficiency of proceeds of such sale.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. Rowell, Judge.

Suit by J. B. Goodlett against the St. Elmo Investment Company and others, as partners, for foreclosure of mortgage of lands given to secure notes issued in respect of a sale of such lands. The decree ordering foreclosure and sale thereunder further ordered, in event of a deficiency, that judgment be docketed against the St. Elmo Investment Company for that amount. Against this order plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Byron Waters, for appellant. Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, Willis & Cole, Samuel Minor, and Fredick & Rose, for respondents.

Beatty, C. J. This is a suit to foreclose a mortgage. The cause was tried in the superior court without a jury, and findings expressly waived by the parties. The court made and entered a decree in favor of the plaintiff, adjudging, among other things, "that there is due to plaintiff upon the mortgage debt mentioned in the complaint, and still remains unpaid, the sum of $12,683.07 in gold coin of the United States, for principal and interest of said debt, together with the sum of $624.15, attorneys' fees, fixed by the court, aggregating a total sum of $13,307.22 due and unpaid to plaintiff upon said notes and mortgage, and that the defendant the St. Elmo Investment Company, an association composed of Robert N. C. Wilson, Charles R. Redick, A. M. Thornton, F. H. Lowell, and Samuel Merrill, and transacting business under said name as St. Elmo Investment Company as a common name, is personally liable therefor, and for all of the said debt, to-wit, the sum of $13,307.22. It is further ordered and adjudged that the hereinafter described property be sold according to law, and that the proceeds of such sale be applied to the payment of the cost of this action incurred by plaintiff, taxed at $80.71, and to the payment of the expenses of such sale, and to the payment to plaintiff of the said sum of $13,307.22 so adjudged to be due as above stated, and that any overplus of said proceeds which may remain after such application be paid to the defendant the St. Elmo Investment Company. Upon the other hand, if such proceeds of such sale are insufficient to pay all of said sums, that, upon the return of the execution herein showing such insufficiency, that the clerk of this court docket a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the said association defendant the St. Elmo Investment Company for the amount of such deficiency." From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, claiming that it is erroneous on its face in not ordering the deficiency judgment to be docketed against the individuals composing the St. Elmo Investment Company, as well as against the association itself, and asking that the decree be modified so as to grant that relief.

The record upon which the appeal is presented consists of the amended complaint of the plaintiff, the demurrers and answers of the several defendants, and the decree, without any bill of exceptions. The judgment, therefore, cannot be held erroneous unless it conflicts with or falls short of the uncontradicted allegations of the complaint, or is self-contradictory. We see nothing in the judgment, considered by itself, and without reference to the pleadings, that is erroneous. It is evidently based—as regards the deficiency—upon section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but the contention of appellant that neither that section nor section 414 has any application to an action to foreclose a mortgage is not sustained by the decision which he cites,—Bowen v. May, 12 Cal. 351. There was no question in that case as to the proper form of a deficiency judgment against the parties personally liable for the secured debt, and we see no reason why, if an association of persons transacting business under a common name contracts a debt which is secured by the mortgage of one or more of the associates or of a third person, the mortgagee in his action to foreclose may not, if he chooses to do so, proceed against the association under section 388 for the purpose of obtaining a deficiency judgment binding only the joint property of the associates. The question, therefore, is whether this appellant did, as contended by respondents, sue the St. Elmo Investment Company, or, as he contends, sue the individuals composing that association. To solve this question, recourse must be had to the amended complaint, the caption of which is as follows: "J. B. Goodlett, Plaintiff, vs. The St. Elmo Investment Company, Robert N. C. Wilson, Charles R. Redick, F. H. Lowell, Samuel Merrill, and F. H. Lowell, trustee of said St. Elmo Investment Company, and H. A. Barclay, Defendants." The allegations which follow, so far as they are material to the present inquiry, are: "That on the 17th of March, 1887, Samuel Merrill, Robert N. C. Wilson, Charles R. Redick, A. M. Thornton, and F. H. Lowell formed a syndicate of themselves for the purpose of acquiring, subdividing, and selling in small lots and parcels the whole of said property hereinafter mentioned, with other lands adjacent thereto; and with a view to that end entered into articles of agreement, in form and substance," etc. As to the contents of this agreement, which is set out at length in the complaint, it is sufficient to say that it shows that the persons by whom it is subscribed —being the same persons above named—have associated themselves in business for the purpose of subdividing and selling certain tracts of land previously contracted for by different members of the association, (one of said tracts being the land of this plaintiff, which was subsequently conveyed to the trustee of the St. Elmo Investment Company, and by him mortgaged to plaintiff to secure the deferred installments of the purchase price, which mortgage this suit is brought to foreclose;) that they have each subscribed $3,000 to the capital of the association; that it is to be known as the "St. Elmo Investment Company;" that for the purpose of transacting its business Charles R. Redick shall act as chairman, A. F. Thornton as secretary, F. N. Lowell as treasurer and general manager, subject to the advice of all the members acting as a board of directors; that the shares of the association shall be represented by certificates of $1,000 each, to be issued by the treasurer on receipt of the money subscribed, which certificates may be transferred by the holder, whose assignee shall be entitled to all the rights of the original holder; that the capital may be increased to any extent deemed proper by the members; and that on the consummation of its objects the capital of the association and a ratable share of the profits shall be refunded to the members. It is next alleged in the amended complaint that on the 4th of May, 1887, F. H. Lowell, acting for and on behalf of said association, and as its trustee, obtained a conveyance of plaintiff's land, and at the same time executed the notes of the association for the deferred installments of the purchase money, securing the same by a mortgage of said land. The only remaining allegations of the complaint that need be stated here are contained in paragraphs 11 and 12, which are as follows: (11) "That the defendants have or claim to have some interest in and to said mortgaged premises as purchasers, mortgagees, judgment creditors, or otherwise, which interest or claim is subsequent to and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage." (12) "That all of the defendants other than said St. Elmo Investment Company have acquired, and now own, some interest in or to the shares and certificates of ownership in said St. Elmo Investment Company, mentioned in said articles of association." The prayer of the complaint is, in general terms, "that plaintiff have judgment against the persons personally liable for said debt for any deficiency that may remain after such sale."

From this statement of the contents of the amended complaint it will be seen that it leaves the intention of the pleader in some doubt. It presents some indications, especially in the caption, of an intention to proceed against the association as a separate defendant; but, on the other hand, there is nothing in the body of the complaint clearly indicative of an intention to proceed under section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or to forego the right of plaintiff to a deficiency judgment against the individual members of the association. We think, however, that it is not very material what the intention of the pleader may have been with respect to this matter. The real question is whether, upon the uncontradicted allegations of the complaint, the plaintiff was entitled to a deficiency judgment against the individual members of the association, all of them having been duly served with process, or, what amounts to the same thing, having appeared, and answered to the merits. The answers of the defendants do not put in issue the genuineness and due execution of the articles of association of the St. Elmo Investment Company as set out in the complaint; in other words, the formation of the company, its date, its original membership, and the terms of association are admitted, and it does not seem to be controverted that the members sustain towards each other the relation of partners, and were jointly liable as such to third persons upon obligations of the company, incurred while they were such members. The defendant Merrill alone alleges that he assigned his shares, and ceased to be a member of the company as soon as its shares were issued; but he does not make it clear that this was prior to the execution of the notes and mortgage in suit. The authority of Lowell to make the notes sued on in the name or on behalf of the company is denied in the several answers, but the judgment of the court distinctly and necessarily implies that he had such authority, and that the notes bound the company, and therefore bound its members. We think that on the findings implied in the decree and the admissions in the pleadings the plaintiff was entitled to a deficiency judgment against those persons who were the members of the St. Elmo Investment Company at the date of the execution of the notes in suit, and that, if the defendants Wilson, Redick, Merrill, Lowell, and Thornton were such members, the court had jurisdiction, by reason of their general appearance in the action, to render such judgment against them. But we do not think it clear, either from the decree or the pleadings, or both combined, who were the members of the association when the obligation was incurred, and therefore we are not inclined, upon the record before us, to modify the decree as requested. We think it safer to reverse the judgment for the error of the court in failing to order that deficiency docketed against the members of the St. Elmo Investment Company, and to remand the cause for further proceedings.

Our attention has been called to the fact that plaintiff, before taking this appeal, caused execution to be issued and the mortgaged premises sold, and it seems to be claimed that this is a waiver of his right to appeal from the judgment. We do not think that this action amounts to a waiver. Plaintiff's right to sell the mortgaged property was absolute, and could be exercised without prejudice to his right to appeal from that part of the decree fixing the personal liability for a deficiency of the proceeds of such sale.

The judgment of the superior court, so far as it directs the docketing of a deficiency judgment against the St. Elmo Investment Company, is reversed; in other respects it is affirmed. The cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to find upon the evidence before it, and such other evidence as the parties may submit, who were the members of the St. Elmo Investment Company at the date of the execution of the notes in suit, and to order the docketing of a deficiency judgment accordingly.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county, C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Suit by S. E. A. Palmer against the St. Elmo Investment Company and others, as partners, for foreclosure of mortgage of lands, and to recover amounts of certain notes. The decree ordering foreclosure and sale thereunder further ordered, in event of deficiency, that judgment be docketed against the St. Elmo Investment Company for that amount. Against this portion of decree plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

BEATTY, C. J. This case is in all essential respects the same as the case of Goodlett v. Investment Co., (No. 14,427,) 29 Pac. Rep. 505, (this day decided,) and on the authority of that case the judgment of the superior court, so far as it directs the docketing of a deficiency judgment against the St. Elmo Investment Company, is reversed; in other respects it is affirmed. The cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to find upon the evidence before it, and such other evidence as the parties may submit, who were the members of the St. Elmo Investment Company at the date of the execution of the notes in suit, and to order the docketing of a deficiency judgment accordingly.

VENDOR AND VENDEE—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT BY VENDOR—LIABILITY OF VENDEE'S GUARANTORS.

1. Where plaintiff contracts to sell land, and the intending vendee executes an installment note for the price, but fails to perform his part of the contract, whereupon plaintiff notifies him that he (plaintiff) has elected to rescind the contract, plaintiff has no longer a right of action on the contract or on such installment note, but only a right of action for the breach of the contract.

2. Where defendants guarantied the payment of part of the installment note, such payment "to be made only in the event that" plaintiff "shall have the right to revert to * * * these guarantors by reason of the failure" of the vendee to comply with his part of the contract, plaintiff, on such rescission by him, has no right of action against defendants, their liability being subsidiary to that of the intending vendee.

3. Notice by plaintiff to the vendee, after his notice that he elected to rescind the contract, that he elected to consider the whole of the principal sums named in the installment note as immediately due and payable as provided therein, did not affect defendant's liability.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county, LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Andrew Glassell against N. D. Coleman and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Smith, Winder & Smith, for appellant. A. M. Stephens, Jas. G. Garrison, and Gibson & Creighton, (Frank G. Burnett, of counsel,) for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff and the defendant Wilson entered into an agreement, bearing date September 1, 1888, by which the plaintiff agreed to sell and Wilson to purchase a tract of land in Los Angeles county for the sum of $182,000, payable in installments, of which the second, of $50,000, was to be paid on or before 10 years from the date of the agreement, and the third, of $125,000, on or before 15 years from said date. Said installments were to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable yearly; but it was provided that of said interest Wilson need pay only $1,000 for the first year and only $3,000 for each of the second and third years. Other provisions, not necessary to be mentioned here, were made in the contract in reference to the payment by Wilson of interest and taxes, and for the expenditure by him of money in improving the land, and its subdivision and sale in parcels. The agreement provided that a writing "somewhat in the form of a promissory note" should be executed by Wilson, "expressing the terms of the obligation as to the payment of the second and third installments," separate from and in addition to the contract, as "an additional evidence" of such obligation, and in pursuance of this clause Wilson executed to the plaintiff the following instrument: "Los Angeles, Cal., September 1, 1888. This obligation witnesseth as follows: On or before ten (10) years after this date, for value received, I promise to pay to Andrew Glassell, of this city, or order, at this city, the principal sum of fifty thousand ($50,000) dollars, and also on or before fifteen years after this date, for value received, I promise to pay to said Glassell, or order, at said city, the further principal sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand ($125,000) dollars, with interest on both sums from date until paid at the rate of six per cent. (6 per cent.) per annum; interest to be paid yearly, except as hereby modified, to-wit: For the first year only one thousand ($1,000) dollars of the accruing interest on said two sums shall be required to be paid within that year. * * * [Other provisions relating to the payment of interest omitted.] If default be made at any time for the space of six months in the payment of the interest as herein provided, the whole principal sum shall thereupon become due at the option of Glassell. This note is given as an additional security for the payment of the second and third installments of purchase price, payable as per contract between the parties hereto, of the same date herewith, for sale, etc., of land in Los Angeles county, Cal., and any and all payments made by said Wilson to said Glassell on said second and third installments, as required by said contract, shall be considered, for all intents and purposes, as credits upon this obligation." At the same time the respondents herein executed to the plaintiff their obligation, written upon the same sheet of paper, and immediately after the above obligation of Wilson, as follows, to-wit: "For value received, the undersigned jointly and severally guaranty the payment of this note according to its terms and conditions, but only to the extent of the sum of twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars, and interest on said twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars at the rate of six per cent. (6 per cent.) per year from the date of this note, or from the date of the last payment of the accrued interest on this note, if any such payments of interest shall be made; the payments of said twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars, and interest thereon, however, to be made only in the event that the within mentioned Glassell shall have the right to resort to this note and these guarantors by reason of the failure of the within mentioned H. T. D. Wilson to comply with his obligation, as expressed in the contract for the purchase and sale of land between him and said Glassell, of even date with this note, and therein referred to, and of the forfeiture consequent upon such failure." The agreement between the plaintiff and Wilson provided that the plaintiff should convey the land to Wilson upon his payment of the entire purchase price of the whole tract, and performance of the other obligations assumed by him, and contained also the following clause: "It is further agreed that time is of the essence of this contract, and in the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said party of the second part the party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, and to all moneys, promissory notes, or other considerations therefor paid or delivered to said first party under this contract; * * * and said first party shall especially have the right to retain and own * * * the above-mentioned written money obligation of the said second party to the said first party for the payment of the principal and interest of said second and third installments referred to in the contract, and designated second and third installment note, together with the right to enforce the collection thereof as against said Wilson and the guarantors on said note, but only to the extent as expressed in the guaranty indorsed said note." The plaintiff and the defendants herein had made an agreement in September, 1887, for the purchase and sale of the said tract of land at a much higher price, but owing to the collapse of the "boom" during that year the vendees thereunder were desirous of being released from its obligations, and, as the result of negotiation therefor between them and the plaintiff, he executed to them a full release and discharge therefrom; and, at the same time, in consideration thereof, the foregoing instruments were executed by the defendants as a substitute for the agreement of 1887. Wilson failed to make the expenditures agreed by him, or to pay the taxes on the land, or any of the interest provided by the installment note, and the plaintiff, on the 10th of September, 1889, and again January 20, 1890, gave him a written notice in the following terms: "I have elected, and do elect, to claim and insist, and do hereby claim and insist, on the absolute forfeiture of all your interests, claims, and rights mentioned in or provided for in said contract, and you are especially notified that I now claim to be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey the real property mentioned in said contract, and that I claim that you have forfeited all right thereto, and to all moneys, promissory notes, and considerations therefor or for said contract paid or delivered to me under or pursuant to said contract, and that I retain and have and claim absolutely all the rights, property, and privileges provided for in said contract for my benefit in the event of your complete forfeiture therein provided for." The plaintiff also, "upon the expiration of six months from and after the said September 1, 1889," notified Wilson that he chose and elected to consider the whole of the principal sums named in the installment note as immediately due and payable. It is also alleged in the complaint that by reason of the failure of Wilson to comply with its obligations, as expressed in said agreement, the plaintiff has been damaged to the extent of $50,000, and that he notified the respondent of such failure, and has demanded of them the payment of $25,000, for which he prays judgment against all of the defendants. The respondents herein (the defendants other than Wilson) demurred to the complaint for its insufficiency upon the ground that it stated no cause of action against them, and, the court having sustained their demurrer, judgment was entered dismissing the action, from which plaintiff has appealed.

1. The allegations in the complaint in reference to the agreement of September, 1887, cannot be considered for the purpose of determining whether the plaintiff has any cause of action against the respondents arising out of the breach of the agreement of September, 1888. It is alleged in the complaint that the agreement of 1887 was canceled, and that those of 1888 were executed as a substitute for it. Even if its cancellation was upon the consideration that the others should be executed, the parties to the latter are bound only by the obligations which they have therein assumed.

2. The liability of the respondents is limited by the terms of their guaranty. Being only guarantors for Wilson, their liability can under no contingency be greater than his, or greater in extent than that which they have themselves assumed. Unless he is liable upon the contract which they have guarantied, they cannot be held liable thereon, nor are they liable upon any contract or obligation which he may be under to the plaintiff that is not within the terms of their guaranty.

3. Upon the election by the plaintiff to rescind the contract by claiming a forfeiture by Wilson of all his rights under the contract, the contract itself, and each of its provisions or terms, ceased to be a subsisting or enforceable obligation against Wilson. The only right of action against him then remaining to the plaintiff was for damages for his breach of the contract. The plaintiff could not have a right of action on the contract and at the same time one for its breach. An action for damages for the breach of a contract necessarily implies that the contract has been terminated. Wilson's liability to the plaintiff upon his agreement to pay the purchase price for the land ceased with the plaintiff's rescission of his right to receive the land upon such payment. Whether his obligation for such purchase money was expressed in the contract of sale, or in the promissory note executed contemporaneously therewith, is immaterial. Each instrument was executed as a part of the same transaction, and the forfeiture of his right to the land wrought an entire failure of the consideration for his promise to pay for the land, irrespective of the instrument in which the promise was contained. The writing "somewhat in the form of a promissory note," which the contract provided should be executed by Wilson to the plaintiff, was by the terms of the contract to be only an "additional evidence of the obligation" to pay the second and third installments; and the installment note itself purports in terms to be given only "as additional security for the payment" of those installments.

4. By the terms of their agreement the respondents "guarantied the payment of this note according to its terms and conditions," to the extent of $25,000, but limited this liability to the condition that the plaintiff should have "the right to resort to this note" and to them by reason of the failure of Wilson to comply with his obligations as expressed in the contract "referred to in the note," and of the forfeiture consequent upon such failure. The only provision in the contract relating to the right of the plaintiff to "resort to this note" is the one which provides that upon a rescission of the contract of purchase, and the forfeiture of all Wilson's rights under the contract, the plaintiff may "retain and own" the note, and also "the right to enforce the collection thereof as against said Wilson and the guarantors on said note;" but only to the extent as expressed in the guaranty. Neither by this provision in the contract, nor by the installment note itself, was there imposed upon Wilson any other obligation than to pay the purchase money for the land therein named; and the plaintiff's "right to enforce the collection thereof" terminated with Wilson's obligation to pay such purchase money. "The right to enforce its collection" was only a right correlative to the obligation to pay it, and did not create a right to collect from Wilson any liability other than that which rested upon the consideration for which the note was given. The plaintiff had no right of action on the note for any damages sustained from Wilson's breach of his agreement to purchase. Wilson's liability for such damages, as we have seen, was independent of and inconsistent with any liability on the note. The obligation of the respondents, being subsidiary to that of Wilson, and being limited to such portion of his liability on the note as they had guarantied, it follows that upon the termination of his liability thereon by virtue of the forfeiture claimed by the plaintiff all liability of the respondents to the plaintiff ceased at the same time. The plaintiff's right of action against Wilson for damages arising from the breach of the contract of purchase is entirely independent of his right of action on the note, and, as the respondents have not guarantied any liability of Wilson for such damages, the plaintiff has shown no right of action against them.

5. The notice by the plaintiff to Wilson, after his notice that he elected to rescind the contract, that he elected to consider the whole of the principal sums named in the installment note as immediately due and payable, had no other effect than to hasten the maturity of the installments therein provided for, and did not affect the liability of the respondents. Upon the maturity of the forfeiture at the expiration of the six months' grace allowed by the contract after such notice their liability upon the note terminated with the liability of Wilson thereon.

We are of the opinion that the complaint fails to state a cause of action against the respondents, and that the court below correctly sustained their demurrer. The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 24, 1883.)

ACTION TO RECOVER PERSONAL PROPERTY—PLEADING—TRIAL—CONTRADICTORY FINDINGS.

1. An averment in an action to recover possession of personal property, that "plaintiff was and is the owner and in the possession of the property sued for," does not state a cause of action.

2. An answer in an action to recover personal property, which denies an averment in the complaint that plaintiff is the owner, is not demurrable for not stating facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

3. Where a demurrer to an answer was sustained generally, and defendant did not amend, a trial by the court, as if issues of fact had been joined, was irregular and erroneous.

4. In an action for the recovery of personal property, findings that each party was in possession of the property are so contradictory that a judgment thereon must be reversed.

Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Action by John Carman against Frank H. Ross to recover possession of personal property. Demurrer to complaint overruled. Demurrer to answer sustained. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wright & Hazen, for appellant. Maddux & Simmons, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. This action is to recover possession of specific personal property, and it is averred in the complaint that the plaintiff was and is the owner and in the possession of the property sued for. This is an averment that the plaintiff was in the possession of the property sued for when this action was commenced. This being the case, the plaintiff had no cause of action. We do not think that this is cured by any other averment in the complaint.

The answer was demurred to on the ground, among others, that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The demurrer was sustained generally. We are of opinion it was not well taken, on the general ground above stated, for the answer does deny that the plaintiff is the owner of the property described in the complaint. The other ground of demurrer is so indefinitely stated that we cannot tell to what portion of the answer it relates, and therefore say nothing in regard to it.

The defendant refused to amend his answer. Nevertheless, the court below proceeded to try the case as if issues had been joined in it by proper pleading. This trial was entirely irregular and erroneous. The cause seems to have been tried as if issues of fact had been made up, when in fact no such issues had been joined.

[1] This case, filed October 24, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

The findings are contradictory. The court, in effect, found that each party was in possession of the property sued for when the action was commenced. We cannot see how any judgment could have been pronounced on such a contradiction. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

EMINENT DOMAIN — COMPENSATION — PROCEDURE.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1248, provides that, in condemnation proceedings, the court, with or without a jury, must ascertain and assess (1) the value of the land; (2) the damage by reason of severance; and (3) the benefit. Held, that these elements of compensation must be separately assessed, and that until such assessment a judgment of condemnation is void.

2. The fact that subdivision 4 of the same section requires that, when lands are condemned for a railroad right of way, the cost of fencing the line shall be assessed as damages, does not, by implication, preclude an assessment for the cost of fencing in other cases, if fences are rendered necessary by the taking.

3. Although there was a "No-Fence Law" (St. 1873–74, p. 310) in the county, under which no person is bound to fence land, the cost of fencing the remainder of land, for restraining the cattle of the owner and other purposes, by one whose land has been condemned, may be considered as an element of injury.

4. A finding of facts which supports all the material allegations of the complaint is insufficient to support a judgment of condemnation, when the complaint itself contains no allegations of value, damages, or benefits, and no findings are made on the question of damages.

Appeal from superior court, Butte county.

Action by Butte county against R. W. Boydston to condemn land. From a judgment for plaintiff defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reardan & Freer, for appellant. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

MCKEE, J. The case in hand arises out of a proceeding under title 7, pt. 3, Code Civil Proc., to condemn part of a tract of land belonging to the defendant for a private way. Assuming that the appropriation of private property for such a purpose is a taking for public use, for which the power of eminent domain may be exercised, (Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 255,) and that the county in which such a road is to be opened represents the use, yet the power must be exercised in the manner provided by the Code of Civil Procedure, under which the proceeding has been commenced. By section 1248 of that Code it is provided that the court in which the proceeding has been brought must hear, with or without a jury, such legal testimony as may be offered by any of the parties to the proceeding; and upon such testimony ascertain and assess (1) the value of the land sought to be condemned, and of any improvements upon it at the date of the issuance of the summons in the proceeding; (2) the damages which may accrue to the remaining land by reason of its severance from the part sought to be condemned, and the opening of the road in the manner proposed by the plaintiff; and (3) the benefit, if any, which the opening of the road may be to those portions of the defendant's land which may be severed from the part to be appropriated. These constitute the elements of the compensation to which an owner of land is entitled, where his land, or any part of it, is proposed to be taken and appropriated for a public use. And, when these things shall have been judicially ascertained and assessed, if the benefit shall be less than the damage, the former must be deducted from the latter, and the remainder shall be the damages assessed. On the other hand, if the benefit shall exceed or be equal to the damage, the owner shall be entitled only to the value of the land to be taken. But the value of the land, the damage, if any, and the benefit, if any, must be separately assessed, in order that the compensation may be adjudged and paid. Until such an assessment, adjudication, and payment or tender of compensation, the owner cannot be deprived of his land, and any judgment of condemnation rendered against him would be illegal and void. Sections 1251–1253, Code Civil Proc. In the proceeding under review the law was not complied with. There is not in the record of the case any assessment of damage, nor any finding that no damage was sustained. There is a finding of facts which, it is admitted, "sustains all the material allegations of the complaint," but the complaint itself contains no allegations of value, damage, or benefit. Upon this finding the court held, as a conclusion of law, that that portion of defendant's land sought to be condemned was necessary for the road, and that it should be condemned upon payment to the defendant of $150, each party paying his own costs. It is stipulated that this sum of $150 was found as damages; but whether the sum was for the value of the land to be appropriated to the road, or for damage for any injury to the remaining land, or for the excess of damage over benefit, nowhere appears in the findings or by an assessment. The defendant was entitled to have his compensation ascertained and assessed according to law, and for that purpose the mode designated by the law must be pursued. Without an assessment, as far as practicable, for each source of damage separately, and without payment or tender of the compensation assessed, no judgment of condemnation could be legally entered. Section 1248, subd. 5, and section 1253, supra. The judgment is therefore erroneous, and must be reversed. But a question arises out of the record, which will again come up at another trial, and we are asked to pass upon it.

It appears that at the hearing of the evidence the defendant offered to prove that the opening of the road would divide his farm in such a way as to make it necessary for him to fence his remaining land. To this the plaintiff objected; the objection was sustained by the court upon the ground that the cost of fencing was not an element of damage; and that ruling is assigned as error. It is contended that the ruling was correct, because the cost of fencing is excluded by law, as an element of damage, in all condemnation proceedings, except where a railroad company seeks to condemn land for the purpose of its railroad. In such a proceeding the court is required "to ascertain and assess the cost of good and sufficient fences along the lines of the railroad, and of cattle-guards where fences may cross the line of the road," (section 1248, subd. 4, supra;) but it is not required to do so in any other case, and therefore it is insisted the defendant was not entitled to prove the necessity or the cost for fencing his land. But this provision as to railroad companies does not affect the right of the owner to the compensation to which he is entitled. The object of the provision was to secure the performance of a duty imposed by law upon railroad companies on land taken for the purpose of their roads. Section 485, Civil Code. That duty the state enforces by a special assessment in the condemnation proceedings, and the duty must be performed either by the railroad company or the land-owner. The assessment may be paid to the land-owner by the company, or it may elect to give bond in double the amount of the assessment, for the building of such fences and cattle-guards as may be needed upon the land taken for the road within 18 months after the railroad is built on the land. Section 1251, Code Civil Proc. If the company fails to build, the land-owner may sue upon the bond. But if payment of the assessment be made to the land-owner, and he fails to build and maintain such fences, etc., the law makes him liable to the company for any injuries which may be sustained by reason of his animals running at large upon the railroad, and relieves and exonerates the company from any damage or loss arising out of the killing or maiming of his cattle, trespassing upon the road, unless it be proved that the loss or damage was caused wholly by the fault or negligence of the company. Section 485, Civil Code. The special assessment in a railroad case is therefore made in the line of a duty imposed by law, and not in the way of damages to the land-owner for an injury to his land.

[1] This case, filed August 29, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

But in the present proceeding there can be no assessment against the plaintiff for the enforcement of a legal duty, for the county of Butte is not bound to fence public or private roads. Any assessment made in the proceeding must therefore be made to the defendant in the way of damages for an injury; and there is no law known to us which excludes a defendant in a case from the right of showing by legal testimony the extent of an injury which is the subject for ascertainment and assessment. All the provisions of the law under consideration must be read and construed so as to correspond with section 14, art. 1, of the constitution, which provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without compensation having been made or paid into court for the owner." That constitutional provision is broad enough to include all cases in which private property is attempted to be taken under the power of eminent domain. And the legislature, in carrying out the provision, has established the rule that, where you take all a man's property for the public use, you must pay him its value; but where only a part of it is taken you must pay the value of that part and the damages, less benefits, for the injury which the taking and appropriation of the part may cause to his remaining land. Injury to what remains is therefore a proper subject of compensation. The right of ownership is unlimited except by the right of the state as regulated by the constitution and laws; and, when the state exercises its right, the owner has the legal right to prove, by legal testimony, any of the acts or things which may constitute injury to what remains of his land by the act of appropriation. It is argued that the cost of fencing cannot be considered as a element of such injury, because the plaintiff has what is called a "No-Fence Law," (St. 1873-74, p. 310;) and therefore neither plaintiff nor defendant is bound to fence. But under such a statute, as at the common law, while no man was bound to fence his lands against the cattle of another, there may be a necessity or fencing in his own cattle, or otherwise protecting his land, (Rust v. Low, 6 Mass. 94;) and, if the act of taking from him part of his land for the public use forces upon him the necessity of protecting what remains, he should be entitled to show it. You cannot take a man's land for a public highway, to run in such a way as to expose his remaining land to unlawful or other encroachments, and arbitrarily say to him, "There is no necessity for protecting your land by fences or otherwise." In the language of the supreme court of Illinois, "the injuries which the proprietor suffers by having his farm divided so as to make it inconvenient to pass to and from its different parts, and to compel him to erect additional fences, and all other injuries of a like character occasioned by the construction of a public work through it, are as proper subjects of inquiry, in estimating the damages sustained thereby, as is the value of the land actually appropriated to public use." Railroad v. Carpenter, 14 Ill. 192. "What the public take," says the supreme court of New Hampshire, "is not simply the land covered by the road, but the right to make and maintain the road; and the injury to the whole tract may much exceed the value of the land actually taken. The land may be inconveniently divided, and additional fencing may be required. A just and fair compensation for the right taken would be the actual damage done to the whole land, and such is the compensation which in equity the landowner ought to receive." In re Washington Road Co., 35 N. H. 134. So where a committee had been appointed, under a statute of Massachusetts, to locate a road adjudged to be necessary, and to estimate the damages any person may sustain in his property by the laying out of the road, it was held that in estimating the damages the committee were not confined to the value of the land covered by the road and the expense of fencing the ground, etc., but the owner was entitled to show any other actual damage, and the estimation ought to be according to the damage which he will in fact sustain in his property by the opening of the road. Com. v. Coombs, 2 Mass. 489; Cooley, Const. Lim. 566; Railroad Co. v. Scott, 1 Penny. 503. Taking part of a man's land for public use may not, in fact, force upon him the necessity to fence the remainder of his ground; but he has the legal right to show that such a necessity will arise out of the appropriation, and, if the necessity shall be proved as a fact, the expense incident to it is a matter for the court in estimating the damage to which the owner is entitled. The court erred in excluding the evidence. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Stephens, for petitioner. Mr. York, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Petitioner was duly convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles of a contempt of its authority, and sentenced to pay a fine of $400, and, in default of payment, to be imprisoned in satisfaction of the fine one day for every $2 of the fine unpaid. In pursuance of said judgment he has been committed to, and is imprisoned in, the county jail. He asks to be discharged upon the ground that, since the recent amendment of section 1205 of the Penal Code, (St. 1891, p. 52,) the superior courts have no power in contempt cases to imprison the defendant in satisfaction of a fine for a longer period than five days.

The whole question to be decided is whether this amendment to the Penal Code applies to cases of contempt. In my opinion it does not. Section 1205 of the Penal Code, since the amendment referred to, is, as it was before, to be read in connection with section 11 of the same Code, which expressly declares that "this Code does not affect any power conferred by law upon any * * * tribunal or officer, to impose or inflict punishment for a contempt." The power to punish for contempt of court, and its limitations, must, therefore, be sought elsewhere than in the Penal Code, and they are found in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1209 et seq. The limit of punishment there prescribed is a fine not exceeding $500, or imprisonment not exceeding five days, or both. Section 1218, Code Civil Proc. The power conferred by this section is not affected by any of the provisions of the Penal Code. In Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 535, it was held that the court imposing a fine for contempt has the power to make and enforce a judgment such as that in question here, and that, as I understand the decision, without reference to or aid from section 1205, or any other provision of the Penal Code. That decision has never been overruled or questioned, to my knowledge, and remains the law by which I must be bound in deciding this application. The prisoner is remanded.

APPEALABLE ORDER — MODIFIED JUDGMENT—MECHANICS' LIENS — ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1195, providing that, in actions to enforce liens, the superior court must allow, as a part of the costs, the money paid for filing and recording the lien, and reasonable attorneys' fees in the superior and supreme court, such costs and attorneys' fees to be allowed to each lien claimant whose lien is established, attorneys' fees in the supreme court are not costs, within Sup. Ct. Rule 24, providing that, where an order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to costs of appeal, the clerk will insert in the remittitur a judgment that appellants recover the costs.

2. Under section 1195, the allowance of attorneys' fees in lien cases is in the hands of the superior court, and though, on appeal from a judgment allowing a lien, the superior court is directed to modify the judgment as to a certain item, it may still allow the lien claimant attorneys' fees in the supreme court.

3. Where, after the modification by the superior court, in accordance with the directions of the supreme court in the remittitur, of a judgment allowing a lien, an order is made allowing the lien claimant an attorney's fee in the supreme court, an appeal will not lie from the judgment as modified, as such order is a special order after final judgment, and itself appealable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the Schallert-Ganahl Lumber Company and others against James A. Neal and others. From an order allowing plaintiffs an attorney's fee, and from the judgment as modified, defendants appeal. Appeal from judgment dismissed.

Telfair Creighton and John W. Mitchell, for appellants. H. A. Barclay, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal, and the facts are as follows: Plaintiffs are material men, and brought this action to foreclose certain liens for materials furnished defendant Neal. Judgment was recovered as prayed for in the complaint, and, upon an appeal to this court, that judgment was affirmed in all respects except as to an item of $43.50, and to that extent the trial court was directed to modify the judgment. Upon the filing of the remittitur in the lower court, the judgment was modified in accordance with the directions therein, and the court also by an order allowed the attorneys for respondents a fee of $100 for services in defending the cause in this court, which amount was added to the judgment. It is from this order, and the judgment as modified, that defendants have now appealed, and the motion to dismiss such appeal is the matter under investigation; respondents insisting that in such case there is no appeal authorized by law. It seems quite clear that the court had the power to make an order allowing the successful party in this action a reasonable attorney's fee for services rendered in this court. Section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains this provision: "The court [meaning the superior court] must also allow, as a part of the costs, the money paid for filing and recording the lien, and reasonable attorneys' fees in the superior and supreme courts, such costs and attorneys' fees to be allowed to each lien claimant whose lien is established," etc., It needs but a cursory examination of the foregoing provision of the statute to determine that the attorney's fee referred to is not considered a part of the costs, but as a matter separate and distinct therefrom. Still it bears some resemblance to costs, inasmuch as it is an incident to the judgment. This is the view of the matter taken by this court in Rapp v. Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac. Rep. 325, and in McIntyre v. Trautner, 78 Cal. 449, 21 Pac. Rep. 15, and is undoubtedly the true principle.

It would seem from the foregoing views that rule 24 of this court, which provides that, "in all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified, and the order of reversal or modification contains no direction as to costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record and insert in the remittitur a judgment that appellants recover the costs of appeal," has no application to the case at bar; for this is not a question of costs, and, in addition thereto, said section 1195 of the Code places the matter in the hands of the superior court. In the case of West Coast Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 281, 22 Pac. Rep. 231, and in other recent decisions, this court directed the lower court, upon the return of the remittitur, to allow respondent a reasonable attorney's fee, under section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for services in this court; but such order would appear to be without the power of this court to make, and therefore not binding upon the trial court. The matters which we have referred to possibly are not directly involved in the merits of this motion, but they are to some extent connected therewith, and, we think, necessitated some notice. The appeal in this case is taken from the order allowing the attorney's fee, and also from the judgment as modified. The order modifying the judgment, by adding thereto the sum of $100, was, in effect, the same order as the one allowing an attorney's fee of $100, for such order of itself modified the judgment to that extent. The appeal from the modified judgment should be dismissed, for the order made by the court for the allowance of an attorney's fee of $100 is a special order, made after final judgment, upon which the defendant is entitled to an appeal to this court. It stands upon the same plane as an order made upon a motion to retax costs; and in Dooly v. Norton, 41 Cal. 442, this court, by Justice SPRAGUE, said: "The motion to retax costs is, in effect, a motion to modify the judgment, and, however the order may be considered when it is made before the entry of judgment, it seems clear to me that when it is made after the entry of judgment it is an order after final judgment as fully in every sense as an order modifying the judgment in any other respect." See, also, Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza Gold Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. Rep. 810. This question is reviewed in extenso by Mr. Hayne in his work on New Trial and Appeals, (volume 2, § 197,) where the decisions of this court bearing upon the question are all cited, and the principles announced in Dooly v. Norton, supra, are declared by the author to be the true rule. For the foregoing reasons let the motion to dismiss the appeal from the modified judgment be granted, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denied.

BLAKESLEE v. HALL, (WHITWORTH et al., Interveners. No. 13,974.)

APPEAL—ABATEMENT BY DEATH—SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES.

In ejectment, plaintiff claimed under a deed by which the land had been conveyed to him and to his successor in the office of bishop of a certain church. There was judgment for the defendant in the trial court; and, after an appeal therefrom had been perfected, plaintiff died, and his successor as bishop was substituted. It was not contended that the bishop was a corporation sole. Held, that the appeal would be dismissed, as such successor had no interest therein; plaintiff's personal representatives alone being entitled to be substituted as plaintiffs.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Ejectment by George A. Blakeslee against H. C. Hall. Whitworth and others intervened. Judgment for defendant and interveners. Plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

J. D. Bicknell and E. L. Kelly, for appellant. Smith, Winder & Smith, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an action of ejectment against defendant, Hall, to recover certain land in the city of Los Angeles. Whitworth and others intervened. Judgment was rendered against plaintiff, and he appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff claimed title under a certain deed of conveyance of the land in contest executed by Lydia Rebbeck on February 3, 1886. The only language in the deed which designates the grantee, or the purposes of the grant, is the following: "I, Lydia Rebbeck, of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, widow, grant to George A. Blakeslee, of Galien, Berrien county, Michigan, and to his successor in office as bishop of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, all that real property," etc. By the deed there was reserved to said Lydia the possession and rents and profits of the land during her life, and also a lease to defendant, Hall, which expired March 15, 1889. On March 23, 1887, the said Lydia died, and upon the distribution of her estate the said land went to the interveners, unless it went to the present appellant through said deed to Blakeslee. Defendant, Hall, is in possession under said interveners. The court below found that the deed was procured from said Lydia,—who was sick at the time with an incurable disease, from which she afterwards died,—by the undue influence of one Mills, who was her pastor and spiritual adviser, both being members of said Reorganized Church, and also found that there was no corporation, sole or otherwise, to which the deed was made; that there was no grantee, etc. We need not examine into the correctness of all the rulings of the court below, as they appear in the statement on motion for new trial, because we think, for the reasons hereinafter stated, that respondents' motion to dismiss the appeal should be granted.

After the appeal had been perfected, and the cause was in this court, counsel for appellant suggested the death of said plaintiff, Blakeslee; and, on their motion, E. L. Kelly, who had been elected as bishop of the said Reorganized Church, was substituted as appellant in the action, whereupon respondents moved to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that said Kelly has no interest in the litigation. (It is asserted in respondents' brief on the motion, and not denied in the brief of appellant, that appellant declined to substitute the personal representatives of Blakeslee.) If the deed was made to Blakeslee as a natural person, then the personal representatives are alone interested in the litigation, and are alone entitled to be substituted as appellants. If the deed is to be construed as intending to run to Blakeslee as bishop, and to his successor in office as bishop, then the word "successor" is valueless, and does not convey to or continue in said Kelly any estate in the land, unless the bishop of said church was and is a corporation sole. But there is no pretense that there was or is any such corporation. Such a corporation could be created in this state only by compliance with the provisions of the Civil Code on that subject, (section 602;) and it does not appear that there is any different law in the state of Illinois, or that there is any law there at all for the formation or existence of such a corporation. At all events, it is not contended that said bishop was a corporation. If, therefore, the use of the word "successor" in the deed excludes the intent of the grantor to convey a fee to Blakeslee and his heirs, he took at best but an estate for life. Under any view, therefore, Kelly has no estate in the land, and no interest in the litigation. The appeal is dismissed, with a stay of remittitur for 30 days.

Whitney v. Kelley et al. (No. 14,531.)

Setting Aside Judgment—Who may Sue.

The grantee in a deed purporting to convey land then in possession of defendant, under a judgment in favor of defendant against the grantor, rendered in an action to which such grantee was not a party, cannot sue to set aside the judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by W. W. Whitney against Robert Kelley and others to set aside a judgment ousting them from their title to certain real estate. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sprigg & Barber, for appellant. Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis, Works, Gibson & Titus, and Luce & McDonald, for respondents.

Garoutte, J. This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing an action, a demurrer to the complaint having been sustained, and the plaintiff declining to amend. In September, 1886, some of the defendants and the grantors of others, claiming title to the land involved in this suit, brought an action against the grantors of plaintiff to establish by judicial decree the true boundary line between the lands of the respective parties to that suit. The judgment therein rendered determined the boundary line, and adjudged the plaintiffs to be the owners of the tract of land involved in the present action. Plaintiff, as grantee of the defendants in that action, now files his complaint to set aside that judgment, upon the ground that it was procured through certain frauds practiced upon the defendants therein, the plaintiff's grantors. The complaint further alleges that "said lot was duly conveyed to plaintiff for value, before the commencement of this action, and that he is now the owner and entitled to the possession thereof," and further adding that the defendants herein have no title thereto other than that obtained by said judgment. This is an action to set aside a judgment upon the ground of fraud, brought by a plaintiff, who was not a party to the suit in which the judgment was rendered, but is a grantee of the defendants in said action. It is insisted that as such he has no standing before a court of equity, and, if that be true, the judgment must be affirmed. The question here presented is one of importance, and, as far as we are advised, one not directly adjudicated upon in this state. Owing to the fact that there is not an entire uniformity in the decisions upon the question, it is enveloped in some doubt, but we believe the better rule and the weight of authority support the principle of law as adduced in Freeman on Judgments, (section 512,) where it is said: "No person will be permitted to proceed in equity against a judgment or decree to which he was not a party, and which did not at its rendition affect any of his rights. If the parties to an adjudication are satisfied with it, no outside persons will be permitted to intermeddle with it, at law or equity." Judge Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, (section 1040*g*,) speaking upon this subject, says: "So an assignment of a bare right to file a bill in equity for a fraud committed upon the assignor will be held void, as contrary to public policy, and as savoring of the character of maintenance. * * * Indeed, it has been laid down as a general rule that, where an equitable interest is assigned in order to give the assignee a locus standi in judicio in a court of equity, the party assigning such right must have some substantial possession and some capability of personal judgment, and not a mere naked right to overset a legal instrument or to maintain a suit." The principle here announced is supported in Cross v. Bank, 66 Cal. 462, 6 Pac. Rep. 94; Sanborn v. Doe, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 105; French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 565; Marshall v. Means, 12 Ga. 61; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Young & C. 496; Graham v. Railroad Co., 102 U. S. 154; Crocker v. Bellangee, 6 Wis. 667.

The case of Prosser v. Edmonds, supra, is the leading case, and the principle there involved is practically the same as is involved here. In that case the lord chief baron said: "But in a case where a party assigns his whole estate, and afterwards makes an assignment generally of the same estate to another person, and the second assignee claims to set aside the first assignment as fraudulent and void, the assignor himself making no complaint of fraud whatever, it appears to me that the right of the second assignee to make such claim would be a question deserving of great consideration. * * * In such a case a second assignment is merely that of a right to file a bill in equity for a fraud. * * * In the present case it is impossible that the assignee can obtain any benefit from his security, except through the medium of the court. He purchases nothing but a hostile right to bring parties into a court of equity, as defendants to a bill filed for the purpose of obtaining the fruits of his purchase. * * * Robert Todd, when he assigned, was in possession of nothing but a mere naked right. He could obtain nothing without filing a bill. No case can be found which decides that such a right can be the subject of assignment, whether at law or equity." In Graham v. Railroad Co., supra, a case where subsequent creditors attempted to set aside a conveyance secured by fraud practiced against the debtor, Justice BRADLEY, in the opinion of the court, said: "It seems clear that subsequent creditors have no better right than subsequent purchasers to question a previous transaction in which the debtor's property was obtained from him by fraud, which he has acquiesced in, and which he has manifested no desire to disturb. Yet, in such a case, subsequent purchasers have no such right;" also quoting from French v. Shotwell, wherein Chancellor KENT said: "If the party himself, who is the victim of fraud or usury, chooses to waive his remedy and release the party, it does not belong to a subsequent purchaser under him to recall and assume the remedy for him. If a judgment was fraudulent by collusion between the parties to it, on purpose to defraud a subsequent purchaser, the case would present a very different question. But if the judgment was fraudulent only as between the parties, it is for the injured party alone to apply the remedy." In this case of Graham v. Railroad Co. the learned justice entered into an exhaustive review of the authorities upon the question, and approved the case of Crocker v. Bellangee, supra, wherein it is expressly held that a subsequent purchaser cannot attack a conveyance made by his grantor upon the ground of fraud practiced upon such grantor. Prosser v. Edmonds is also approved; and after reviewing the case of Dickinson v. Burrell, L. R. 1 Eq. 337, the opinion continues: "Surely there is here no overruling of Prosser v. Edmonds, even if such overruling could avail against the Wisconsin decisions." The cases of Dickinson v. Burrell, supra, and McMahon v. Allen, 35 N. Y. 403, upon a careful examination, seem to some extent to be opposed to the principle announced in the text-books and authorities cited; but the true doctrine, based upon reason and authority, appears to be that the right to complain of fraud should not be recognized by a court of equity as a marketable commodity. Indeed, the leading case of Dickinson v. Burrell and the decisions following in its wake recognize that principle as correct; but Lord ROMILLY in the Dickinson Case attempts this distinction. He says: "If James Dickinson had sold or conveyed the right to sue to set aside the indenture of December, 1860, without conveying the property, or his interest in the property, which is the subject of that indenture, that would not have enabled the grantee, A. B., to maintain this bill; but if A. B. had bought the whole of the interest of James Dickinson in the property, then it would. The right of suit is a right incidental to the property conveyed." It is difficult to appreciate the distinction thus attempted to be drawn in the two cases. The one is an assignment of a right to acquire property by setting aside a fraudulent conveyance of it, and the other a conveyance of the property, with an incidental right of setting aside the prior fraudulent conveyance. But the conveyance of the property in its then status is neither more nor less than an assignment of a right of action for the fraud; for at that time the grantor had no other interest in or pertaining to the property.

Applying these principles to the facts of the case at bar, what will be the result? It may be conceded that the right to set aside this judgment by the plaintiff, upon the ground of fraud, rests upon the same plane as if it were a conveyance rather than a judgment. In the former case the judgment decreed the defendants herein to be the owners of the land. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it must be assumed that the pleadings justified such a decree, and, in addition thereto, we have the allegation here that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the land, and that it was conveyed to him for value. We then have this plaintiff as the grantee of parties against whom a judgment existed, declaring them to have no title in a tract of land; not being in possession, bringing this action years after the rendition of such judgment, to set it aside, upon the ground of fraud practiced against his grantors in the securing of it. In Prosser v. Edmonds, supra, Lord Abinger said: "Where an equitable interest is assigned, it appears to me * * * the party assigning that right must have some substantial possession,—some capability of personal enjoyment." And again he says: "Robert Todd, when he assigned, was in possession of nothing but a mere naked right. He could obtain nothing without filing a bill." As we have already seen, this principle was indorsed by Judge Story; and in the present case it can well be said that plaintiff's grantors, when they conveyed, were in possession of nothing but a mere naked right, and could obtain nothing without filing a bill. If plaintiff's grantors had nothing but a mere naked right to file a bill to set aside this judgment, then this plaintiff, their grantee, can have no title. It is essential that a party complaining in equity should have some present substantial interest in the subject matter of the suit. He must have a direct interest in the result of the litigation, and his complaint must clearly indicate that fact. The plaintiff here has no interest in this land, for his grantors had no interest when they transferred to him. If the court should set aside the judgment, plaintiff would get no title thereby, and consequently he stands here upon a bare naked right to bring an action to set aside a judgment upon the ground of fraud practiced upon his grantors, and no case in the books can be found to sustain such position. This judgment is not void, but only voidable at the desire and motion of the parties defrauded, and can only be avoided by a decree of a competent court. The conveyance to the plaintiff did not avoid the effect of the judgment. The title and all the title still remained in the judgment plaintiffs, and a bona fide purchaser from them would have obtained a perfect and complete estate. As the grantors had no interest to convey, the grantee received nothing by the conveyance. The grantors had the right, by appealing to the proper court, to secure a decree whereby the title would return to them, but by neglect or desire they could lose or waive such right. There is nothing in this complaint to indicate but that these grantors prior to the conveyance expressly waived their right to bring an action to set aside the judgment upon the ground of fraud. If they chose to waive that right, it is neither justice nor sound policy that a subsequent purchaser, with notice of the judgment, should be allowed to investigate the merits of the original transaction. The one fact that they conveyed to the plaintiff is no sufficient negative of the existence of such waiver. Such conveyance might not even indicate hostility to the judgment. It certainly had no weakening effect upon the title created and declared by the judgment. Plaintiff's grantors had no power, by conveyance or otherwise, to nullify the effect of this judgment, except by a direct assault upon it in a court of equity. They had the right to make the assault, and that is all the right they possessed. They had neither the title, the possession, nor the right of possession; and, under such circumstances, their conveyance to plaintiff carried nothing but a mere naked right to bring an action to set aside a judgment for a fraud practiced upon them. A plaintiff with such a right has no equity, and is not entitled to recognition in a court of equity. Let the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: De Haven, J.; McFarland, J.; Paterson, J.; Sharpstein, J.

Harrison, J. I concur in the judgment. The plaintiff cannot maintain an action to set aside the judgment complained of, unless the defendants in that action had such right, and it is incumbent on him to set forth his right of action as fully as it would be for them, had they sought such relief. In an action to set aside a judgment for fraud, the plaintiff must not only show by his complaint the facts constituting the fraud which give him his right to the relief, but must also show that he has a defense to the original action upon the merits, and that he is able to present to the court the evidence constituting that defense. It is not sufficient to merely allege these matters as ultimate facts, or to aver them in the form of an affidavit of merits, but the facts themselves—those constituting the fraud, those constituting his defense, and those constituting his ability to present them to the court—must be incorporated into his complaint, so that the court may determine that, if his allegations are admitted by the other party, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a judgment in his favor in the original action. "A bill to set aside a decree for fraud must state the decree, and the proceedings which led to it, with the circumstances of fraud on which it is impeached." 2 Daniel, Ch. Pr. *1585; Story, Eq. Pl. § 428. "The bill should state particularly the facts to be proved, the names of the witnesses, and show the bearing and relevancy of the proposed proofs. It should also show when and how the facts discovered came to the knowledge of the plaintiff, and why no motion for a new trial was made in the court trying the case." Mulford v. Cohn, 18 Cal. 46. If the plaintiff seeks to maintain the action upon the grounds of newly-discovered evidence, he "must describe the new evidence very distinctly and specifically, and state when it was discovered, and its bearing on the decree. It is not sufficient that he expects to prove certain facts; he must state the exact evidence to establish them." 1 Daniel, Ch. Pr. *1578, note 1; Dexter v. Arnold, 5 Mason, 312; Livingston v. Noe, 1 Lea, 55; Butler v. Vassault, 40 Cal. 76. An action of this nature must be brought within the time prescribed for an appeal from the original judgment, (Allen v. Currey, 41 Cal. 318; Evans v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 213;) and all who were parties to the original judgment must be made parties to the action to set it aside, (Harwood v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall. 78.) The complaint herein is defective in all of the foregoing requisites. The former judgment, and "the proceedings which led to it," are not set forth, either generally or specifically. There is but a single reference to the judgment, wherein its effect is averred, but the form of the judgment is not presented in the complaint. The complaint also fails to show whether the court had jurisdiction of the defendants; the averment that one of them "received" no summons is not inconsistent with the fact that the court may have had jurisdiction over him. The fraud which is alleged consists of averments that the complaint was drawn "with the intent" that the defendant should not suspect the real object of the action, and that the plaintiffs "represented to Lilian Cullen and other defendants" that they were joined as defendants therein as a matter of form only, and that they need not appear or answer therein. Not only is this averment defective in not setting forth the original complaint itself, so that the court can determine whether the "intent" with which it was drawn is such as the plaintiff alleges, and in not showing in what manner the plaintiffs therein made the "representations" charged, but the entire averment is made upon information and belief, without setting forth the sources of the information or the grounds for the belief. Other averments essential to his cause of action are also made upon information and belief.

In an action of this nature it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to make his averments with such definiteness and certainty, particularly those relating to the fraud which is charged, that the court will be able to determine whether he has the right to have its former judgment set aside. The solemn judgment of a court is not to be set aside upon the mere allegations of a defendant that he has been informed and believes that it was fraudulently obtained. The court must be informed whether his information was reliable, or only a street rumor, and the information must be set forth in his complaint, so that it may be known whether his belief had a substantial basis, or was only the result of excessive credulity. It is not a sufficient answer to this rule that the Code permits a complaint to be made upon information and belief. The provision of the Code that causes in equity, as well as those at law, are to be presented under the same form of pleading, has not changed the principles under which equitable relief shall be granted. When a plaintiff's right to such relief depends upon facts which are quasi jurisdictional in their nature, such as his personal status, his freedom from negligence or laches, the fraudulent or inequitable conduct of the party against whom that relief is sought, or matters in respect to which the court may exercise its discretion, or which it must determine have an existence before it can entertain his complaint, it is as essential under the present system as under any other that those matters should be presented by such positive and verified allegations that the court may determine their sufficiency. The plaintiff cannot substitute his own judgment for that of the court, and a complaint in which these jurisdictional facts are rested upon the information and belief of the plaintiff does not state facts sufficient to show that he has a right of action.

The plaintiff does not show that he has sought this relief with sufficient promptness. He does not allege when he acquired any interest in the land, or from whom he acquired it; his averment being that it was duly conveyed to him for value, "before the commencement of this action." Such an allegation is consistent with a conveyance before the former action, or from persons other than the defendants in that action. Neither does the plaintiff allege when he received the information which is the basis of this action, or, indeed, that he knows or can produce any evidence which will vary the former judgment; his only averment being that in September, 1889, it was "intimated" to him that the land could be identified by one Wheeler, and that, if the judgment is set aside, he can produce his evidence; but he does not show, except by recital, the nature or effect of the evidence that he expects to produce. Under the foregoing principles the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly sustained. Upon the question discussed by Mr. Justice GAROUTTE I express no opinion.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA LUMBER CO. v. OCEAN BEACH HOTEL CO. (No. 14,536.)

EXECUTION—TIME OF SALE.

Code Civil Proc. §§ 681, 683, provide that a person in whose favor judgment is given may have a writ of execution for its enforcement returnable at any time not less than 10 nor more than 60 days. Section 684 provides that, when a judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a writ reciting such judgment, and directing the sale. Held, that a writ issued under said section 684 is not an execution, and the sale, therefore, is not invalidated by being made after the time limited for the return.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. TORRANCE, Judge.

Suit by the Southern California Lumber Company against the Ocean Beach Hotel Company, to foreclose a material man's lien upon a block of land. Plaintiff obtained judgment, and a sale of the land. From an order afterwards made upon defendant's motion to vacate the sale, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for appellant. Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. On December 1, 1888, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant, foreclosing a material man's lien upon a block of land in the city of San Diego, and directing a sale of the property, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amounts adjudged to be due. On October 8, 1889, a writ for the enforcement of this judgment was issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county. By the writ the sheriff was commanded to proceed to advertise for sale and sell the property, and to make and file his report of the sale with the clerk of the court within 60 days after his receipt thereof. In obedience to this command the sheriff published and posted notice that he would sell the property on a day named, and within the time limited for the return of the writ, but no sale was ever made pursuant to that notice; "action thereon having been indefinitely postponed pursuant to an agreement by the parties, plaintiff and defendant, that there should be no sale prior to February 24, 1890." The sheriff retained the writ, and subsequently again published and posted notice that he would sell the property thereunder on February 24, 1890; and on that day he sold the whole block to the plaintiff for the sum of $451.40. The block sold consisted of 54 lots, as shown by an official plat on file in the office of the county recorder, and at the time of the sale was of the value of $5,000. On February 21, 1891, the defendant moved the court to vacate and set aside the sale made by the sheriff, as aforesaid, upon two grounds: (1) Because the property consisted of 54 lots, and was sold as a whole. (2) Because the property was advertised for sale and sold after the return day of the writ. The court overruled the motion on the first ground, and sustained it on the second ground, and thereupon made and entered its order vacating the sale. From this order the plaintiff appeals

The Code of Civil Procedure, in the chapter headed "The Execution," provides: "Sec. 681. The party in whose favor judgment is given may, at any time within five years after the entry thereof, have a writ of execution issued for its enforcement. Sec. 682. The writ of execution must be issued in the name of the people," etc. "Sec. 683. The execution may be made returnable at any time not less than ten nor more than sixty days after its receipt by the sheriff," etc. "Sec. 684. * * * When the judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a writ reciting such judgment, or the material parts thereof, and directing the proper officer to execute the judgment by making the sale, and applying the proceeds in conformity therewith." The only process provided in this state for the enforcement of a judgment foreclosing a lien upon specific property is that prescribed by the section of the Code last quoted. The writ here in question was issued in the name of the people, and pursuant to the provisions of that section. It is, however, claimed by appellant that a writ so issued is not an execution, within the meaning of section 683, and hence that there is no limitation of time within which it must be made returnable. A writ of execution is defined to be "process authorizing the seizure and appropriation of the property of a defendant for the satisfaction of the judgment against him." And. Law Dict. When issued upon a judgment running generally against the property of the defendant, it is an authority to the sheriff to seize of the property of the defendant a sufficient amount to satisfy the judgment. As the judgment itself does not specify the property which is to be taken, none of the property of the defendant is affected thereby, or charged with the lien of the judgment, until it is taken by the sheriff under the writ. "Until a levy, property is not affected by the execution." Code Civil Proc. § 688. As the sheriff cannot justify an interference with the possession by the defendant of any of his property, except upon the production of a writ therefor, it is incumbent upon him to show that a seizure of the particular property is within the scope of his writ, and if, by the terms of the writ, such seizure is authorized only within a limited period of time, a seizure after that time has expired is unauthorized, and the sheriff is liable for a trespass. If, however, the sheriff has taken the property within the lifetime of the writ, it has then become lawfully subject to be applied in satisfaction of the judgment, and a sale thereof may be made at any time thereafter. Ror. Jud. Sales, § 872. "Wherever some statute does not provide otherwise, an officer who has entered upon the execution of the writ before the return day thereof by a seizure of or levy upon property may, after the return day, and after the actual return, continue to hold the property, and may prosecute such further proceedings as may be necessary to convert such property, whether it be real or personal, into money for the purpose of satisfying the judgment." Freem. Ex'ns, § 100. The levy may be made at any time during the last day of the writ, and the property will be thereafter legally held by the sheriff against any claim or complaint of the judgment debtor. A writ of venditioni exponas is sometimes issued, but its issuance is not necessary to justify a sale, as the writ itself is only a direction to perform a duty which already exists, and the sheriff acquires no additional authority from its issuance. "By the levy a lien is created whose duration is not limited to the return day of the writ, and from the it must necessarily follow that the officer has authority, notwithstanding the passage of such return day, to make his levy productive by a sale of the realty levied upon; and this authority is not dependent on the issuing of a venditioni exponas, for this writ does nothing more than to compel performance of a pre-existing duty." Freem. Ex'ns, § 58. This rests upon the principle that the levy is the essential act by which the property is set apart for the satisfaction of the judgment, and taken into the custody of the law, and that, after it has been taken from the defendant, his interest is limited to its application to the judgment, irrespective of the time when it may be sold. A decree or a decretal order for the sale of certain specific property, made by a court of equity, differs materially from a common-law judgment. Instead of running against the entire property of the judgment debtor, it specifies the property which the court directs to be sold for the purpose of carrying its judgment into effect; and the officer, in executing this order, acts under the direct mandate of the court, without the power or necessity of taking any property from the possession of the defendant. Such a judgment under the chancery system was not carried into effect by a writ of execution, but a certified copy thereof was furnished to the master as his authority for making the sale, and the master was at liberty to exercise his discretion in regard to the time and place at which the sale should be made. Wilt. Mortg. Forec. § 517; Blossom v. Railroad Co., 3 Wall. 208. This practice prevailed in many parts of this state until the amendment in 1874 to section 684, Code Civil Proc. Heyman v. Babcock, 30 Cal. 367.

In 1874, by an amendment to section 684, Code Civil Proc., authority was for the first time given for the issuance of anything in the nature of a process for the purpose of enforcing a judgment directing a sale of real property. In the amendment thus made there is preserved the distinction between the mode of executing a common-law judgment and a decree in equity. The process by which the decree is to be enforced is not termed a "writ of execution," as is that which is to enforce the ordinary money judgment, but the section provides: "When the judgment requires the sale of property, the same may be enforced by a 'writ' reciting such judgment, or the material parts thereof, and directing the proper officer to execute the judgment by making the sale and applying the proceeds in conformity therewith." This writ is neither styled an execution, nor is it such in its nature, and the provision of section 683, Code Civil Proc., requiring the execution to be made returnable within 60 days, is inapplicable. Even though the process thus authorized should, under the provisions of section 681, Code Civil Proc., be termed a writ of execution, it does not follow that the same incidents attend it as attend the process issued to enforce a common-law judgment. The character of the writ is to be determined by the functions to be performed under its authority, rather than by its name. In order to enforce the writ of execution which is issued upon a common-law judgment, it is necessary for the officer, before he can sell the property of the defendant, to indicate by some act of his the particular property which he intends to appropriate for that purpose. This act is called a "levy," and, as we have seen, must be made in the lifetime of the writ. When, however, the judgment itself designates the property which is to be sold, there is no occasion for a levy. "The only object of a levy is to create a lien upon the land, or, in other words, to subject the lands to the payment of the plaintiff's debt. If this has already been done, a levy is supererogatory. If the sale has been ordered by a court of chancery in a suit in which all the parties in interest were before the court, there is no need of any levy, for the right to sell the land has attached as a consequence of the proceedings in the suit. Hence, under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, no levy need be made on the mortgaged premises." Freem. Ex'ns, § 280. The officer, in making the sale, is only executing the directions of the court, and his act is attended with the same result as his sale after a levy under a common-law execution. In both cases the property has been specifically impressed with the burden of satisfying the judgment, and the judgment debtor is not affected by the time within which this sale shall be made. The same reasons which uphold the validity of a sale by the sheriff after the return day of the writ, where the levy was made in its lifetime, uphold a sale in cases where no levy is required. Having the right to subject the property to a sale for the satisfaction of the judgment, the time within which it may be done is but directory, and under the control of the court. The court has at all times such control of its process as to prevent it from becoming a source of injury, but, in the absence of some showing that injury has resulted from a delay in making the sale, it should not be set aside merely because it was not made before the return day of the writ. As the ground upon which the respondent herein asked to have the sale set aside was that it was made after the return day of the writ, and as this was the only ground upon which the court made the order, it should be reversed. It is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACT VOID FOR WANT OF RECORD—PRACTICE—FILING CLAIM.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1195, authorizing any number of persons claiming liens on the same property to join them in one action, after such consolidation they should be treated as a single action, and the decision be embodied in a single set of findings and judgment, rather than a separate finding and judgment on each claim.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1183, provides, inter alia, that where the amount to be paid for any building exceeds $1,000 the contract shall be in writing, signed by the parties, and "shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder." Held, that where a contract provided for the erection of a building "conformable to drawings and specifications * * * hereto annexed," but the drawings and specifications were not filed with the contract, the contract was void, and cannot serve as a basis in determining the rights of those claiming mechanics' liens on the building.

3. The contract is void, also, where it provides that "the last payment shall be made 35 days after completion of the work," without specifying the amount of such payment, since Code Civil Proc. § 1184, requires that "at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least 35 days after the completion of the contract."

4. Code Civil Proc. § 1187, as amended in 1887, (St. & Amend. 1887, p. 154,) provides that every person save the original contractor, claiming a lien, must within 30 days after the completion of the building file his claim with the county recorder. Held that, where the contract between the owner and contractor was void because not properly filed, mechanics' liens filed before the actual completion of the building were premature, and cannot be enforced.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by the Willamette Steam Mills Company and others against the Los Angeles College Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Modified.

Graves, O'Melveny & Shankland and R. H. F. Variel, for appellants. Johnson & Borden, Conrey & Swanwick, J. W. Mitchell, R. Dunnigan, Reymert, Orfila & Reymert, and C. McFarland, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action for the foreclosure of several mechanics' liens. The Los Angeles College Company entered into an agreement with W. E. Lane, bearing date September 8, 1887, for the erection of a college building for the sum of $23,000; but the agreement was not executed until October 6th, on which latter day it was filed in the office of the county recorder for Los Angeles county. The document then filed made reference to certain drawings and specifications as "hereunto annexed," but they were not filed in the recorder's office. Lane entered upon the performance of the contract, but abandoned it March 6, 1888; and thereupon the college company took possession of the premises, occupied and used the same continuously thereafter, and caused the building to be completed on the 21st of April. At various dates, the earliest being March 19th and the latest May 8th, claims for mechanics' liens were filed by the respective respondents herein, and afterwards eight separate actions were commenced for their enforcement. When the causes came on for trial the court made an order that they be consolidated, and their trial was had under such order; but the court made separate findings for each cause, and rendered a separate judgment for each plaintiff for the sale of the premises to satisfy the amount of his claim. The actions are brought here upon an appeal by the college company from the several judgments, and an order denying a new trial, and are presented in a single record, embracing the several judgments, and a single statement of the case, prepared and settled for all the actions.

1. The practice adopted by the court below in making separate findings and judgments is not only inconsistent with its order consolidating the actions, but is itself attended with great inconvenience, and the possibility of serious complication. The provision of section 1195, Code Civil Proc., authorizing such consolidation, is placed in the same category with that permitting the several claimants to join as plaintiffs in one action; and after the order of consolidation had been made the court should thereafter have treated the actions as a single action by the respective plaintiffs against the defendants, and embodied its decision in a single set of findings, upon which a single judgment should have been entered. By this course the court would have very greatly abridged the record, and facilitated its examination here, and would also have avoided certain inconsistencies in the findings of fact which it has made upon the same evidence. In five of the cases the court has found that the building was occupied by the owner on the 7th of March, but in one it finds such occupancy to have been on the 6th of March, and in two it makes no finding whatever upon the subject. Inasmuch, however, as, under the view we take of the case, the time when such occupancy began is immaterial, these inconsistent findings do not constitute a reversible error. A more serious objection, however, is presented by the fact that separate judgments were entered in favor of the respective claimants at different dates ranging from March 21st to May 1st. If upon these judgments sales of the property should be made at different times, there might be different purchasers, and the respective titles acquired by such purchasers would necessitate further litigation, for the purpose of determining which was the superior. As the court had tried the causes as a single action, it should have incorporated into its findings all the facts that were in issue, directing, if necessary in any particular case, an amendment of the pleadings, for the purpose of having them conform to the proofs, and thereafter should have rendered a single judgment, directing a sale of the property, and the application of its proceeds to the satisfaction of the amounts to which it found that the claimants were respectively entitled.

2. The contract between Lane and the college company is in the form of an ordinary building contract, and provides that the contractor will do the work contracted for "conformably to the drawings and specifications made by R. B. Young, architect, and signed by the parties, and hereto annexed." The insertion of this clause in the contract made the drawings and specifications an essential part thereof, as material as was the price of the work or the terms of payment, and until they were "annexed" to the contract, so that its entire terms could be ascertained by mere inspection and without oral testimony, the contract was only inchoate and not complete, and could not form the basis of a recovery. Worden v. Hammond, 37 Cal. 63. Being by virtue of its terms a part of the contract itself, it was necessary for the parties thereto, or one of them, if it was desired that the contract should be the basis of his liability or the measure of his right of recovery, to cause the same to be filed in the recorder's office; and a failure to do so destroyed the validity of the contract. Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412. It is quite as important for the owner as for the contractor to see that the contract is so filed, since without it his liability has no contractual limit. It does not appear from the record whether the drawings and specifications were in fact annexed to the original contract, but it is stipulated that they were not filed in the recorder's office, and consequently the contract itself was not filed. In 1887 the legislature amended section 1183, Code Civil Proc., by providing that instead of filing the entire contract in the recorder's office, as had been previously required, there might be filed a memorandum thereof, "setting forth the names of all the parties to the contract, a description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable." After this amendment was made, the owner or the contractor could satisfy the statute by filing either the contract or such memorandum; but if he filed the contract he must still file the whole of it, including the drawings and specifications, if they were made a part thereof, while, if he preferred to file the memorandum, such memorandum must contain all the matters which are prescribed in the statute as the equivalent of the contract. Section 1184, Code Civil Proc., declares: "The contract price shall by the terms of the contract be made payable in installments at specified times after the commencement of the work, or on the completion of specified portions of the work, or on the completion of the whole work, provided that at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract. * * * In case such contracts and alterations do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section the labor done and materials furnished by all persons except the contractor shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance and request of the person who contracted with the contractor, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The contract in the present case fails to conform to the requirements of this section. Instead of providing that at least 25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be payable at least 35 days after the final completion of the contract, its provision is, "the last and final payment to be made thirty-five days after completion of the work according to contract," without specifying the amount of that payment. It is previously provided in the contract that "seventy-five per cent. of the cost of material and work completed at the time of payment is to be paid on the first and third Saturdays of each month, as the work progresses;" but there is no provision that at least 25 per cent. shall be made payable 35 days after the completion of the contract. There is a manifest difference between setting forth the "amount" that is to be paid at any particular date, and stating that a certain percentage of the "cost" will be so paid. Although the "cost" and the "contract price" of the work contracted for may be the same, yet there is no necessary connection between the two. It is easy to see that a contract might be entered into at such a figure for the entire work that a payment of 75 per cent. of the cost of the material and work completed at stated times, as the work progressed, would exhaust the entire contract price at or before the completion of the building, so that there would be nothing with which to meet the liens that might be filed within 30 days thereafter. It is sufficient, however, to say that the statute requires this provision in the contract, and that a failure to observe this requirement is followed by a failure to receive the benefits provided by the statute.

Whether the document which was filed in the recorder's office is to be regarded as the original contract, or as a memorandum thereof, is immaterial. A memorandum of the contract can have no higher force than the contract itself, and if the contract fails to comply with the requirements of the statute the memorandum itself must be equally insufficient. As a memorandum, merely, the document so filed was insufficient by reason of its failure to set forth "a statement of the general character of the work to be done;" the only statement in that regard being that it is to be "conformable to the drawings and specifications made by R. B. Young, architect, and signed by the parties, and hereto annexed," and that it is to be "three stories high." It does not set forth the material of which the building was to be constructed, or any item from which its "general character" can be ascertained; and the reference to the drawings and specifications which in another part thereof it states "are intended to co-operate so that any works exhibited in the drawings, and not mentioned in the specifications, or vice versa, are to be executed the same as if they were mentioned in the specifications and set forth in the drawings," without having the specifications and drawings filed, renders the document as ineffective for a memorandum as for the contract itself. The finding of the court that there had not been filed in the recorder's office a contract or memorandum containing the statements required by the statute was therefore correct, and the effect of such finding, under the provision of section 1183, Code Civil Proc.,[1] was to render the contract "wholly void" for all purposes. It cannot be the basis of a recovery by the contractor against the owner, nor can it be looked to for the purpose of determining the amount for which the owner is liable, or when any payment is to be made. In any action against him by a laborer or material man, their rights are to be determined by other rules, and irrespective of any provision of such contract.

3. It is provided in section 1183 that the laborers and material men "shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such labor done and materials furnished, whether at the instance of the owner or of any other person acting by his authority," and also that "every person having charge of * * * the construction of any building * * * shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter." The same section provides a mode in which the owner may limit his liability, viz., by causing the contract to be filed in the recorder's office; but it is only "in case of a contract for the work," duly filed, that the amount of the lien is limited by the contract price, and such limitation remains even though the contractor "shall fail to perform his contract in full, or shall abandon the same before completion." Section 1200, Code Civil Proc. If, however, the owner does not choose to avail himself of this mode of limiting his liability, "the labor done and materials furnished by all the persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner; and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." In order, however, that the laborer or material man may preserve and enforce this lien, he must file his claim therefor in the recorder's office, with as much specification and within the same time as if he had himself made a direct contract for such labor or material with the owner. Lumber Co. v. Schmitt, 74 Cal. 625, 16 Pac. Rep. 516. Section 1187, declares that "every person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, must within thirty days after the completion of any building" file his claim of lien with the county recorder. If the contract is "wholly void," there is neither a "contract" nor an "original contractor;" and in such case every person claiming a lien must file his claim within 30 days after the completion of the building, as he is required to do whenever he makes a direct contract with the owner in person. Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 389; Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. Rep. 235. The filing of a claim before the completion of the building is premature, and confers no right. Roylance v. Hotel Co., 74 Cal. 273, 20 Pac. Rep. 573. In the absence of any statutory qualification or definition of the term "completion," there would be no room for its construction by the court, but it would be construed to mean actual completion, and would be a question of fact to be determined in each case. The statute has, however, provided that a substantial completion is all that is required in any case, whether the work be done at the direct instance of the owner or under the provisions of a contract between him and an original contractor, by declaring that a "trivial imperfection" shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of a lien. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. Rep. 686. What constitutes a trivial imperfection is still a question of fact in each instance. So, too, the provision that "cessation from labor for thirty days" shall be deemed equivalent to a completion is by the express terms of the statute made applicable to an "unfinished contract" as well as to an "unfinished building." These are the only universal exceptions to the rule requiring that the lien shall not be filed until after completion of the building.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 1183, provides, inter alia, that where the amount to be paid for any building by the owner to a contractor exceeds $1,000 the contract shall be in writing, subscribed by the parties thereto, and "shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county, or city and county, where the property is situated; * * * otherwise, it shall be wholly void."

The statute has, however, in a limited class of cases, made another exception to the rule which requires actual completion of the building before the claim of lien can be filed. In this exception, however, it has placed a limitation to the extent of the exception, making it applicable only in certain designated cases, so that, if any one would avail himself of the exception, he must show that he is within the limited class for which the exception was made. It is provided in section 1187 that "in case of contracts" the occupation or use of the building by the owner, or his acceptance of the building, shall be deemed conclusive evidence of completion. This exception to the general rule is by its terms of limited application, and can be invoked in behalf of the claimant only "in case of contracts;" and the "contract" which is here referred to is the one between the owner and him who is termed the "original contractor," under which, and subject to whose terms, the laborer and the material man must enforce their liens. One object of this provision is apparent,—that the owner and the contractor shall not, by a secret agreement between themselves, abandon the original contract before its completion, or dispense with the completion of the building according to its original plan, and thereby, by being able to show that the building has never been in fact completed, prevent the laborer and material man from enforcing their liens. Another reason for the provision is found in the requirement of the statute that in all contracts the owner shall retain 25 per cent. of the contract price until the expiration of 35 days after the time fixed in the contract for its completion; and, in order that the 30 days within which others than the contractor may file their claims of lien shall commence at the same time with the 35 days, it is provided that his occupancy or use of the building shall be conclusive evidence of such completion. Such occupancy or use would moreover be as notorious a fact, and more readily established by the claimant, than the fact of actual completion. The occupation or use, however, which under the statute is to be deemed conclusive evidence of completion, must be open, entire, and exclusive, and not of such a character as would be consistent with a continuance by the contractor in the completion of his contract; and whether, in any particular case, there has been such occupation or use, must be determined from the facts of that case, as in the ordinary case must be determined the fact of actual completion. The owner must be shown to have acted towards the contractor, and in reference to the building, in such a way as by necessary implication to give notice that the building had been accepted by him in satisfaction of the contract. A continuance by the contractor in the work of completing his contract, while the building or a portion thereof should be occupied by the owner, or even used by him for the purpose for which it was intended, would prevent such occupation or use from being regarded as conclusive evidence of completion. The provision of the statute that this conclusive evidence of completion shall be applicable only "in case of contracts" makes it essential that the claimant who would invoke the provision in support of his claim of lien, filed before the actual completion of the building, shall show that, at the time of such occupation or use by the owner there was a subsisting and valid contract under which the building was being constructed. If there was no original contract for its construction, or if the one which had been actually entered into had become "wholly void," the condition which the statute has prescribed for the application of the exception did not exist, and the claim could not be filed until after the actual completion of the building, or until after there had been a cessation from labor for 30 days upon the unfinished building. The court finds in the present case that the college building was not actually completed until the 21st of April; and it finds that the notices of lien, with the exception of those filed on behalf of the plaintiff Willamette Steam Mills Company, the plaintiff Thompson, and the plaintiffs McLeod & O'Leary, were filed prior to that date. It follows, with the exception of the three plaintiffs above named, that judgment should have been rendered in favor of the appellants.

4. The motion on the part of the college company to amend its answer was properly refused, for the reason that the matters sought to be presented in such amendments were immaterial. Inasmuch as, by a failure to file the contract in the recorder's office, it became wholly void, it was not available as a defense for any purpose, either to determine the amount of the contract price, or to limit the liability of the appellant, or as the foundation of a right to complete the building according to its terms.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed as to the respondents the Los Angeles Planing Mill Company, the California Door Company, the Harper-Reynolds Company, B. A. Breakey, and Charles B. Tidball et al., and the court is directed to enter judgment upon its findings in favor of the appellant, as against the said respondents; and as to the respondents Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manufacturing Company, Robert Thompson, and McLeod & O'Leary, the order denying a new trial is affirmed, and the court below is directed to enter its judgment, directing a sale of the premises described in the action, and the application of the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of the amounts for which it finds that the said respondents, respectively, are entitled to liens thereon.

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACT VOID FOR WANT OF RECORD—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY — PLEADINGS.

1. Where a contract for the erection of a building is void, under Code Civil Proc. § 1183, for not having been recorded, claims for mechanics' liens thereon may be filed within 30 days after the actual completion of the building, irrespective of previous acceptance or occupancy by the owner. Willamette Steam Mills Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 629, followed.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1187, requires that claims for mechanics' liens on a building be filed with the county recorder, containing "a description of the property to be charged, sufficient for identification." Held, that where a claim described the property as "lot 6 in block 28 of the Huber tract, said lot situate at the southwest corner of Hope and Eighth streets," the description was sufficiently definite, though the building was partially on lot 6 and partially on lot 7 of the block, and was at the "northeast" corner of Hope and Eighth streets.

3. Where the complaint for the foreclosure of a lien alleged that the building was situated on "lot 6," and the proofs showed that a portion stood on lot 7, the complaint should have been amended to conform to the proofs, and a decree should not have been entered for a sale only of that portion of the building on lot 6.

4. Code Civil Proc. § 1185, provides that "the land upon which any building is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment," is subject to the lien. Held that, where one claims a lien on more land for its convenient use than that occupied by the building, appropriate allegations thereof must be made in the complaint.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by the Willamette Steam Mills Company and others against M. Kremer and another to foreclose mechanics' liens. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellants. Johnson & Borden, Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, and Adams & Rhodes, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In August, 1887, the appellants made a contract in writing with one Lane for the construction of a frame building. Lane commenced work under the contract in August, but the contract was not filed in the recorder's office until October. The court finds that the building was completed February 23, 1888, and also that in January it had been accepted by the architect as finished, and that upon such acceptance it had been occupied by the appellants prior to its actual completion. Claims of lien in behalf of the three plaintiffs herein were filed in the recorder's office on the 8th, 15th, and 17th days of March, respectively; and, the said claimants having thereafter begun separate actions for their enforcement, the three actions were consolidated, and upon their trial judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

The lot of land upon which the building was constructed is situated at the northeast corner of Hope and Eighth streets, in Los Angeles, and is a portion of block 28 of the Huber tract, having a frontage on Hope street of about 70 feet. Block 28 has a frontage of 300 feet on Hope street, and had been mapped into 6 subdivisions, with a frontage of 50 feet each upon that street. Kremer had at one time owned the whole of the block, but, prior to making the contract with Lane, had sold and conveyed all except this lot, embracing lot 6 and a part of lot 7 of the original subdivision. The building in question was placed about 24 feet north from Eighth street, and was of such dimension that it covered portions of lot 6 and lot 7. In the claim of lien filed by the California Door Company, one of the plaintiffs herein, the lot upon which the building was constructed is described as "lot 6 in block 28 of the Huber tract, said lot being situate at the southwest corner of Hope and Eighth streets, in said city;" the description in the other claims locating the lot at the northeast corner of these streets.

1. The failure to file the contract in the recorder's office before the work was commenced rendered the contract "wholly void," (Code Civil Proc. § 1183;) and under the principles announced in Willamette Steam Mills Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., (Cal., No. 13,639,) 29 Pac. Rep. 629, the plaintiffs could file their claim of lien at any time within 30 days after the actual completion of the building, irrespective of its previous acceptance and occupancy by the owner.

2. The time at which the building was completed was a question of fact, to be determined by the trial court. Upon this question the evidence before it was conflicting, and we must accept its determination as correct. Whether the items of work which were done after the date at which the appellant claims the building was completed were a "trivial imperfection" was also a matter of fact, to be determined by that court. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. Rep. 686. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that any failure of completion is a "trivial imperfection."

3. The statute (Code Civil Proc. § 1183) provides that material men and laborers performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction of, a building, etc., shall have a lien "upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials;" and section 1187 requires that every person claiming the benefit of the chapter shall, within 30 days after the completion of the building, file for record with the county recorder of the county in which such property is situated a claim containing "a description of the property to be charged with the lien, sufficient for identification." In the present case the "property" upon which the plaintiffs bestowed labor and furnished materials, and upon which they claim a lien, is the "building" which was constructed under the contract with Lane; and the description of that "property" which they are required to give, in their claim of lien, is only such a description as would be "sufficient" for identification. We are of the opinion that the description of the property in the claim of lien filed by the California Door Company is a sufficient compliance with the statute. It is stated therein that the materials had been furnished and used in a building which Kremer had caused to be constructed under a contract with Lane "upon lot 6 in block 28 of the Huber tract," in Los Angeles. The further statement that said lot was "situate at the southwest corner of Hope and Eighth streets in said city," instead of at the northeast corner, was immaterial, and would have been rejected as a false call in a deed of conveyance. As it did not appear that the appellants had caused the construction of any other building at the intersection of Hope and Eighth streets than the one at the northeast corner, the further statement that the building was in block 28 of the Huber tract fully identified its location. Nor was the sufficiency of the description impaired by the statement that the building was on lot 6 in that block. The greater portion of it was in fact upon that lot; and the building intended was thus sufficiently identified, notwithstanding it extended a short distance beyond the line of division between the two lots. If there had been a building upon each of the lots, and the plaintiff had stated that the building upon which he claimed the lien was upon lot 6, he might have been precluded from enforcing a lien against the one upon lot 7, but in the absence of any ambiguity or uncertainty the statement must be held sufficient whenever it can be determined from it what building was intended; and as a general rule the sufficiency of the description is a question of fact, to be determined by the trial court. The claimant is not required, before filing his claim of lien, to make an accurate survey of the lot upon which the building stands, at the risk of losing his lien if he makes a slight mistake in giving its boundaries; nor is he even required to give the boundaries of the lot. Mr. Phillips, in his treatise on Mechanics' Liens, (section 379,) says: "The best rule to be adopted is that if there appear enough in the description to enable a party familiar with the locality to identify the premises intended to be described with reasonable certainty, to the exclusion of others, it will be sufficient. There is great reluctance to set aside a mechanics' claim merely for loose description, as the acts generally contemplate that the claimants should prepare their own papers; and it is not necessary that the description should be either full or precise." See, also, Kennedy v. House, 41 Pa. St. 39; McClintock v. Rush, 63 Pa. St. 205; Northwestern Cement & Concrete Pavement Co. v. Norwegian-Danish, etc., Seminary, 43 Minn. 449, 45 N. W. Rep. 868; Cleverly v. Moseley, 148 Mass. 280, 19 N. E. Rep. 394; Seaton v. Hixon, 35 Kan. 663, 12 Pac. Rep. 22; Hotaling v. Cronise, 2 Cal. 60; Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 78, 13 Pac. Rep. 152.

4. In an action to foreclose the lien, it is, however, necessary that the property which the plaintiff seeks to subject to a sale therefor should be definitely described, and that the judgment should specifically designate the property affected by the lien and directed to be sold; otherwise the officer executing the judgment can neither point out the property which he offers for sale, nor place the purchaser in possession thereof, and the deed which he may execute will not convey any title; and, as the judgment must follow the complaint, it is essential that the complaint should itself contain such specific description. In the complaint of the Los Angeles Planing Mill Company it is alleged that the building is "upon that certain lot or parcel of land situate in the city of and county of Los Angeles, state of California, at the northwest corner of Eighth and Hope streets." A conveyance in which that was the only description would be void for uncertainty. In the complaints of the other plaintiffs the lot is described as "lot six (6) in block twenty-eight (28) of the Huber tract in said city;" one of said complaints stating that said lot is "situate at the corner of Hope and Eighth streets, in said city," and the other, that it is at the northeast corner of said streets. The court, however, found that the building is upon the lot in said city "on the northeast corner of Eighth and Hope streets; said lot being more particularly described as lot 6, and the southerly ten feet of lot 7, block 28, of the Huber tract." In its decree it, however, directs that only that part of the building which is upon lot 6 shall be sold. In this respect the court erred. The statute gives a lien upon the entire building for any portion of the labor done or materials furnished therefor; and there is no provision for a lien upon a portion of a building, or for the sale of a part of a building to satisfy a lien upon the whole. We have already seen that the claims of lien, as filed, were sufficient to embrace the entire building, and when it was shown that the building was upon more land than was described in the complaint, the court should have directed amendments to be made to the complaints, so that they might conform to the proofs, and should then have directed a sale of the entire building, and such land as it should determine to be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof.

5. The statute (Code Civil Proc. § 1185) provides that "the land upon which any building is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment," is also subject to the lien. The amount of land thus to be made subject to the lien is an issuable fact, (Green v. Chandler, 54 Cal. 626,) and can be determined by the court only when such issue is presented by the pleadings. The land upon which the building is constructed is necessarily subject to the lien, to the extent of the owner's interest therein; but if the plaintiff would claim that more than that is required for the convenient use and occupation of the building, and have the same sold in satisfaction of his lien, he must make appropriate averments therefor. Although the finding of the court that the southerly 10 feet of lot 7, and the northerly 39 feet of lot 6, are required for the convenient use and occupation of said building, was in accordance with evidence introduced therefor, neither of the complaints made any averment; and before making such finding the court should have directed the complaints to be amended therefor.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are vacated, and the court below is directed to permit the plaintiffs to amend their complaints in the matters indicated in this opinion, and thereupon to enter its judgment in their favor upon the findings already made.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

GAGE et al. v. DOWNEY et al. (No. 14,411.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1892.)

JUDGMENT—CONTRADICTION—RES JUDICATA—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Where a court inadvertently determines two matters standing in such opposition as to be incapable of an harmonious construction, as, for instance, that the same property belongs absolutely to each of two persons, the decision is of no effect.

2. A widow sued her husband's administrator for land, which she alleged was known as the "Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente," and was comprised in the Pico and Warner grants. It was alleged, also, that the property included in the said mortgage was the same set apart as a homestead to Warner and his family; and that, when the mortgage was foreclosed, the husband bought the property in his own name. The court decreed that the husband's title to certain land, known as "Warner's Ranch," should vest in the plaintiff as her separate estate, being the same land set apart as a homestead, the same included in the sheriff's deed to the husband under foreclosure, and being the Rancho de Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente, excepting the Moss league. It was stipulated by the parties that the Moss league was included in a patent known as the "Portilla Patent," and that all the balance of the land included therein had been set apart for the Warner homestead, together with the land included in the Warner patent. The land in the sheriff's deed was described as the "Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente," the latter being a part of the former. The Warner grant was of the Valle de San Jose, and comprised the entire valley, including Agua Caliente, being bounded by the mountain on all sides. The decree further described the land as "Warner's Ranch," and declared what was included therein. It appeared also by the report of the commissioners appointed to set apart the Warner homestead that the Valle de San Jose was known as "Warner Ranch," and the parol evidence tended strongly to the same point. Plaintiff also admitted it in her pleadings in subsequent litigation. At the date of the decree there was no land other than the Valle de San Jose or the Warner homestead to which the description "Warner's Ranch" could apply. Held, that the decree included all the land covered by the Warner homestead.

3. Code Civil Proc. § 1573, declaring that an action for the recovery of any estate sold by an administrator must be brought within three years after final settlement, does not apply where the sale was invalid, and the purchaser had never gone into possession.

4. Where a person who obtains an interest in land from a cotenant does not go into actual possession, but relies upon the possession of the tenant, his possession cannot be deemed adverse to the other tenant, especially where there is nothing to show that the latter knew he was claiming adversely.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Ejectment by Henry T. Gage and others against John G. Downey and others. There was judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Henry T. Gage, Smith, Winder & Smith, and Glassell, Smith & Patton, for appellants. Levi Chase, Bicknell & White, and O'Brien & Morrison, for respondents.

Garoutte, J. This is an action of ejectment. Judgment went for the defendants, and this appeal is prosecuted from such judgment and the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case are set forth in detail in 79 Cal. 140, 21 Pac. Rep. 527, 855, when the cause was previously before this court, and it will not be necessary to recite them here. The decision of this court at that time settled the rights of the parties to a large portion of the lands involved in this litigation, and then remanded the cause for a new trial as to a one fourth interest of the land included in the Portilla patent, such one fourth being the interest claimed by plaintiffs as having passed to the children of John Rains at the time of his decease, by virtue of being community property and he dying intestate. At the subsequent trial of this cause in the lower court, that court very properly confined itself to an examination of the single question presented to it for investigation, and the only matter which will occupy our attention here will be as to the correctness of the determination of that question by the trial court.

It is very much to be regretted that the former decision of this case by this court, found in 79 Cal., 21 Pac. Rep., supra, is not more explicit and more satisfactory as to some matters there considered and determined. At the first trial it was stipulated (and the stipulation is in the present record) that the Moss league was afterwards embraced in the Portilla patent, and that "all the balance of the land included in the Portilla grant was set off to Warner as a homestead, together with the land included in the patent of the United States to J. J. Warner." It will thus be seen that under this stipulation we have all the land included in the Warner patent and all the land included in the Portilla patent, except the Moss league, set apart to Warner as a homestead.

At the time of the death of John Rains the title to the Warner grant stood in his name. Subsequent thereto the widow, Mrs. Rains, brought an action in San Bernardino county against the administrator of the estate and the children, claiming said land as her separate property. This court in its previous opinion, construing the complaint in that case, said, "The language used amounts to stating that the right involved and claimed here is the right to the tract set apart as a homestead described in the pleadings;" and again, "The title to the land was in controversy as between the personal representative and the children of John Rains on the one hand, and his widow on the other, and it was determined in favor of the widow." The question as to the effect of the San Bernardino decree is further considered at length by the court, but we have sufficiently noticed it for present purposes. We then have the stipulation of counsel that the Warner homestead included all the land embraced in both patents, save the Moss league; and we have the decision of this court that all the land included in the Warner homestead was adjudged to be the separate property of Mrs. Rains (the widow) by the San Bernardino decree, which would only leave the title to the Moss league standing in the heirs of John Rains. In a subsequent portion of the opinion of the court this language is used: "The defendants acquired one half of the land granted and afterwards patented to Portilla. The other half belonged to John Rains. He died intestate, and it was acquired during coverture, and therefore community property. The title to one fourth of the land embraced in the Portilla patent thus vested in the surviving children of John Rains." This conclusion is absolutely inconsistent with the decision of the court in a former part of the opinion, wherein it is determined that the San Bernardino decree gave Mrs. Rains good title to all of the property covered by the Warner homestead, to wit, all of the Warner grant and all of the Portilla grant except the Moss league. If Mrs. Rains had title to the Portilla grant except the Moss league, then the surviving children of John Rains, deceased, could not have had title to one fourth of the Portilla grant. Counsel representing both sides of the case, very properly in the interest of their respective clients, now claim the law of the case upon this question to be established in their favor. We can only say that where a decision of the court by inadvertence determines two principles of law, standing in such opposition to each other as to be incapable of an harmonious construction, effect can be given to neither, and as to such matter the law of the case has not been established.

As already suggested, the lower court having explicitly followed the directions of this court given upon the previous appeal, and having thereby limited the investigation at the last trial to the status of the one fourth interest in the Portilla grant, claimed to have passed to the children of John Rains at his decease, it would seem that its determination as to such matter could properly be the only subject for review upon this appeal. Such being the fact, whatever interest the plaintiff Cornelia de Foley now claims by virtue of her deed from her mother, Mrs. Carillo Rains, dated June 6, 1883, is a matter entirely immaterial at this time, for it involves an interest in the Portilla grant outside of the limits placed for this investigation. Again, counsel have at great length devoted themselves in their argument to the proper construction of the deed from Mrs. Carillo Rains to defendants' grantors, which deed is dated December 3, 1868. We think the matter of minor importance, the investigation being limited as already suggested. If the consideration of plaintiff Foley's title under the deed from her mother was the matter at issue, then the construction of this deed from Mrs. Carillo Rains to defendants' grantors would be very material, as showing that at the date of the Foley deed Mrs. Carillo Rains had no interest in the land, having previously parted with it under her deed as aforesaid. Plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their own title, and the presence or absence of title in defendants is not material, and whatever interest the plaintiffs have here is such interest as was not cut off by, but survived, the San Bernardino decree. We are entirely satisfied with the previous decision of this court as to the effect of the Santa Clara judgment, to wit, that it resulted only in setting aside certain deeds, etc., and thereby placing Mrs. Carillo Rains in the same position she found herself immediately subsequent to the date of the San Bernardino decree, and the deed made by the administrator thereunder. Consequently these plaintiffs now have all the interests of the children of John Rains, deceased, (unless since lost by operation of law,) to this one fourth of the land inclosed in the Portilla patent, unless the San Bernardino decree adjudicated it against them. If the plaintiffs' interest survived that decree, Mrs. Carillo Rains' deed to defendants' grantors did not carry it. It would seem, therefore, the effect and scope of this decree is a matter of great importance to a proper solution of the merits of the pending appeal.

Whatever rights the plaintiffs have in this land came to them as heirs at law of John Rains; for whatever interest he may have had in this property at the time of his death, it having accrued to him by purchase during coverture, and he having died intestate, one half thereof would pass to the surviving children. It is now conceded that under the San Bernardino decree the plaintiffs have no rights by virtue of the Warner patent. Whatever interest the widow Rains or the Rains estate had in the Portilla grant came by reason of a deed from Vicente Carillo (who owned the grant at the time) to John Rains for an undivided one half interest thereof. We will then proceed to an examination of that decree, to ascertain what portion, if any, of the Portilla grant was there adjudicated to be the separate property of Mrs. Rains, the widow.

That was an action brought by Mrs. Rains against Dunlap, the administrator of the estate of John Rains, deceased, and the children of John Rains, for the purpose of obtaining a decree that certain property claimed by Dunlap, as administrator of said estate, was her separate property. The complaint alleged that on the 29th of November, 1858, John Rains loaned to Jonathan J. Warner the sum of $1,800, and as a security took a mortgage from Warner and wife to that certain tract of land situated in the county of San Diego, Cal., known as the "Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente," and being the lands granted to Jose Antonio Pico by Juan B. Alvarado, governor of the department of the Californias, by deed of grant of June 8, 1840, and to John J. Warner by Manuel Micheltorena, governor as aforesaid, by deed of grant of date November 28, 1844; the property and right included in said mortgage being the land set off and partitioned as a homestead by commissioners for that purpose in the case of J. Mora Moss v. Jonathan J. Warner and Anita Gale Warner. The complaint further alleged that said money loaned was her separate property, that said mortgage was foreclosed, and said Rains bought the property at sheriff's sale for the amount of the judgment, and received the deed therefor in his own name. After trial the court rendered the following judgment: "And it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all right, title, and interest, claim and demand, whatsoever, which the said John Rains had and held at the time of his death, of, in, and to a certain tract of land situate in the county of San Diego, state of California, known as 'Warner's Ranch,' and hereinafter described, do rest and vest in the plaintiff Maria Merced Williams de Rains, as her separate and undivided property, free of all claim and demand and incumbrances whatsoever created by her said husband, John Rains, in said tract of land, being the same set apart as a homestead for said Jonathan J. Warner and wife by commissioners appointed for such purpose by the district court of the first judicial district of the state of California for San Diego county in the case of J. Mora Moss v. J. J. Warner et al., which partition by said commissioners was filed in said court and approved and confirmed on September 24, 1856, and being the same lands included in the deed of the sheriff of San Diego county to John Rains of date September 8, 1861, recorded in the county recorder's office of San Diego county, on September 12, 1861, at 10 o'clock A. M., and said lands being all that part of the Rancho de Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente granted to Jose Antonio Pico by Juan B. Alvarado, governor of the department of the Californias, by grant of January 8, 1840, and to the said Warner by the said name of Juan J. Warner, by Manuel Micheltorena, governor as aforesaid, by grant of date November 28, 1844, which lies to the north and east of," etc., the portion not included being the Moss league. In accordance with the terms of this decree, the land described as and adjudged to be the separate property of Mrs. Rains consisted of "Warner's Ranch," and more definitely described as (1) being the same land set apart to Warner and wife as a homestead; (2) being the same land included in the deed from the sheriff under the foreclosure sale to Rains; (3) being the Rancho de Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente grant to Pico by Gov. Alvarado, January 8, 1840, and to Warner by Gov. Manuel Micheltorena by grant of November 28, 1844, (excepting therefrom the Moss league.) This decree of the San Bernardino court was entered March 12, 1863.

There can be no question as to the extent of the land included in the Warner homestead, for it is a stipulated fact in the case that the Warner homestead embraced all the land included in both the Warner and Portilla patents, except the Moss league. Consequently, to the extent of the homestead description found in the decree, we know exactly what land was there vested in the widow. The description of the land included in the deed from the sheriff to Rains consists of "that certain tract of land known as the 'Valle de San Jose and Agua Caliente,' and being the land granted to Jose Antonio Pico by Juan J. Alvarado, governor of the department of the Californias, by deed of grant of date January 8, 1840, and to John J. Warner by Manuel Micheltorena, governor aforesaid, by deed of grant of date November 28, 1844." It will be observed that the description of the land in the sheriff's deed is the same as the third description set out in the decree, except that in addition it includes the land covered by the Moss league. The Agua Caliente described the land granted to Pico January 8, 1840, and appears to have comprised the northern portion of the Valle de San Jose. The expediente forwarded to Governor General Micheltorena by Warner contained his application for the place known by name as "Valle de San Jose," "surrounded by the mountain, and which is vacant." Upon November 28, 1844, said Micheltorena by his order recited: "Whereas, Juan Jose Warner, Mexican by naturalization, has petitioned for his own personal benefit, and that of his family, the land known by the name 'Valle de San Jose,' bounded on the east by the entrance into San Felipe and the mountain, on the west by the mountain and canon Aguanga, and on the north bounded by the mountain, and the boundaries on the south being the Carrizo and the mountain, * * * I have resolved to grant him the said land, declaring it by these presents his property." It will thus be seen that the grant to Warner referred to in the decree, known as the place "Valle de San Jose," covered the entire valley, for it is bounded at all points of the compass by the mountain, and it also necessarily covers the Agua Caliente or Pico grant. The remaining description of the land covered by the decree is the place known as "Warner's Ranch," and the decree itself in terms declares what land is included in the description "Warner's Ranch." It also appears, as early as 1856 by the report of the commissioners appointed to set apart the Warner homestead, that the "Valle de San Jose" was known as "Warner Ranch." The oral evidence tends strongly to the same point. The admissions of Mrs. Carillo Rains in her pleadings in subsequent litigation clearly indicates that she so considered it, and in truth, at the date of the decree in 1863, there was no tract of land other than the Valle de San Jose, or the Warner homestead, (which was the same tract less the Moss league,) to which the description "Warner's Ranch" could apply. We conclude that the evidence is entirely convincing that "Warner's Ranch" and the "Valle de San Jose" refer to the same tract of land, which tract comprises the Moss league and the Warner homestead, and which, therefore, include all the land embraced wihtin the Warner and Portilla patents, and that the San Benardino decree included all the land covered by the Warner homestead. We leave this branch of the case by quoting with approval from the opinion of Mr. Justice THORNTON upon the previous appeal, (79 Cal. 153, 21 Pac. Rep. 531:) "The complaint [referring to the San Bernardino Case] intended to challenge John Rains' right and title to this land, and to bring them to judicature, and this, we think, was done by the pleader. So that the parties claiming under Rains might deny by their answer her right to the land, and offer in evidence any title, whether derived from Portilia or any one else, to the land, which would show the land to be a part of his estate. The title to the land was in controversy in this suit as between the personal representative and the children of John Rains on the one hand, and his widow on the other, and it was determined in favor of the widow, (plaintiff.) John Rains acquired his interest in the Portilla grant after his foreclosure at the sheriff's sale under the decree of foreclosure in the action to foreclose his mortgage taken from Warner and wife; and if, after Mrs. Rains obtained the deed of the administrator under the decree in the San Bernardino Case, she had brought an action against John Rains to recover the land embraced in the decree, and he had set up against her his Portilla title, she might have defeated it, if not by the decree just above mentioned, by showing that the Portilla interest was acquired by him with money belonging to her as her separate estate. In our judgment, the decree under consideration conclusively determined that the land embraced in it belonged to Mrs. Rains, and that the estate of Rains had no title to it acquired from any source,—whether Portilla or Pico, or any one else." It is a stipulated fact that defendants have title to the undivided one half of the land included in the Portilla patent, and therefore defendants would have title to an undivided one half of the Moss league. The remaining one half of the Moss league, being in Rains at the time of his death, descended to his heirs, as follows: One half thereof, or twenty-five one-hundredths of the entire league, to Mrs. Rains. There were five children. Isaac died a minor, intestate and without issue, pending administration, and his interest passed to the brothers and sisters in equal shares. Estate of Donahue, 36 Cal. 329. This would vest twenty-five one-hundredths in the four children, which interest is now represented by the plaintiffs here.

Section 1573 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "No action for the recovery of any estate sold by an executor or administrator under the provisions of this chapter can be maintained by any heir or other person, claiming under the decedent, unless it be commenced within three years next after the settlement of the final account of the executor or administrator." During the progress of the administration of the Rains estate, the administrator, under order of the court, sold to one Carlisle the interest of the estate in and to the Portilla grant. The defendants insist that, by virtue of the foregoing section, the Rains heirs having failed to bring any action against Carlisle or his grantees for the recovery of this land, and the time for bringing such action having long since expired, the title thereto vested absolutely in Carlisle, and therefore there is an outstanding title which is sufficient to defeat plaintiffs in ejectment. The fact that this probate sale was not merely irregular, but entirely void, appears to be immaterial. Harlan v. Peck, 33 Cal. 521; Ganahl v. Soher, 68 Cal. 97, 8 Pac. Rep. 650. It appears that Carlisle never entered into possession of this land under his purchase, and to hold that under the circumstances, as here depicted, the interest of the heirs was transferred to Carlisle would be novel in the extreme, but we do not deem it necessary to discuss that question. Here it is conceded that no title vested in Carlisle under the probate sale, and that the facts exist which under this section of the Code deprive plaintiffs of the right to bring an action for the recovery of the land. These are the only salient existing facts, and they do not establish title in any one. The provision of the Code does not purport to affect the question of title to the realty, but simply refers to a right of action. It is purely a statute of repose. It would seem that defendants, in order to defeat plaintiffs' right of recovery, could no more rely upon this defense than they could upon the defense of title in John Doe by an adverse possession for the statutory time. The right to bring this action is entirely distinct from any question of Carlisle's title. This section of the Code creates a statute of limitations, a personal privilege, and, if the Rains heirs should bring an action to recover the land, non constat that Carlisle would take advantage of the plea afforded by the statute. It appears that Carlisle never took possession of the land under his deed. Perchance he recognized the fact that he obtained no title thereunder, and makes no claim to title. If such be the fact, an action by the heirs was not demanded, and the title is still in them and their grantees. We conclude, therefore, that the facts relied upon in this regard do not constitute any defense to plaintiffs' cause of action.

The Portilla patent is dated January 10, 1880. The defendant, the Merchants' Exchange Bank, was made a party to the action by an amended complaint filed October 20, 1885, more than five years subsequent to the issuance of the patent, and the trial court found that as to the defendant bank the plaintiff Foley was barred from any right of recovery, by reason of an adverse possession of five years. The defendants sued in the original complaint were John G. Downey and John Doe, Richard Roe, etc., fictitious defendants. Almost two years after the filing of the complaint, a summons was served on the Merchants' Exchange Bank. Subsequently the service of this summons, upon motion of the bank, was quashed, and the complaint was then amended by substituting said bank as defendant in lieu of John Doe, Richard Roe, etc. Some five years later plaintiffs moved to set aside the original order quashing the summons. It is unnecessary to pass upon these proceedings in detail. It is sufficient to say we believe the original action of the court in quashing the service of summons justified, and are satisfied that the said bank was not a party to the action until October 20, 1885. Conceding these facts, the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of adverse possession. At the time the defendant bank obtained an interest in this land from the grantees of Downey, the plaintiff Foley was a cotenant of Downey, and subsequently she became a cotenant of the bank. The bank was never in the actual possession of the land, and for its adverse possession relies upon the possession of its cotenant, Downey; but this claim would be equally open to plaintiff Foley. There is no evidence that Downey was acting for the bank in his claim of adverse possession, and especially no evidence that plaintiff Foley knew that Downey was claiming an adverse possession for the bank as against her. It is not clear that one cotenant in possession can create a title by adverse possession for himself and a second cotenant out of possession, as against a third cotenant. In Miller v. Myles, 46 Cal. 539, the court said: "The tenant out of possession has a right to assume that the possession of his cotenant is his possession until informed to the contrary, either by express notice, or by acts and declarations, which may possibly be equivalent to notice under certain circumstances. But until he has notice, either actual or constructive, in some form that the possession of his cotenant has become hostile, it will be deemed in law to have been amicable, notwithstanding the tenant in possession may in fact have been holding adversely." See Packard v. Johnson, 57 Cal. 182; Aguirre v. Alexander, 58 Cal. 28. The notice to plaintiff in this case to support the ouster is purely constructive, and to support such character of notice the evidence must be entirely convincing. In Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 180, 27 Pac. Rep. 658, the court, in discussing this question, said: "It is the 'intent' which determines the character of the possession; but it is essential that this intent be in some mode, either by actual or presumptive notice, directly or indirectly communicated to the other cotenant. This intent is not the secret purpose of the occupant, but is the purpose which the acts themselves manifest, and the acts done must be manifested to the person against whom the ouster is directed." While the evidence here may have been sufficient to support a finding of adverse possession in favor of defendant Downey, there is nothing to be found in the record to indicate that Downey's "intent" extended beyond his own interest in the land, or that plaintiff Foley had any notice of the existence of such an intent in the mind of Downey, even if he were possessed of it. We think the findings of the court upon the question of the statute of limitations arising under the probate sale to Carlisle, and under the claim of adverse possession by the defendant Merchants' Exchange Bank, are not supported by the evidence. The judgment and order are affirmed as to the land embraced in the said one fourth of the Portilla patent, except as to the twenty-five one-hundredths of the Moss league, and as to said interest the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On trial for larceny, where there was some evidence tending to show defendant's guilt, a verdict of guilty will not be disturbed on the ground of the insufficiency thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. HEBBARD, Judge.

Maggie Nagle was convicted of petit larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Alex Campbell, Jr., for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Appellant was convicted of petit larceny under an information charging grand larceny, and now insists the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. There was some evidence before the jury tending to show the guilt of the defendant, and, under those circumstances, we will not disturb the verdict.

Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

MONTGOMERY v. PACIFIC COAST LAND BUREAU. (No. 14,454.)

TERMS OF AUCTION SALE—ANNOUNCEMENT IN CATALOGUE—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RATIFICATION OF AGENCY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—PUBLIC LANDS—SALE OF SOLDIER'S HOMESTEAD BEFORE PATENT—LIABILITIES OF VENDEE—ADVICE OF ATTORNEY.

1. The terms of a public auction sale of land were announced in advance in a printed catalogue, in which a number of different tracts belonging to different owners was described, and at the end of each description were stated the terms of sale. At the end of the catalogue, after all the descriptions, was the following: "Title perfect. Instrument of sale at purchaser's expense. Ten days allowed for search of title. A deposit of ten per centum will be required on the fall of the hammer," etc. Held, that the portion of the catalogue quoted applied generally to each separate tract described therein.

2. Where defendant, assuming to act as plaintiff's agent to sell land, receives from an intending purchaser a portion of the purchase price, and plaintiff tenders a conveyance to such purchaser, and notifies defendant in writing not to return the money so received, it is a ratification of defendant's agency.

3. The fact that defendant assumed to be plaintiff's agent is, as against defendant, prima facie evidence that he had written authority so to act.

4. Where a tract of land was patented by the United States as an additional soldier's homestead, and the entry was made in the name of the soldier by his attorney in fact, acting under an irrevocable power dated two years before the entry, to which was added a relinquishment of dower by the soldier's wife, and after the entry and its approval, but before patent, the land was conveyed in the soldier's name to plaintiff's grantor, plaintiff's title is good at law.

5. Such conveyance was not such an assignment of the soldier's homestead right before entry in violation of the homestead act as to render the title liable to be annulled at the suit of the United States.

6. Where an intending purchaser of land pays part of the price, which is to be returned to him if the title is found to be imperfect, while, if it is perfect, he is to complete the purchase, the fact that he is advised by an attorney that the title is imperfect, and acts thereon in good faith, does not exempt him from damages for the breach of his contract if the title is in fact perfect.

7. Where such portion of the purchase price is paid to an agent of the owner of the land, and the agent, on the representations of the intending purchaser that the owner's title is not perfect, returns it, and the title is afterwards shown to be perfect, the agent is liable to his principal for the money so paid to him.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by Z. Montgomery against the Pacific Coast Land Bureau to recover money alleged to have been paid, received by defendant to plaintiff's use. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich and Z. Montgomery, for appellant.

Wellborn, Parker & Stevens, for respondent.

In support of his position that, where a person agrees to complete a purchase of land if the title thereto be perfect, the fact that he was advised by an attorney that the title was imperfect would justify his refusal to perform the contract, respondent cited the following: Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 180, 18 Pac. Rep. 262; Phillips v. Day, 82 Cal. 24, 22 Pac. Rep. 976; Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 627, 23 Pac. Rep. 1111; Hellreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 59.

BEATTY, C. J. In April, 1886, the defendant, a California corporation, was engaged at the city of San Diego in the business of selling lands upon commission. On the 24th of that month it sold at public auction to A. and S. Hart a tract of land belonging to the plaintiff for $9,000. The terms of sale were announced and advertised in advance by means of a printed catalogue, in which a number of different tracts belonging to different owners was described. At the end of each description were stated the terms upon which it would be sold, i. e. the portion of the price to be paid in cash, time of payment of balance, and rate of interest on deferred payments. The terms of sale of plaintiff's land, so announced, were as follows: "Terms, one-half cash; balance in one to three years, and interest at ten per cent." After the description of other tracts, to be sold on different terms as to credits, and at the end of the catalogue, was the following: "Title perfect. Instruments of sale at purchaser's expense. Ten days allowed for search of title. A deposit of ten per centum will be required on the fall of the hammer; balance of cash payment on delivery of deed; and, if not so paid, (unless for defect of title,) then said ten per centum to be forfeited, and the sale to be void. For maps, catalogues, and further particulars, apply to Pacific Coast Land Bureau, branch office, 6th street San Diego. R. J. PENNELL, Auctioneer." We remark, in passing, with respect to a question that seems to be raised in the argument, that there is, in our opinion, no doubt that this last quoted portion of the catalogue applies generally to each separate tract described therein, and not merely to that one which immediately precedes it. We hold, in other words, that it states in part the terms of sale of plaintiff's tract of land as well as of others described in the catalogue. Such, indeed, seems to have been the construction acted upon by all the parties to the transaction, for immediately ensuing the sale the Harts paid to defendant the sum of $900,—10 per cent. of the purchase price,—and they at the same time placed in the hands of their legal advisers an abstract of plaintiff's title to the land, for the purpose of obtaining their opinion as to its validity. Being advised that the title was defective, they, or their attorneys, stated their objections to representatives of the plaintiff, who insisted, notwithstanding such objections, that his title was perfect, and demanded the completion of the sale. In this connection he tendered a deed of conveyance to the purchasers, to the sufficiency of which they made no objection, but which they declined to accept solely upon the ground that the title of plaintiff was not perfect. Upon the same ground they demanded of the defendant the return of the $900, deposited at the time their bid was accepted. In compliance with this demand, the defendant, after being notified by plaintiff not to do so, returned said $900 to the Harts, and the plaintiff thereupon commenced this action to recover the same as money had and received to his use. The cause was tried without a jury. The findings and judgment of the superior court were in favor of defendant, and plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

The complaint alleges in general terms the receipt by defendant of $900 to the use of plaintiff, and the answer and finding of the court negative this allegation. The findings, therefore, support the judgment. But the appellant contends that the refusal of a new trial was erroneous, because the superior court erred in admitting evidence over his objections, and because the evidence properly admissible does not sustain the findings. There is included in the bill of exceptions an opinion of the superior judge, delivered prior to the filing of his findings of fact and conclusions of law, which shows very clearly that the principal ground of his decision was that plaintiff's title, although it may be good, was not so free from doubt as to enable him to enforce its acceptance by the purchasers of the land. He also holds, apparently, that, according to the evidence, the $900 in controversy was not received by defendant for plaintiff's use, but solely for the use and benefit of the defendant itself. In addition to these grounds, upon which the decision of the superior court is rested in the opinion referred to, the respondent contends that the order denying a new trial must be affirmed, for the reason, if for no other, that there was no evidence that plaintiff ever gave the defendant written authority to sell his lands, and, consequently, that it does not appear that defendant was the plaintiff's agent in the sale of said land, or that the 10 per cent. of the purchase price was received for his use or benefit. It is true that the record contains no direct evidence of an antecedent written authorization to defendant to make the sale, and we concede that without such antecedent written authority, or a subsequent ratification by plaintiff of the sale made in his name before the return of the money to the purchasers, he could not have claimed it of the defendant. But here there is evidence of such ratification. Before the money had been returned, (June 21, 1886,) the plaintiff had tendered a conveyance (May 28, 1886) to the purchasers, and had notified the defendant in writing not to return the money. Aside from this, we think that, as against one who assumes to be the agent of another, that fact is sufficient, prima facie, to justify the inference that he was duly authorized to do what he claimed the authority to do, and that, where the question of agency in fact becomes material, the burden is upon him to rebut the presumption arising from his claim of authority. In other words, we hold that where one sells land of another, claiming authority to do so, this is, as against him, at least prima facie evidence of written authority.

As to the grounds upon which the superior court expressly rested its decision, we think that neither is sufficient to sustain it. The evidence shows that the title of the plaintiff to the land in controversy was in fact perfect, and that this appeared from the abstract and public records of San Diego county at the time of the sale. The land—a tract of 80 acres—had been patented by the United States as an additional soldier's homestead. The entry was made in the name of the soldier,—Cook,—by his attorney in fact, acting under an irrevocable power dated two years before the entry, to which was added a relinquishment of dower by Cook's wife. After the entry and its approval, but before patent, the land was conveyed in the name of Cook to plaintiff's grantor. It was admitted that the legal title was in the plaintiff, but in the opinion of the lawyers who advised the Harts the terms of the power under which the land had been entered and conveyed, and the circumstances of the transaction, were such as clearly to evince, and to put any purchaser upon notice, that Cook had virtually and in effect made an assignment of his homestead right before the entry, contrary to the terms, or at least to the clear policy, of the law of the United States; that the patent had therefore been fraudulently obtained, and could at any time be annulled at the suit of the United States. This opinion, we think, was erroneous. In the case of Rose v. Lumber Co., 73 Cal. 385, 15 Pac. Rep. 19, this court decided that a patent of the United States, issued under similar circumstances, was not void, and placed its decision upon the ground that there had been no violation of the terms or the spirit of the law. Upon the same ground it must be held that plaintiff's title is not only good at law, but that it is secure against a suit in equity to annul the patent.

But the superior court, irrespective o the question of the actual validity of the title, which it held not to be necessaril involved, decided that the purchaser were justified in refusing the conveyanc and in demanding back their deposit, and, therefore, that defendant was bound t restore it, because of the opinion of counsel of admitted standing, ability, and reputation that the title was not safe. We think, however, that upon the authority of Winter v. Stock, 29 Cal. 413, it must be held otherwise. A purchaser of real property does well to obtain professional advice as to the validity of the title, but he must take the risk of the soundness of the advice upon which he acts. It may turn out to be erroneous, and, if so, the fact that it was given and acted upon in good faith will not exempt him from damages for the breach of his contract. None of the later cases cited by respondent are in conflict with this view. We have not been cited to any decision, and we know of none, which holds that where the facts are all admitted and appear of record, an erroneous opinion that a title is invalid will justify a purchaser in receding from his bargain. From this view of the law it follows as a necessary consequence that, when the plaintiff's title was shown to be perfect, and he tendered a sufficient conveyance, he became entitled to demand and receive from the purchasers the cash payment provided for in the terms of sale, and, as a part thereof, the $900 in the hands of defendant, less its proper charges and commissions.

It may be conceded that as to this deposit the defendant, pending the examination of the title, was a stakeholder for the parties and for its own protection. But when the title was shown to be perfect the deposit then became, according to the terms of sale, a portion of the cash payment, and the property of the plaintiff, less the charges and commissions of the defendant. Thereafter the defendant could not return it to the purchaser except at its own risk. Having done so, and having made a mistake, it cannot escape its just liability to the plaintiff.

We think the court erred in admitting in evidence the opinions of the attorneys who pronounced plaintiff's title unsafe, and in admitting evidence as to the meaning of the printed terms of the sale. We also think that on the evidence the findings and judgment should have been for the plaintiff. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

People v. Ng Sam Chung et al. (No. 20,876.)

Criminal Law—Former Jeopardy.

Defendants have been placed in "jeopardy" where they have been tried for petit larceny, but before verdict the court, believing they have been guilty of a greater offense, which includes the crime charged, dismisses the case; and they cannot be rearrested and tried for the same or a higher offense, involving the same facts.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

On the trial in the police court of Ng Sam Chung and Woo Sing for the offense of petit larceny the evidence showed that the offense charged was grand larceny, and the court dismissed the case. Thereafter they were charged in the superior court, and convicted of grand larceny, and appeal. Reversed.

Robert Ferral and F. E. Stranahan, for appellants. Wm. S. Barnes and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. The defendants were prosecuted in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco for the offense of petit larceny, in stealing one gold bracelet of the value of $27, the property of Jeong Koong. A jury trial was waived; and after the evidence was concluded, upon the suggestion of the prosecuting attorney that the property was taken from the person of said Koong, and that therefore the offense was grand larceny, the court ordered the action dismissed. The defendants were thereafter placed upon trial in the superior court upon a charge of grand larceny, upon an information alleging the same facts set out in the complaint in the police court, and the further fact that the property was taken from the person of said Jeong Koong. In addition to their plea of not guilty, they plead that they had been once in jeopardy, and the determination of that question is the only matter involved upon this appeal.

The solution of the question as to whether a defendant has been placed in jeopardy in many cases is a matter of considerable difficulty, especially in the light of the variance existing in the decisions of the courts upon the subject. Bishop, in his work on Criminal Law, (section 1027,) states the general rule to be: "When the indictment is sufficient and the proceedings are regular, before a tribunal having jurisdiction, down to the time when the jeopardy attaches, there can be no second jeopardy allowed in favor of the state on account of any lapse or error at a later stage." In 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Crim. Cas. p. 537, the correct rule for the determination of the question as to the existence of a prior jeopardy for the same offense is thus stated: "A former conviction or acquittal of a minor offense is a bar to a prosecution for the same act, charged as a higher crime, whenever the defendant, on trial of the latter, might be legally convicted of the former, had there been no other prosecution." The author illustrates by saying: "If, therefore, a person has been indicted and convicted of manslaughter, he cannot be again prosecuted for the same homicide, charged as a murder; for, though these crimes are not exactly the same, yet, as the person, when on trial for murder, might, under the rules of law, have been convicted of manslaughter, if the evidence failed to sustain the more serious offense, it would follow that if he had been already convicted of manslaughter, in a prior indictment for that crime alone, he might on the trial for murder be convicted of the same identical crime, and thus be punished twice." The correctness of the converse of the foregoing rule is even more manifest, viz., a conviction or acquittal of a higher offense is a conviction or acquittal of all lesser offenses necessarily included therein. Bish. Crim. Law, § 1057, fully indorses the principle laid down in the authority just quoted. The author says: "Where the conviction or acquittal is upon an indictment covering no more than one of the smaller crimes included within a larger, will it bar fresh proceedings for the larger? If it will not, then the prosecutor may begin with the smallest, and obtain successive convictions, ending with the largest, while, if he had begun with the largest, he must there stop,—a conclusion repugnant to good sense." The same principle is declared in Whart. Crim. Law, § 563. In the case of State v. Wiles, 26 Minn. 381, 4 N. W. Rep. 615, we find the facts and the legal principles similar to those involved in this appeal. The defendant was convicted of a misdemeanor by a justice of the peace, in stealing a hat of the value of four dollars. Subsequently, he was prosecuted for a felony in stealing the hat from a shop. The court held that the first conviction was a bar to the second prosecution; petit larceny being necessarily included in the second offense charged. In this case the defendants are charged with grand larceny, in stealing a bracelet of the value of $27 from the person of one Koong. This offense as necessarily includes petit larceny as the stealing of a hat of the value of four dollars from a shop includes petit larceny, or as the offense of an assault with a deadly weapon includes a simple assault. Aside from the question of jeopardy, there can be no doubt that, under the information filed against the defendants in this case, they could have been convicted of petit larceny, if the evidence at the trial had failed to show that the property was taken from the person of said Koong. It follows that, if defendants were placed in jeopardy by reason of the proceedings in the police court, their trial in the superior court was a second jeopardy, and they are entitled to their discharge. It appears the defendants were tried upon a charge of petit larceny by a court of competent jurisdiction, and upon the conclusion of the evidence the court, believing that another offense had been committed, refused to render a judgment, but dismissed the action of its own motion. If the evidence in the case proved a petit larceny, the court should have found the defendants guilty; if the proof was lacking to establish such offense, it should have found the defendants not guilty. Jeopardy had attached to them long before the court dismissed the action; and it could not deprive them of any benefit to be derived from that jeopardy by refusing to allow the case to go to judgment, even though it was aware that by reason of an error of law committed during the progress of the trial, or by reason of insufficiency of the evidence to support the charge, a mistrial would be the necessary result. In this case, if the police court had rendered a judgment of conviction, it would not have been void, but voidable only. Under a voidable judgment of conviction a defendant is not only in jeopardy, but in jail; and such a judgment accomplishes all the purposes contemplated by any judgment, until successfully attacked. There is no good reason to be urged that after these proceedings in the police court the defendants could have been again arrested and tried upon the charge of petit larceny upon the same facts. Such a prosecution could have been had unless the previous proceeding caused jeopardy to attach. It is thus apparent that jeopardy did attach; and, under the standard authorities which we have cited, it was a fatal bar to the prosecution in the superior court. The case of People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal. 331, is directly in point upon many of the matters herein discussed. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to discharge the defendants and dismiss the proceedings.

TREGEA v. OWENS, Collector. (No. 14,264.)

IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ASSESSMENTS—SUBMISSION TO ELECTORS.

1. Under St. 1887, p. 29, § 37, authorizing the board of directors of irrigation districts to provide for the payment of certain enumerated expenses by a levy of assessments, and giving the board, for the purposes of the levy, the powers possessed by boards of supervisors; and section 41, providing for the submission to the electors of the question whether a special assessment shall be levied for the purpose of raising money to be applied to any of the purposes provided in the act; and St. 1883, p. 304, § 25, subd. 13, giving boards of supervisors power to levy taxes on the property of any district for road purposes, etc., provided that no tax should be levied on a district until the proposition to levy the same had been submitted to the electors of the district, —an assessment cannot be levied by the directors without a previous authorization, by a vote of the electors of the district.

2. The provision that the directors may call an election for the purpose of submitting such question, "when in their judgment it may be advisable," merely means that if, in their judgment, an assessment is advisable, they shall call an election.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Action by one Tregea against one Owens, collector of the Modesto irrigation district, to recover an assessment paid under protest. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Schell & Eastin and Bond & Fishback, for appellant. C. C. Wright, C. A. Stonesifer, and A. L. Rhodes, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The directors of the Modesto irrigation district levied an assessment September 19, 1888, of 33⅓ cents upon each hundred dollars in valuation of the real property within said district, "for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the organization of said district, and payment of the salaries of officers and employes of said district for the year 1888." Under this assessment the defendant, as collector of said district, proceeded to collect the same, and for that purpose was about to sell certain property belonging to the plaintiff, when the plaintiff, for the purpose of preventing the property from being sold, paid to him under protest the sum of $63.16, and thereafter brought this action to recover the amount so paid, upon the ground that the assessment was illegal, and that the money was paid by him under duress. The act (St. 1887, p. 29) under which these proceedings were taken provides for raising money from tolls and charges, and also by assessments upon the property within the district. As the tolls and charges are to be collected from the use of the canal, it is obvious that until the canal has been constructed the only mode by which the directors can raise money for any purpose, except from the sale of bonds, is by means of assessment. This assessment, although referable to the power of taxation, is distinct from a tax, and is not subject to the contitutional provisions respecting taxation, but may be levied upon all real property within the district, without deducting from the value of such property the amount of any mortgages existing thereon. In re Bonds Madera Irrigation Dist., (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 272. Section 37 of the act referred to declares "that, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the organization of the district, and of the care, operation, management, repair, and improvement of such portions of said canal and works as are completed and in use, including salaries of officers and employes, the board * * * may provide for the payment of said expenditures by a levy of assessments therefor, * * * and the board shall have the same powers and functions, for the purposes of said levy, as are now possessed by boards of supervisors in this state." We have not been referred to any statute which confers upon the boards of supervisors the power to levy an assessment, as distinct from a tax; but section 25, subd. 13, of the county government act, (St. 1883, p. 304,) defines the powers of boards of supervisors in the matter of levying taxes, and gives them power "to levy taxes upon the taxable property of their respective counties for all county purposes, and also upon the taxable property of any district for the construction and repair of roads and highways and other purposes: provided, that no tax shall be levied upon any district until the proposition to levy the same has been submitted to the qualified electors of such district, and received a majority of all the legal votes cast upon such proposition." It is thus seen that boards of supervisors are not authorized to levy a tax upon any district for district purposes without a previous approval thereof by the voters of that district, at an election held for that purpose.

The Wright act has been framed upon the theory that the electors of an irrigation district shall themselves determine the amount which they will pay for the expenses of the local improvement, whether by the issuance of bonds, for the payment of which an annual assessment is to be levied, (sections 15–17,) or by a contribution of money to be paid by a single assessment, (section 41;) and this theory is further shown by the provisions of section 37, which limit the power of the directors in levying an assessment to such as are possessed by boards of supervisors in levying a tax upon a district within their county. Section 41 provides for submitting to the qualified electors of the district the question whether a "special assessment" shall be levied for the purpose of raising money "to be applied to any of the purposes provided in the act." If the directors desire to raise money for the purpose specified in section 37 by "levy of assessments therefor," rather than from tolls and charges, such assessments are the "special assessments" referred to in section 41, and must be previously authorized by a vote of the electors within the district. The provision that the directors may call an election for the purpose of submitting such question, "when in their judgment it may be advisable," does not mean that they may levy an assessment according to their will, and submit the question of such levy only when in their judgment it may be advisable; but it means that, when in their judgment it may be advisable to levy an assessment, they shall call an election for the purpose of submitting to the electors within the district the question whether the assessment shall be levied. The directors are the governing body of the district, and the body by which the assessment is to be levied. They are also to determine, in the first place, whether it is advisable to levy an assessment for any of the purposes provided in the act, and also the amount of such assessment; but before they can levy it they must obtain the consent of the electors of the district, as provided in section 41. If the directors have the power to levy an assessment, irrespective of the will of the electors, the provisions of section 41 for an election to determine such question, which require that "the notice must specify the amount of money proposed to be raised, and the purpose for which it is intended to be used," would be meaningless, for the directors could levy the assessment, even if the vote of the district was adverse thereto. This section is intended to supplement the provisions of section 37, which limit the powers of the directors in making the levy to such as are possessed by boards of supervisors, by providing a mode in which the will of the electors of the district, required under subdivision 13 of section 25 of the county government act, may be ascertained for the purpose of guiding the action of the directors of the irrigation district.

In the complaint herein the plaintiff alleged "that said levy of assessment was made by said board of directors without calling a special election, or submitting to the qualified electors of the district the question whether or not a special assessment should be levied for the purpose of raising said sum of money, or any other sum; that no election was held in said district authorizing said directors to make said levy of assessment." Upon the motion of the defendant the court below struck this averment from the complaint, and, upon the plaintiff's offering to prove the facts therein alleged, excluded the evidence. Inasmuch as it was essential to the validity of the assessment that an election therefor should have been held, it was proper for the plaintiff, in order to establish the illegality of the assessment, to allege and show that it was made without such election, and the action of the court in striking the averment from his complaint was error, and for this error the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

A merely technical error, which might have been corrected on application to the court below, will not work a reversal of a judgment, where no such application was made.

In bank.

On rehearing. For former report, see 29 Pac. Rep. 219.

PER CURIAM. The point urged in support of the petition for a rehearing in this case was not overlooked in deciding the appeal. If the fact that the amended complaint was served on the defendants, and not on their attorney, was in any degree prejudicial to them, they should have sought relief by motion in the superior court before appealing from the judgment. We will not reverse a judgment for a merely technical error, which could be corrected in the superior court, when no such application has been made.

INJURIES TO TRAINMAN—DEFECTIVE COUPLINGS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for injuries causing the death of a brakeman while attempting to couple cars, it was alleged that the injuries were caused by the negligence of defendant railroad company in using a "Miller hook" coupling in connection with a "Potter drawhead coupling," either of which was safe when used in connection with one of its own kind, but dangerous when used with one of the other kind. It appeared that defendant knew of the dangerous nature of the couplings. Held, that the question of contributory negligence was properly submitted to the jury.

2. An instruction that though decedent was engaged in a dangerous business, requiring constant and watchful care on his part, and that he should act with rapidity and promptness, still, if he did not always bear this in mind, and act upon it, and was thereby injured, he could recover, appears to be based upon the doctrine of emergency or sudden danger, of which there was no evidence, and is erroneous; and an injury so received would be the direct result of contributory negligence on his part.

3. The fact that this character of coupling was in general use among railroad companies only tends to show ordinary care in its selection, and is not conclusive evidence that defendant was not negligent.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by Louisa V. Martin against the California Central Railway Company to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband by defendant's negligence. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Elmer E. Rowell and A. Brunson, for appellant. Waters & Gird, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action arose out of injuries resulting in the death of Arthur A. Martin, husband of respondent, who at the time of his death was a brakeman in the employ of appellant. While attempting to couple a caboose car and a freight car, the cars came together, and he was instantly killed. The cause of action is based upon the theory that appellant did not use ordinary care in the selection of the couplings for the cars as operated, and that said Martin met his death by reason of such fact. The special negligence alleged against appellant consisted in the use of a "Miller hook coupling" upon the caboose car, in connection with a "Potter draw-head coupling" upon the freight car; that while each of the couplings, when used in connection with one of its own kind, was practically safe and entirely proper, yet when used in connection with one of the other character the act of coupling cars became so dangerous that it indicated a lack of ordinary care in the selection of the apparatus, and the employer should be held responsible for all injuries resulting therefrom to the employe. Appellant denies the unfitness of the machinery; alleges that deceased knew the character of it, and assumed the risk, and also that he was guilty of contributory negligence; and in this connection appellant insists that the following instructions, given by the court to the jury, were erroneous: "(1) The jury are instructed that in this case it is claimed by the defendant that deceased knew the nature, kind, and character of the couplings used on the caboose car mentioned in the complaint, and that, having such knowledge, he should have so acted as to have avoided injury by said coupling appliances; and, failing to do so, he was guilty of contributory negligence. The question of neglignce is for the jury to decide, under all the evidence in the case, even if it appears that said deceased Martin knew the character, kind, and dangerous nature of the said coupling. While it is a circumstance to be taken into consideration by you, it is not necessarily a decisive one. (2) If the service to be performed by said Martin in making said coupling was of a character to require that his exclusive attention should be fixed upon it, and that he should act with rapidity and promptness, the law does not require that he should always bear in mind the nature, kind, and dangerous character of said coupling appliances, or be prepared at all times to avoid it. Taking all the facts into account, it is for you to determine whether said Martin was guilty of such negligence as contributed directly to his death. If you find he was not guilty of such negligence, and that the accident was caused by the neglect of the defendant, then your verdict should be for plaintiff."

Appellant, in effect, contends that knowledge upon the part of Martin of the character of the coupling, and the danger attendant upon the use of it, of itself, will defeat a recovery by plaintiff, notwithstanding appellant may have been guilty of the greatest negligence in the selection of the machinery. The principle of law embraced in such contention is entirely too broad in its scope. Shear. & R. Neg. § 215, reads: "Such rulings were unjust, because a servant has the same right that any one else has to complete his contract in reliance upon its original terms. A party to any other contract having mutual obligations is allowed to perform fully his part, notwithstanding the failure of the other party to fulfill a condition precedent, without necessarily waiving his right to insist upon performance of such condition at a later period. * * * The real question to be determined in such case is whether, under all the circumstances, the master had a right to believe, and did believe, that the servant intended to waive his objection to the unfitness of his fellow servant, or the defect in the materials provided for the work, and to accept an implied contract exempting his master from liability. This is a question of fact, not of law, and it must be left to the jury, at least if not entirely free from doubt." In Hawley v. Railway Co., 82 N. Y. 373, where the plaintiff, an engineer, was injured by reason of a defective roadbed, knowing at the time its dangerous condition, the court said: "We think, under all the circumstances, and upon all the evidence given on both sides, that it was a question for the jury to determine, whether the plaintiff acted with reasonable prudence and discretion in venturing to run his engine over the road. * * * It would be a very unjust rule which would allow a master to shield himself from responsibility for the consequences of his own negligence by alleging those acts, not inevitably or imminently dangerous, to have been negligent, which his servant performed by his express orders." These views are fully supported in McMahon v. Iron-Ore Co., 24 Hun, 48. In that case the court said: "It would seem to be unreasonable that one who has undertaken a service, which in itself has some elements of danger, whenever he shall see that the danger has been increased through some negligence of his employer, must either stop his employment or be deemed to have accepted the increased risk. We do not think that this is the rule. And it seems to us that the plaintiff had a right to go to the jury on the question whether he was, under the circumstances, justified in going on with his work." The foregoing cases, and many others tending to support this principle, are cited and approved in Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 430, 21 Pac. Rep. 114. Conceding that the deceased knew the character and dangerous nature of the couplings used upon these cars, we think, under the evidence disclosed by the record, and in view of the authorities cited, the question of his negligence was still an open one, and should have been presented to the jury for their consideration. It follows that respondent's instruction to this effect is correct, and that appellant's instructions to the contrary are not the better law.

The second instruction given to the jury was clearly erroneous, and counsel for respondent has presented no authority to support it. It appears to be based upon the doctrine of emergency or sudden danger, but there is nothing in the facts of this case to demand the application of that rule. There was no sudden danger, no emergency. The danger that surrounded Martin at the time of his death was the danger incident to the act of coupling the cars,—a danger which was ever present when he was engaged in the performance of that duty. In effect the instruction told the jury that notwithstanding the deceased was engaged in a dangerous business, requiring constant and watchful care upon his part to save himself from injury, still, if he did not always bear these things in mind, and act upon them, and was thereby injured, he could recover. An injury received under such circumstances would be the direct result of contributory negligence upon the part of the party injured, and would defeat a recovery.

The instruction asked by appellant, that if this character of coupling was in general use among railroad companies, then it was not negligence upon the part of appellant to use it, was properly refused. Such general use was evidence tending to show ordinary care in the selection of the coupling, but not conclusive evidence. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1892.)

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Louis Forrestier and Person Francisco were convicted of larceny, and appeal. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. A. Spinetti, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

Per Curiam. Appellants were convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeal from the judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. For a reversal of the judgment, various rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence are relied upon. We have carefully examined the specifications of error presented, and find nothing to justify a new trial. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

DEAR v. WEINEKE. (No. 14,426.)

Assessment Book—Sufficiency of Entry.

Under Pol. Code, § 3650, prescribing the manner in which property must be listed for assessment in the assessor's book, but providing that a failure to enumerate personal property in detail should not invalidate the assessment, an entry by the assessor in his book, as follows, "Value of personal property, exclusive of money and solvent credits, $15,725," is a sufficient form of assessment. San Francisco v. Pennie, 29 Pac. Rep. 66, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by P. Dear against H. W. Weineke. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Deakin & Story, for appellant. Johnstone Jones, Dist. Atty., and J. L. Copeland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to recover certain taxes claimed to have been paid under duress, and which it is declared by the appellant were not collectible by reason of the assessment being invalid. The individual whose personal property was assessed gave a list of it in detail, as he states in his complaint, to the assessor, but that official did not list the property in detail, but made this entry in the assessment book: "Value of personal property, exclusive of money and solvent credits, $15,725." The complaint is demurred to as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff not desiring to amend his complaint, judgment passed for the defendant, from which the present appeal is prosecuted. The only question involved is whether the form of the assessment set out in the assessor's book was sufficient, under section[1] 3650 of the Political Code, and that it was sufficient is in effect decided in San Francisco v. Pennie, (No. 12,923,) 29 Pac. Rep. 66, and upon the authority of that case the judgment must be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FLEMING. (No. 20,886.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT RAPE—INTENT—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, on a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, it appears that defendant, in his endeavors to have sexual intercourse, committed an assault or battery, but the female testifies that when she was exhausted, and her opposition and refusals had ceased, he voluntarily left her bed, and abandoned his project, the evidence is insufficient to show an intent to have carnal knowledge by means of force sufficient to overcome the female's resistance, and a judgment of conviction will be reversed; Pen. Code, § 261, defining "rape" as "an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, * * * where she resists, but her resistance is overcome by force or violence."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Samuel J. Fleming was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals. Reversed.

T. J. Carran and C. W. Pendleton, for appellant. James McLachlan and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The defendant was convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape, and now appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The prosecuting witness was a servant girl of the age of 24 years, doing the housework for defendant and his family. The errors of law relied upon by counsel for a reversal of the judgment are not well taken, and the only question remaining is whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury. The events which occurred at the time the alleged assault was committed, as depicted by the prosecuting witness and the defendant, are directly contradictory in all essentials; and under those circumstances the finding of the jury, to the extent that it involved the veracity of these two parties, will not be disturbed. The testimony, as disclosed by the record, upon all salient matters pertaining to the commission of the offense, consists of the evidence of the prosecuting witness alone; still, if her evidence was sufficient to prove the crime, and the jury gave credence to it, the verdict should be upheld. People v. Mayes, 66 Cal. 597, 6 Pac. Rep. 691. After a careful examination of the evidence of the prosecuting witness, conceding it to be true in all particulars, we conclude that it does not establish a prima facie case of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. Section 261 of the Penal Code reads: "Rape is an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, under either of the following circumstances: * * * (3) Where she resists, but her resistance is overcome by force or violence." In Russell on Crimes, (volume 1, p. 692,) the author quotes with approval the principle laid down in Rex v. Lloyd, 7 Car. & P. 318, wherein it was held: "In order to find the prisoner guilty of an assault to commit a rape, you [the jury] must be satisfied that the prisoner, when he had hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part." In the case of State v. Hagerman, 47 Iowa, 152, the court said: "The assault must have been made with intent to commit a rape, notwithstanding all possible resistance that could be made. The intent must have been to perpetrate the crime at all events, regardless of what the prosecutrix might or could do to prevent it." This principle of law is supported by the great weight of authority, and cannot be questioned. It would subserve no good purpose here to recite the evidence of the prosecutrix as to the res gestæ of the accusation. By her testimony it is apparent that the defendant desired to have sexual intercourse with her, and that he committed either an assault or a battery upon her, of a technical character at least, while engaged in his solicitations and blandishments; but these things may all be true, and be entirely foreign to any intention on his part to commit the crime of rape by the use of force to the extent of overcoming all resistance she might offer. In the case of Com. v. Merrill, 14 Gray, 415, the facts were very similar to the facts adduced by this record, and the court reversed the judgment upon the weakness of the evidence, and ordered a new trial. In that case the court said: "We think it entirely clear that the evidence at the trial of this case fell far short of proving any intent by the prisoner to have carnal knowledge of the prosecutrix by force and against her will. There was ample proof of gross indecency and lewdness, and of an attempt, by long-continued and urgent solicitations and inducements, to lead the prosecutrix to consent to the wish of the prisoner to have sexual intercourse with her. These facts would have been sufficient to warrant a jury in finding the prisoner guilty of an assault. * * * It is therefore necessary that the acts and conduct of the prisoner should be shown to be such that there can be no reasonable doubt as to the criminal intent. If the acts and conduct are equivocal or equally consistent with the absence of the felonious intent charged in the indictment, then it is clear that they are insufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty." As was said in Pefferling v. State, 40 Tex. 493: "There is a manifest distinction between an assault to commit a rape and an assault with intent to have an improper connection. Any such violent or indecent familiarity with the person of a female against her will, where the latter is the extent of the purpose and intent of the aggressor, is an aggravated assault, and should be punished as such." This principle was also approved in the late case of People v. Manchego, 80 Cal. 306, 22 Pac. Rep. 223. Upon an examination of the record in the case of People v. Brown, 47 Cal. 447, we find more evidence to support the verdict than in the present case, yet the court said: "The evidence falls wholly short of establishing the crime charged upon the defendant."

[1] Which prescribes the manner in which property must be listed for assessment in the assessor's book, but providing that failure to enumerate in detail the personal property would not invalidate the assessment.

In the light of the evidence before us, we think the conduct of the defendant did not indicate that settled purpose to use whatever force was necessary upon the prosecutrix to accomplish the consummation of his desires; and that is the test the law demands in order that his guilt should be adjudged. It can hardly be said that the defendant used force to any degree, and, from all the circumstances of the affair, it would appear that physical force was not an element in his mind in attempting to carry out his intentions. There was no duress upon the part of the prosecutrix, no fear of personal violence, for there were no threats of violence. The defendant sought only to accomplish his purpose by promises, persuasions, and arguments. The intent to commit the rape is the vital element in the case. A rape was not accomplished; hence the intent of the defendant must be determined from his acts and conduct. If he had intended to use force in carrying out his purpose, why was it not done? Why was not the crime of rape committed? It is conceded the woman was not possessed of a sufficient power of resistance, if he had used physical force. The law says there is no intent to commit rape unless a defendant is resolved to use all force necessary to carry out his designs. He could have carried out his designs by using force, but at the very moment when his success was assured, when, according to her statement, she was exhausted, and her refusals and opposition to his desires had entirely ceased, at that moment he voluntarily left her bed, and retired to an adjoining room, where he passed the remainder of the night. His departure was no flight, for there was no alarm; there was no danger of discovery; and the conduct of the defendant at this time was entirely inconsistent with that of the would-be ravisher. The acts and conduct of the defendant were not only equivocal and consistent with the absence of a felonious intent to commit a rape, but the evidence preponderates to the effect that the accused depended for success in the accomplishment of his design upon the solicitations and blandishments of the seducer, rather than upon the physical force necessary to constitute the crime here charged. See State v. Canada, 68 Iowa, 397, 27 N. W. Rep. 288; People v. Royal, 53 Cal. 62. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Moulton v. Harris. (No. 14,457.)

Part Performance of Oral Contract for Sale of Land—Materiality of Evidence.

1. Where defendant orally agreed to sell plaintiff land, and plaintiff, by her agents, took possession of the land with defendant's consent, and made valuable improvements thereon, it is sufficient part performance to take the contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds. Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 253, 24 Pac. Rep. 149, followed.

2. Where defendant contended that he did not agree to sell the land, but that his agreement was to sell a band of horses running on the land, to take land of plaintiff at a certain figure, part of which was to be paid in horses, to assume part of a mortgage debt incumbering plaintiff's land, and to give his note for the balance, and the pleadings admitted plaintiff's ownership of the land, the trial court properly excluded evidence that the land which defendant got from plaintiff was not plaintiff's.

3. There was no error prejudicial to defendant in excluding evidence that he had paid part of his note for the balance, where the note was a joint one in favor of plaintiff and another, and it was assigned by plaintiff's copayeee, without her authority, and the evidence showed that plaintiff never knew of such payment.

4. The issue being whether defendant agreed to sell his land, it was error to exclude an instrument signed by plaintiff, in which she agreed that, if the mortgage that defendant had executed in satisfaction of the mortgage on plaintiff's land should exceed a certain sum, she would pay the interest on such excess.

Action by Lina Moulton against E. A. Harris. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. M. Albery and T. J. Hart, for appellant. John T. Harringan, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action was brought to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land. Under the findings, which are, as we think, supported by the evidence, it appears that the plaintiff, the vendee, took possession of the land by her agents, with the consent of the vendor, and made valuable improvement thereon, on the faith of the contract. This is sufficient part performance of the contract (it being oral) to take it out of the operation of the statute of frauds under the rule announced in Calanchini v. Branstetter, 84 Cal. 253, 24 Pac. Rep. 149.

The most strenuous contention of the defendant for the reversal of the order refusing a new trial seems to be as to the rulings of the court upon the admission or rejection of proffered evidence. The contention of the plaintiff is that she traded her tract of land—about 800 acres, in Colusa county—for a band of horses and the land of the defendant in Lassen county; that, putting her land at $16,000, and the defendant's horses at $8,000, the defendant agreed to assume a mortgage on her lands for over $5,000, and make her a title to his land in Lassen, which was valued at $2,675; that, as he could not, on account of certain litigation, give her at that time a perfect title to the land, he agreed to give her a note for the sum last above mentioned, which was not to be paid except in the event the defendant should find it impossible to make title to the Lassen county land to the plaintiff; and she now waives a good title, and asks simply for a conveyance of that land. The contention of the defendant is that he never did agree to sell the land in Lassen, but that the note represented a part of the purchase price which he was to pay for the land of plaintiff. As a part of his evidence he stated that he was to assume the payment of but $3,000 of the mortgage debt on the plaintiff's land, and that he was only to pay interest on that much of it, and that the plaintiff agreed to be responsible for the rest of the sum due on the mortgage, and to pay the interest on it. The evidence of the defendant was intended to show that he did not agree to sell the land, but that his agreement was to sell his band of horses, then running on that land, and to take the plaintiff's land at $16,000, to pay $8,000 in horses, $3,000 of the mortgage debt and interest then incumbering the land of plaintiff, and to give this note for $2,675 for the balance of the purchase price of plaintiff's land. The pleadings admit the ownership of her land by the plaintiff, and there is nothing set up in the answer as to any failure on the part of the plaintiff to perform her contract. The only matter at issue is, did or did not the defendant, at the time the contract was entered into for the purchase or trade for the plaintiff's land, agree to give in part consideration and payment therefor his land in Lassen county? It follows, therefore, that all the evidence offered on the part of the defendant, going to show that the land in Colusa county which he bought from the plaintiff was not hers in fact or equity, as against her father's creditors, was entirely irrelevant and immaterial, and was properly ruled out by the trial court.

It is insisted that the proof offered to show a payment of the note for $2,675 ought to have been admitted to show that the contract was as defendant asserts. But the proof showed that the note was a joint one in favor of the plaintiff and one Meyers, and that she never authorized its assignment by Meyers to any one, and never received a cent upon it, and that Meyers transferred it without any authority from her, or knowledge that he had done so. Besides, the defendant was permitted to say that he paid to the assignee of Meyers $500; and it is plain from the statement as made by defendant that this sum was all he ever claimed to have paid on the note, and that the plaintiff never knew of it, or authorized it. We see no error prejudicial to defendant in this.

The only reversible error which we perceive in the record is the ruling of the court which excluded from its consideration a written agreement, which reads thus: "This agreement made this 26th day of November, 1880, between J. Meyers and Lina Moulton, of the county of Colusa, state of California, the parties of the first part, and E. A. Harris, of said county and state, the party of the second part, witnesseth, that whereas, a certain indenture of mortgage between E. A. Harris of the first part, and the Colusa County Bank of the second part, dated the 26th day of November, A. D. 1880, for the sum of $5,325; now, therefore, it is understood and agreed between the aforesaid parties that the said parties of the first part will pay or cause to be paid to the said party of the second part all the interest on said sum that may accrue on all amounts over and above $3,000. JACOB MEYERS. LINA MOULTON." The defendant, to show that he did not sell his land in Lassen, had testified previously that he was to give his horses at $8,000, to assume $3,000 of the mortgage on plaintiff's land, and give his note for the balance of $16,000. And also, to corroborate this statement, he had shown, in some prior negotiations between himself and one Meyers, acting for the plaintiff, the execution of a written memorandum of agreement setting out these matters. Now, if it could be made to appear that the plaintiff had signed an agreement at the time the transaction between herself and the defendant took place, in which she agreed to pay interest on all over $3,000 of the mortgage that the defendant had just executed in satisfaction of the mortgage which existed on her land, to the Colusa County Bank, it would tend to show, as we think, that he was telling the truth when he said that the horses at $8,000, the assumption of $3,000 of the mortgage debt, and the $2,675 note were in consideration of the sale of plaintiff's land, worth $16,000, and that his land in Lassen was not part of the consideration. He ought, as it seems to us, to have had considered by the court all facts and circumstances which went to throw light on the true nature of the contract he had made, as upon that depended the determination of the issue as to whether he had agreed to make title to his land in Lassen county as part consideration for the land of plaintiff. But upon no other ground could this evidence have been admissible under the pleadings as they stand, and which the court, as we think, properly refused to allow to be amended. For the reasons stated, the order should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed.

KRAUSE v. SPIEGEL. (No. 14,626.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—ARREST FOR SLANDER—FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

1. Defendant charged plaintiff before a magistrate with having committed slander of and concerning defendant, and procured a warrant to issue, whereupon plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned, and on hearing discharged. Held, in an action for malicious prosecution, that plaintiff had no cause of action; defendant's charge before the magistrate not furnishing any ground for the issuance of the warrant of arrest, there having been no imputation of any criminal act therein.

2. But by the issuance of such warrant, and the arrest and imprisonment thereunder of plaintiff, a cause of action for false imprisonment arose in his favor.

Action by E. E. Krause against Tony Spiegel. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Kierce, (Wheaton, Kalloch & Kierce, of counsel,) for appellant. James H. Budd, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that in December, 1887, the defendant appeared before a justice of the peace, and falsely and maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, made a verified complaint, charging plaintiff "with having committed slander of and concerning defendant," and procured the justice to issue a warrant for the arrest of plaintiff upon said charge; that the justice issued the warrant accordingly, and plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned thereunder for six hours, when he was released by the justice upon his own recognizance; that thereafter plaintiff was examined before the justice upon the said charge of slander, and, no one appearing to prosecute, he was acquitted and discharged; that the said charge, and the arrest of plaintiff thereunder, was extensively published by the procurement of defendant, and by reason thereof plaintiff was greatly injured in his business, credit, and reputation; that defendant well knew he had no cause for the arrest of plaintiff, and that he swore to the warrant for the purpose and with the intent of harassing and annoying plaintiff, and that the same did harass and annoy him; and that, by reason of the premises, plaintiff suffered damage in the sum of $10,000, for which he asked judgment. The action was commenced more than a year after the alleged discharge of the plaintiff, and the defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that several causes of action were improperly united; and that each of the causes of action sued upon was barred by the provisions of section 340, subd. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court below ruled that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for malicious prosecution, and that the causes of action stated, so far as they were for false imprisonment and libel, were barred by the provisions of the statute pleaded. The demurrer was accordingly sustained; and, the plaintiff declining to amend, judgment was entered that he take nothing by his action, and that defendant recover his costs. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The only question is, did the complaint state a cause of action for malicious prosecution? The rule is general, and supported by all the decisions and text-books upon the subject, that when one maliciously, and without reasonable or probable cause, institutes or prosecutes, in a court having jurisdiction of the matter, a criminal proceeding against another, the proceeding, when terminated in favor of the accused, furnishes the basis for an action for malicious prosecution. In some of the states it has been held that, if the court had no jurisdiction of the criminal proceeding, still an action for malicious prosecution might be maintained; but in other states a contrary rule has been declared. See 3 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1088; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 338; and cases cited. In some cases it has been held that where one maliciously, and without probable cause, charged another with a crime, for which he was arrested and held to answer or put upon trial, an action for malicious prosecution would lie, though the facts charged did not constitute a crime. A leading case of this class is Dennis v. Ryan, 65 N. Y. 385. There the plaintiff had been indicted, upon the testimony of the defendant, for the crime of forgery, and acquitted upon the ground that the acts complained of did not constitute the crime alleged or any crime. The action was for malicious prosecution in falsely and maliciously charging and causing the plaintiff to be indicted, arrested, and tried for the crime of forgery. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and on appeal the judgment was affirmed by a divided court. So, in several cases, it has been held that an action for malicious prosecution might be maintained, though the information or indictment were defective, and no conviction could be had thereunder; "for in either case, whether the indictment be good or bad, the plaintiff is equally subjected to the disgrace of it, and put to the same expense in defending himself against it." 3 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1090. This case is not like any of those before referred to. Here no criminal prosecution was commenced or prosecuted against the plaintiff. The only charge made before the magistrate was that the plaintiff had slandered the defendant. This was not a charge of a criminal act, and it furnished no ground whatever for the issuance of a warrant of arrest. But when the warrant was issued, and the plaintiff was arrested and imprisoned under it, a cause of action for false imprisonment at once arose in his favor; and, if suit had been brought in time, it could without doubt have been maintained. There is, however, a distinction between an action for false imprisonment and an action for malicious prosecution. Under the old practice the former was called an "action of trespass," and the latter an "action on the case;" and under our statute the former is barred in one year, (section 340, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc.,) and the latter in two years, (McCusker v. Walker, 77 Cal. 212, 19 Pac. Rep. 383.) No case has been called to our attention in which it was held that an action for malicious prosecution could be maintained upon facts similar to those presented here, and there are several cases holding to the contrary. In Hahn v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 286, it is said: "In Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 164, Lord Eldon moved that if a party makes a complaint before a justice, which the justice conceives to amount to a felony, and issues his warrant against the party complained against, and the facts do not amount to felony, no action for malicious prosecution will lie against the party who made the complaint." And it is further said: "We are unable to find any English case in which Leigh v. Webb, supra, has been overruled, or the soundness of the views expressed by Lord Eldon even questioned." In McNeely v. Driskill, 2 Blackf. 259, it appeared that Driskill had been arrested on a warrant issued by a justice of the peace on an affidavit of McNeely, which did not authorize the justice to issue it, and had been discharged. Thereupon, Driskill brought an action against McNeely for wrongfully and maliciously prosecuting him on a charge of larceny, and obtained judgment. On appeal the court said: "The affidavit shows a state of facts on which an action of trover might have been maintained, but it contains no charge of larceny against any person. The appellant had lost his property, and wished to recover it. He states that fact to a justice of the peace. The justice forms his judgment upon the facts stated. He issues his mandate to an officer to search for the property, and to bring the person in whose possession it may be found before himself or some other justice of the peace, etc. This was an error, but it is the error of the justice, and not of the appellant; and if a justice of the peace, by mistake of judgment, conceives an act to be felony which is not felony, and in consequence of that mistake causes an innocent person to be arrested and imprisoned, the law will not hold the person who made the complaint responsible, in this form of action, for the consequences of such errors." In Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf. 216, the court said: "An action for a malicious prosecution can only be supported for the malicious prosecution of some legal proceeding before some judicial officer or tribunal. If the proceedings complained of are extrajudicial the remedy is trespass, and not an action on the case for a malicious prosecution." In Bennett v. Black, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 494, it was said: "The court are of opinion that if a justice of the peace, or any other judicial officer to whom application may be made for a warrant for the apprehension of offenders against the criminal law of the land, was by mistake of judgment to conceive that to be felony which from the facts sworn to did not amount to that offense, and should the party complained against be committed to jail, it would not subject the party complaining to an action of this sort, [malicious prosecution.] If it could, it would subject every prosecutor to an action for the mistakes of the criminal judge, which is too unreasonable to be admitted." In Newman v. Davis, 58 Iowa, 447, 10 N. W. Rep. 852, the action was for malicious prosecution, and in the complaint it was alleged that the defendant, before a magistrate, "falsely, maliciously, and with intent to injure, harass, and oppress said plaintiff, made information on oath, accusing said plaintiff of using abusive language, such as, 'You are a liar and thief,' and then and there maliciously, and with intent to injure, harass, and oppress said plaintiff, procured a warrant to be issued by said magistrate, and placed in the hands" of a constable, and that plaintiff was arrested under the warrant and afterwards discharged. It was held on appeal that "where the complaint did not charge the commission of any specific offense, and the facts stated did not impute any crime, but the justice of the peace, by mistake of judgment, and thinking a crime was charged, caused the arrest of the party, the law will not hold the person who made the complaint responsible, in an action for malicious prosecution, for the consequences of such error." But it is said in Hahn v. Schmidt, supra, that "in order to constitute a defense to an action for malicious prosecution the facts stated in the complaint, if they do not constitute a crime, must nevertheless be true." In support of this proposition, several cases are cited, but they are all cases in which a crime had been distinctly charged, and the facts stated were insufficient to constitute a crime. The rule declared has no application to this case.

In our opinion the complaint here did not state a cause of action for malicious prosecution, and the demurrer was properly sustained. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEMPERLE. (No. 20,855.)

HOMICIDE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where the only proof as to the competency of a witness as an expert was his statement that he was a physician, and had some experience during the last two years in gunshot wounds, it was error, on a trial for murder, to allow him to testify, from examination of deceased, that he thought "the pistol [at the time of the discharge that caused deceased's death] was about four feet * * * from the wounded man; * * *" a physician not being, as such, an expert in such matters.

2. Where there was no witness to the homicide except defendant, who testified that deceased was coming at him with a brick raised to strike him, when he raised his pistol to frighten deceased, and it went off, and the only contrary statement of the killing was an alleged confession of defendant to the effect that deceased grabbed him, whereupon he fired at deceased once and then threw the pistol away, the admission of the medical testimony on the distance of the pistol was harmless error.

3. Where proper instructions are asked for, it is not necessary that they should be given in the exact language in which they are requested, it being sufficient if they are given substantially.

4. Where the court substantially embodied in its charge to the jury part of Pen. Code, § 1105, that "if you find that defendant fired the fatal shot, then the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the killing, devolves upon the defendant," it was error to omit from the charge the following qualifying portion of such section: "Unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. HEBBARD, Judge.

Charles W. Lemperle was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. Wm. S. Barnesand and W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was arraigned and tried for the crime of murder, and, having been found guilty of manslaughter, appeals from the judgment and from the order refusing a new trial. The only error alleged in regard to the admission of evidence consists in permitting a medical witness to testify, from his examination of the deceased, the distance of the deceased from the muzzle of the pistol at the time of its discharge. The witness said: "I should think the pistol was about four feet—that is, the muzzle of the pistol, not including the length of the arm—about four feet from the wounded man, as near as I can tell." The only proof of the competency of the witness, as an expert, was that he was a physician, and his statement, "I have had some experience as to gunshot wounds in the last two years." That the ruling was erroneous there can be no doubt. A physician is not, as such, an expert upon such matters. If he found that the flesh was burned or contained unburned powder, he would know that the pistol must have been near, but this is matter of common observation, and not a matter of special knowledge. The facts being stated, it was for the jury to judge. People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303; People v. Smith, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 64; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440, and cases cited. But while it was plainly error, it is simply impossible to see how it could have prejudiced the defendant. There were no witnesses to the homicide, except the defendant. His testimony in his own behalf was that the deceased was coming at him with a brick raised to strike him, and he raised the pistol to frighten the deceased away, and it went off. The only contrary statement was an alleged confession to a policeman, to the effect that deceased grabbed him by the throat, and he fired at him once and threw his pistol over the fence. There is certainly, therefore, nothing in the medical opinion, improperly admitted, inconsistent with defendant's evidence or theory of defense, and nothing which could strengthen the claim of the prosecution. The court gave an instruction substantially embodying section 1105, Pen. Code, but omitting the qualification contained in the statute: "Unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." These words were inserted in the statute as a qualification of the rule laid down, and it would be going a long way for the court to say that it is of no effect or value. Certainly the purpose of this qualification, if it serves any, is not accomplished by the general charge as to reasonable doubt, which may arise upon a consideration of the whole case. Without this qualification the jury might be led to believe that they must look to evidence introduced by the defendant only, for mitigating circumstances or for evidence to justify or excuse the act. The legislature must have entertained that opinion, or they would not have added the qualification. The instruction that, "to justify a person for killing another upon the ground of self-defense, the killing must be done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the deceased to save himself from great bodily harm," is, when taken in connection with other parts of the charge, not a ground for reversal. Although not highly commendable, it has several times been held by this court not to be erroneous. People v. Bruggy, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 26, and cases there cited; People v. Westlake, 62 Cal. 303. As to the exceptions that certain instructions asked were not given in the very language in which they were proposed, the record shows that they were given substantially. It is impossible to see how the defendant could have been injured by the changes made. Under the circumstances, it is not necessary to comment at length upon the line of argument which the court permitted the district attorney to pursue in his closing speech. It was certainly very unfair to draw any conclusions adverse to the defendant from the fact that he had not stated certain important matters, contained in his testimony on the trial, at the coroner's inquest. He was not sworn at the inquest, and, although taken there by the officers, he was dumb, unless speech was given him by the jury, who were conducting an ex parte examination, and called whom they pleased as witnesses. Even the remarks of the court seemed to imply that it was proper to claim that defendant had failed to make the same statements before the coroner. It was an unfair inference. Some of the remarks of this court in the case of People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 20 Pac. Rep. 719, would be appropriate here. The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

SELIGMAN v. ARMANDO. (No. 14,513.)

REPLEVIN—VALUE OF GOODS—JUDGMENT FOR VALUE ONLY—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. In replevin to recover a portion of a stock of goods transferred to defendant in fraud of creditors, a finding that such portion was of the value of $500 will not be disturbed on appeal, where it appears that the original value of the debtor's stock was $2,500; that she had sold, in the ordinary course of business, goods of the value of only $600, and that the value of her remaining stock was but $800, and the original value of the stock conveyed was $1,100.

2. The testimony of a witness that he found in defendant's store a large number of the goods, but that they were, with the exception of a few articles, so intermingled with the goods of defendant that they were not distinguishable, warranted a finding that the goods were so confused and mixed that they could not be returned, and made it unnecessary that the judgment should be in the alternative.

3. Defendant was not prejudiced by a refusal to permit her to be asked whether she knew when she took the goods that insolvency was contemplated, when she had already testified that she did not know that the debtor was insolvent, and that she made no inquiry into her financial condition, but supposed that the business was "going good."

4. An objection that a complaint in replevin does not sufficiently describe the property cannot be made for the first time on appeal, but should have been the ground for a demurrer.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Replevin by Carl Seligman, receiver in insolvency of Pauline Calori, against Mary Armando, to recover certain goods alleged to have been fraudulently transferred to defendant by said insolvent. The complaint alleged that said Pauline Calori was "in possession of a large stock of groceries belonging to her; "that, prior to filing her petition in insolvency, she "removed and secreted a large portion of said stock of groceries, of the value of about $500, so held by her, for the purpose of defrauding her creditors;" and that said defendant, "for the purpose of assisting her in defrauding her creditors, received said stock of groceries into his store building." There was no other description of the property. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Smith, Winder & Smith, for appellant.
Graff & Latham, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The appellant relies for a reversal of the judgment upon her specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. We have read the testimony, and think there is abundant evidence to support all the findings of the court. While it is true the only direct testimony as to the value of the goods taken is that of the defendant, there is sufficient evidence in the statement to support the finding of the court that the property was worth $500. Defendant testified that she paid Mrs. Calori $325 for the property, and that the price agreed upon was "a little less than she had paid." Mrs. Calori, one of the witnesses, testified that the goods in the store one week before the attachment was levied were worth about $2,500, and that at the time of the attachment the stock was worth no more than $800. According to the testimony of the defendant the goods sold in the ordinary course of business during the week previous to the attachment did not exceed in value the sum of $600. There is enough in the defendant's own testimony to support the finding that she was aware of the fact that Mrs. Calori was insolvent at the time the goods were removed from the store. Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 577, 21 Pac. Rep. 305.

It is claimed that there is nothing to show that the defendant "confused and mixed said goods with a stock of groceries owned by her in said building, so that the same were undistinguishable." C. H. Plummer, a salesman for Newmark & Co., testified that he examined the goods in the store of the defendant, and found a large number of articles which had been sold to Mrs. Calori, but that the goods taken from the Calori store were, with the exception of a few articles, so intermingled with the goods of the defendant that they were not distinguishable. It was not necessary, therefore, that the judgment should be in the alternative form. Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. Rep. 411.

The defendant was not prejudiced by the ruling of the court, sustaining the objection to the question, "Did you know at that time that Mrs. Calori contemplated going into insolvency?" The defendant had testified previously that she did not know that her sister, Mrs. Calori, was insolvent, and, in reply to subsequent questions, stated that she made no inquiry with regard to the financial condition of Mrs. Calori, and supposed that the business was "going good with them."

While the complaint cannot be regarded as a model of pleading, we think it is sufficient to support the judgment. The objections now urged against it should have been made by demurrer on the ground of uncertainty. No demurrer to the complaint was filed. Judgment and order affirmed.

PENNIE v. VISHER et al. (No. 14,327.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—QUIETING TITLE—SITUS OF LAND—RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANTS—OPENING DEFAULT—GROUNDS—WAIVER.

1. It is no ground for a change of venue in a suit to quiet title to land that neither the land is situated nor the defendants reside in the county wherein it was instituted.

2. A written notice of a motion for a change of venue does not comply with the requirement of Code Civil Proc. § 396, that such motion shall be demanded in writing.

3. Where a demurrer and motion for a change of venue were both properly overruled, it was not error to first overrule the demurrer.

4. It is not ground for opening a default that it was entered while a motion for a change of venue was pending, and before the expiration of 10 days from the time a demurrer was overruled; that no notice was given defendant of the time when the demurrer would be argued and submitted, or that it had been submitted and overruled; and that defendant and his counsel were mistaken in believing that they were entitled to such time and notice.

5. A default is not waived by a subsequent stipulation on the part of plaintiff's attorney with defendant's attorney, in open court, to argue and submit defendant's motion for a change of venue, and by the argument and submission thereof.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Bill in equity by James C. Pennie, administrator c. t. a. of Charles McLaughlin, deceased, against Sebastian Visher and others, to cancel certain contracts, to quiet the title of plaintiff to certain land, and to restrain defendants from asserting title thereto or disturbing the possession thereof. D. M. Vance, one of the defendants, gave written notice that he would move for a change of venue, and ask that the place of trial be changed from the superior court of Sacramento county to the superior court of San Joaquin county, on the ground that the action was "brought for the recovery of real property, and to quiet title thereof, and that none of said real property" was situated "in said county of Sacramento," but was "situated in said county of San Joaquin;" and that neither he nor any of the defendants resided in said county of Sacramento, but that he and other codefendants resided in the county of San Joaquin. The motion was based upon the "affidavit of D. M. Vance, and upon the disclaimer by the defendants in said action of their right and title in and to all the lands situated in said Sacramento county." The motion was denied, the demurrer of said defendant to the complaint was overruled, and there was a judgment by default. Defendant moved to open the default on the following grounds: That no notice was given him of the time when the demurrer would be argued and submitted, or that it had been submitted and overruled; that the default was entered before the usual time allowed defendant within which to file an answer after an adverse decision upon a preliminary motion or demurrer; that the default was entered while the motion for a change of venue was pending; that it was error to enter judgment by default before disposing of a motion for a change of venue; that the default was prematurely entered while the motion for a change of venue was pending, and before the expiration of 10 days from the time the demurrer was overruled and the motion for a change of venue was denied, and before the question of the jurisdiction of the court was decided; mistake of defendant and his counsel in relying upon and believing that plaintiff's attorney would stipulate, as advised by the clerk, that said motion and demurrer would be argued and submitted on the same day, and at such a time as would be convenient for both parties and their attorneys; surprise and mistake in believing that the rules of court required notice to be given the adverse party upon the overruling of his demurrer, and that after the issue was decided the defendant would be allowed at least 10 days in which to file his answer; and that the default was waived by the stipulation in open court, on the part of plaintiff's attorney with defendant's attorney, to argue and submit the motion for a change of venue after said default was entered, and the subsequent argument and submission of said motion and judgment thereon. The motion to open the default was denied, and said defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Amos H. Carpenter, for appellant. Wilson & Wilson, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. D. M. Vance, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action, appeals from an order denying his motion to set aside the default entered against him, and from the judgment entered in said action. Appellant demurred to the plaintiff's complaint, and moved for a change of the place of trial, upon an affidavit stating the grounds upon which his motion was based. The motion was overruled, and that ruling is complained of as being erroneous. We think the grounds specified for a change of the place of trial insufficient; and, were they not, there does not appear to have been a demand for the change in writing, such as is required by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Estrada v. Orena, 54 Cal. 407; Byrne v. Byrne, 57 Cal. 348. The demurrer was overruled before the motion for a change of the place of trial was. Both were properly overruled, and the order in which they were overruled could not in any way affect the substantial rights of the parties, as it might have done if the motion to change the place of trial had been granted after the demurrer was overruled. As it is, it appears to be nothing more serious than a harmless irregularity, which we are bound to disregard.

After appellant's demurrer was overruled, his default was entered, for failure to answer, and he moved to set it aside. The grounds upon which that motion was based were insufficient to entitle the moving party to have the default set aside, and there was no abuse of the discretion of the court in denying it.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Malone v. Roy. (No. 13,946.)

Deed Absolute in Form—When a Mortgage.

In an action to quiet title the issue was whether a deed from defendant to plaintiff, which was absolute on its face, was security for a loan. Defendant was in possession of the property under a contract of purchase from G., to whom he was indebted for the price. Defendant applied to plaintiff for a loan to pay off this indebtedness. Plaintiff paid G. the purchase money, and the latter conveyed the property to defendant. On the following day defendant executed the deed in question, and at the same time plaintiff gave him an agreement to reconvey the land to defendant if the amount specified was paid within one year. Plaintiff testified that he took a deed to the property, so that, if defendant could not pay the money in a year, plaintiff might be saved the expense of foreclosing; that he told defendant he did not wish the property, but that all he wanted was a repayment of his money. Plaintiff further testified: "My agreement with defendant was that he should have the benefit of the ranch for the year, but the money was to go to pay the interest on the principal sum he owed me." "I didn't expect at the time that I should have to take the place; I thought he would redeem it." There was no evidence that plaintiff had possession of the land during the year, other than that, at the request of defendant, he executed a lease of the land and some 60 of defendant's milch cows to M. Held, that the deed was intended by both parties as a mere security for the debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; J. E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John Malone against George G. Roy to quiet title to a tract of land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

L. F. Coburn, for appellant. Lucas & Miller, (Sawyer & Burnett, of counsel,) for respondent.

Vanclief, C. This is an action to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to a tract of land containing 360 acres, situate in the county of Del Norte, and known as the "Gordon Ranch," in which the judgment of the trial court was in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff claims title to the land by a grant, bargain, and sale deed to him from the defendant, dated January 4, 1888, reciting a paid consideration of $7,532.50, which, upon its face, appears to be absolute. But the defendant contends that the deed was intended merely as security for a debt which defendant owed to plaintiff for money loaned by the latter to the former, and therefore that it is only a mortgage. The court found that the deed was not intended as security, but that it was intended to be what it purports to be,—an absolute conveyance of the legal title. Does the evidence justify this finding? is the only question presented for decision.

Prior to the 3d day of January, 1888, the defendant did not have the legal title to the land, but had been in possession thereof several years, under a contract to purchase from one Gordon, to whom, on January 3, 1888, he was still indebted for a balance of the purchase money, which then amounted to about $6,550. A few days prior to this date he applied to plaintiff for a loan of money sufficient to pay Gordon, and thereby to procure a deed for the land, offering a mortgage on the land as security. Plaintiff at first consented to loan the money for two years, with interest at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, compounded annually; but the negotiations finally resulted in the following transactions: On January 3, 1888, plaintiff paid defendant's debt to Gordon for balance of purchase money, and Gordon then conveyed the land to defendant. On the following day (January 4th) defendant executed to plaintiff the deed in question, and at the same time plaintiff executed to defendant, on a separate paper, the following instrument: "Crescent City, Cal., Jan. 4, 1888. Whereas, George G. Roy has this day made and executed a deed to John Malone, of the Gordon Ranch, in Del Norte county, Cal., consisting of the following described pieces or parcels of land, to wit, [here follows description;] containing 360 acres of land, with the tenements, etc., for the sum of seven thousand five hundred and thirty-two dollars and fifty cents: Now, therefore, this witnesseth that if the said George G. Roy shall, on or before the 4th day of January, 1889, pay to the said John Malone the full sum of seven thousand five hundred and thirty-two dollars and fifty cents, ($7,532.50,) then the said John Malone will reconvey the above-described premises to the said George G. Roy. And if the payment, as above specified, shall not be paid on the 4th day of January, 1889, then this obligation shall be void, and the said Roy agrees to surrender the same to the said John Malone. JOHN MALONE." The price ($7,532 50) for which, according to this instrument, plaintiff agreed to reconvey, is composed of the principal sum paid Gordon, and the interest thereon for one year, at 1¼ per cent. per month, together with the estimated taxes on the land for the same year.

Defendant testified that the deed was given as mere security for the payment of his debt to plaintiff, and one year's interest thereon, at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, and his testimony is corroborated and strengthened by numerous circumstances, but most effectively by the testimony of the plaintiff. On his own behalf plaintiff testified: "I recognize the deed just filed in evidence, and know the land therein described, and am still the owner thereof. Have not disposed of it since, and am still in possession of it, and was at the time of the commencement of this action." On cross-examination he testified as follows: "The consideration for the deed was $7,532.50. Question. As matter of fact, Mr. Malone, the money you paid was $6,670? Answer. I bought the indebtedness that defendant owed Gordon, and the interest for a year at one and a quarter (1¼) per month was added; the taxes were also added, and this made $7,532.50. My business now is farming. At the time the deed was passed it was loaning money, buying and selling land. I made quite a business of loaning money, and my usual rate is, and has been for several years past, one and one quarter per cent. per month. Several days prior to the execution of this deed (Plaintiff's Exhibit A) either the defendant, or Mr. Miller for him, asked me for a loan of $6,600. There was a good deal of talk about it. Mr. Miller was then my attorney, but he came to me in regard to defendant. He was acting as attorney for defendant, to see if I would pay off the Gordon indebtedness, which I through Mr. Miller agreed to pay off. At first I was to be secured by a mortgage on the premises for two years. Mr. Miller, as defendant's attorney, and defendant came to me separately several times, and at last I agreed to give him two years by his giving me a deed, and paying one and a quarter (1¼) per cent. on it. After that defendant refused to take two years. All he wanted was one year to pay me back. I told Mr. Roy (defendant) I would pay the indebtedness off if he would give me a deed to the property, and pay the interest and principal in one year. Then I agreed I should give defendant a written agreement, providing that if he paid me I should deed back the place to him, and, if not, the agreement should last no longer. They wanted me to accept a mortgage, but I would not, on account of the time it would take to foreclose it if they didn't pay it at the end of the year. I first agreed with either Mr. Miller or defendant to take a mortgage for two years, and, at defendant's suggestion, the time was reduced to one year. Q. Your object, then, as I understand it, Mr. Malone, in taking the deed and the bond in place of the mortgage, was to prevent the trouble of foreclosing, and the expense attached thereto? A. Yes, sir; that there was to be no more expense or trouble about it. Q. To secure the payment of this money? A. No, sir; a deed of this property, and that if he paid me my money back in one year I should deed back the place to him, and, if not, there was to be no more trouble. The deed was given as bona fide. I had a doubt that if I took a mortgage he might put me to more trouble, and I would not accept it, and, to save expense and trouble, I took a deed in case he could not raise the money in one year, and during this year defendant had the rents and profits of the ranch. Q. Wasn't that a part of the consideration of the deed? A. No, sir; the deed had nothing to do with it. He had the rents and profits through Giacomini. I rented the place to Giacomini, and he paid me $600 down, which amount I gave defendant credit for on another debt he owed me outside of this land indebtedness at that time. The rent was $20 per cow. I don't remember how many cows there were. I think the rent came to $1,140 for the year. All the expense I recollect of defendant paying was $5 towards fixing the fence. Mr. Giacomini fixed some fence for which I paid him, and at my request defendant repaid me. Defendant also bought some nails and milk-pans to be used on the ranch. I paid for no repairs or improvements myself during that year, because defendant had the privilege of paying me the $7,000, and that I should deed the ranch back to him within the year. I knew when I received this deed January 4, 1888, there was a lawsuit pending in this court relative to this property. * * * Q. You remember that during that time these negotiations were going on to obtain this money from you, that you told defendant that you didn't want the place at all; all you wanted was your money and interest? A. Yes, sir; I may have told him that. Q. That was a fact; you only wanted your money back and interest? A. I think I said so, sir. From the time the deed was made I have considered myself in possession of the ranch. Defendant was to have the use of the ranch for one year from the date of the deed placed to his credit, and he has had it. Through Mr. Giacomini he has received credit for the ranch and cattle both up to the time I went to receive the ranch from Giacomini. I can't say whether it was November 1st or January 1st, but think is was January 1st. My agreement with defendant was that he should have the benefits of the ranch for the year, but that the money was to go to pay the interest on the principal sum he owed me. I did not consider the place good security for $8,000. I gave all I could for the place. I didn't expect at the time that I should have to take the place. I thought he would redeem it." Upon redirect examination he said: "After the deed was made I did not consider defendant indebted to me in any sum in connection with this deed. I did not take any new or other evidence of indebtedness from him, but defendant promised and agreed to pay me,—to repay me. It was understood between defendant and myself that he would pay within the year, and that if he did so I would redeed that property to him. Q. The question I want to get at is, was there any existing promises between you and the defendant that he would pay you any money? A. The only agreement there was between us— I gave him the agreement,—I gave defendant an agreement to the effect that if he paid me back my money and interest I should redeed the place back to him; there was no existing debt at that time."

There is no evidence that plaintiff had possession of the land during the year, other than at the request of defendant he executed a lease of the land and some 60 of defendant's milch cows to one Giacomini, as dictated by defendant, the whole rent reserved being for defendant's use, and defendant made or paid for all repairs during the term of the lease. It seems clearly apparent from plaintiff's testimony alone that the deed was intended by both parties as mere security for a debt, and none the less so because, in plaintiff's opinion, it is not a mortgage. That it is a mortgage is a conclusion of law from the fact that at the time it was executed it was intended merely as security for the payment of defendant's debt to the plaintiff. To this effect the law is too firmly established to require citation of authorities. And, as there is no substantial conflict of evidence as to the intention of the parties in this respect, the finding of the trial court that the deed was not intended as security for any debt is not justified by the evidence. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur. Belcher, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

In re Schmidt's Estate. (No. 14,849.)

Allotment of Homestead—Duration of Right—Title in Heirs.

1. Deceased left an estate consisting of a small amount of personal property and six adjacent lots, which, with their improvements, were valued as follows: Lot 1, $700; lot 2, $1,000; lot 3, $800; lot 4, $800; lot 5, $400; lot 6, $800. There was a dwelling house on each lot, except on No. 1. The house on lot No. 6 had been used by deceased as a place of residence. Deceased made no provision for his wife by will, and no homestead was selected by either of them during his lifetime. The widow filed a petition praying that lots 1, 2, and 5, which were adjacent, be set apart to her as a homestead. It appeared at the hearing that the whole property was incumbered by a mortgage for $1,500, and that, including the mortgage, claims against the estate had already been presented, exceeding $3,000. The court denied the prayer of the petition as to the lots asked for, but set apart lot No. 6 for a homestead. Held, that the court properly exercised its discretion, under Code Civil Proc. § 1465, which provides that if no homestead has been selected, designated, and recorded, "the court must select, designate, and set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead," etc.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1468, relating to "provision for the support of the family," provided that "when property is set apart for the use of the family, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, if the decedent left a widow or surviving husband, and no minor child, such property is the property of the widow or surviving husband," etc. In 1881 this section was amended by adding to it the following: "If the property set apart be a homestead selected from the separate property of the deceased, the court can only set it apart for a limited period, to be designated in the order; and the title vests in the heirs of the deceased, subject to such order." Held, that the amendment related to homesteads selected and set apart by the court, and not to those selected and recorded while the husband and wife were both living.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Petition by Lina Schmidt, widow of John P. Schmidt, deceased, praying that three lots be assigned to her as a homestead. Petition denied as to the lots prayed for, but an order was made assigning one lot. Petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. A. Morganthal, for respondents.

Belcher, C. The deceased, Schmidt, died testate in January, 1891, leaving, surviving him, his widow, Lina Schmidt, the appellant, and three adult children, issue of a former marriage. His estate consisted of a parcel of land, described as six adjacent lots, situate on Pacific avenue and Walnut street, in the city of Alameda, and a small amount of personal property. The lots were his separate property, and in the inventory and appraisement returned and filed the values placed upon them, and the improvements thereon, were as follows: Lot 1, $700; lot 2, $1,000; lot 3, $800; lot 4, $800; lot 5, $400; lot 6, $800. The lot at the corner of the streets, described as "Lot 1," was vacant, and on each of the other lots was a one-story frame dwelling house. Prior to his death, four of these houses were rented by deceased to tenants, and the other one, situate on lot 6, was occupied by himself as his place of residence. Deceased and his surviving wife were married about five years before his death, and they lived together as husband and wife in his said house on lot 6 until May 8, 1890, when she left him, and thereafter lived separate and apart from him. Deceased made no provision for his wife in his will, and she had no property of her own. No homestead was selected, designated, or recorded by deceased or his wife during his life. After the will had been admitted to probate, and the inventory and appraisement of the estate returned and filed, Mrs. Schmidt presented to the court her petition, asking, among other things, that the vacant lot and the two lots adjacent thereto, numbered 1, 2, and 5, be set apart to her as a homestead. At the hearing of the petition, it was shown that the whole property was incumbered by a mortgage for $1,500, and that, including the mortgage, claims against the estate had already been presented, exceeding the sum of $3,000. It was also shown that the property was appraised at its full value, and that there was no material difference between the lots, as regards their use for a homestead, and that the sale of the remaining lots would not be affected, whichever one should be selected and set apart as a homestead. The court denied the prayer of the petition as to the lots asked for, but made an order setting apart to the petitioner, as a homestead for and during her natural life, lot 6. The appeal is from this order.

1. It is claimed by appellant that where separate premises are equally adapted to use as a homestead the court has no discretion, but is bound to set apart the premises selected by the applicant, and that in this case, if the condition of the estate did not warrant the granting of appellant's petition in full, then the court should have set apart to her lot 2 instead of lot 6. In support of this point the only authority cited is Estate of Walkerly, 81 Cal. 579, 22 Pac. Rep. 888. In that case the court set apart to the widow and child, for a limited time, the residence of the deceased, which was his separate property, and was of the value of $18,000. The estate was of the value of $50,000, over and above all the indebtedness. This court held that there was no limitation as to value in setting apart a probate homestead for a limited time, and it was said: "This was a matter within the discretion of the court below, and, unless it appears that such discretion has been abused, we think this court should not interfere. The estate here is a large one, and we cannot say, from the evidence before us, that the court below abused its discretion in the matter." The Code provides that if no homestead has been selected, designated, and recorded, "the court must select, designate, and set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead," etc. Section 1465, Code Civil Proc. The obvious purpose of this statute is to provide the family of the deceased with a home, where they may live and be protected as against creditors and heirs; and it is made the duty of the court to select and set apart for that home such part of the estate, consisting of a dwelling house and the land on which the same is situated, as in view of the value of the estate, and all the circumstances surrounding it, shall seem just and proper. The court is not bound by the wishes of the applicant, but should exercise its own discretion and good judgment; and, unless that discretion is abused, its action will not be disturbed on appeal. Here the whole estate was of small value, and the court set apart to the petitioner the house and lot where she and her husband resided till she left him, and where he continued to reside till he died. This seems to have been the proper thing to do, and at any rate we can see in it no abuse of discretion.

2. It is also claimed that the court erred in setting apart the homestead for and during the lifetime of appellant only, and not absolutely. In support of this point the case of Mawson v. Mawson, 50 Cal. 539, and sections 1465 and 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are cited and relied upon. Mawson v. Mawson was decided in 1875, and, in construing the sections referred to as they then stood, it was held that there was a distinction between a homestead selected from the separate property of the deceased, and recorded during his or her lifetime, and a homestead selected and set apart from the separate property of the deceased by the probate court; that in the former case the homestead selected could only be set apart for a limited period, and that in the latter case the homestead selected vested absolutely in the survivor, if there were no minor children. The court, however, said: "It is somewhat difficult to understand upon what ground the legislature discriminates between homesteads selected and recorded in the lifetime of the parties, and those to be set apart by the probate court out of the separate estate of the deceased. But these provisions are in no respect inconsistent with each other. The language is incapable of any other interpretation than that, if a homestead be set apart by the probate court out of the separate estate of the deceased husband, it shall belong to the widow and minor children, if there be any, while on the other hand it is equally clear that if the homestead be selected and recorded while the husband and wife are both living, out of the separate estate of either, 'it vests, on the death of the person from whose property it was selected, in his or her heirs, subject to the power of the probate court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent.' It is our duty to administer the statute law as we find it, and not to account for its incongruities." At the time this decision was rendered, section 1468 read as follows: "When property is set apart for the use of the family, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter, if the decedent left a widow or surviving husband, and no minor child, such property is the property of the widow or surviving husband," etc. In 1881 the section was amended by adding to it the following: "If the property set apart be a homestead, selected from the separate property of the deceased, the court can only set it apart for a limited period, to be designated in the order; and the title vests in the heirs of the deceased, subject to such order." Appellant contends that this amendment relates to homesteads selected and recorded while the husband and wife were both living, and not to so-called probate homesteads, selected and set apart by the court, and that it was not intended to, and did not in fact, change the rule declared in Mawson v. Mawson. We cannot agree to this construction, for the reason that if it be correct the amendment was altogether useless and uncalled for; a similar provision being then found in section 1474 of the same Code. In our opinion, it was intended by the amendment to change the rule declared in Mawson v. Mawson, and to take from the court the power to set apart homesteads selected from the separate property of the deceased, except for a limited period. And this view seems to be in harmony with the subsequent decisions of this court. In Lord v. Lord, 65 Cal. 84, 3 Pac. Rep. 96, the court below had set apart, as a homestead, property that was partly community and partly separate property. The order was reversed, and on page 87, 65 Cal., and page 98, 3 Pac. Rep., it is said: "The proceedings in this case were taken under section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1880. This section received a legislative construction in harmony with the views we have above expressed, by the amendment of section 1468, approved February 19, 1881, wherein it is provided that, where separate property is set apart, it is set apart for a limited period only; the title vesting in the heirs, subject to the order setting apart." In the case of In re Noah, 73 Cal. 590, 15 Pac. Rep. 290, the deceased had made no provision in his will for his widow. The estate was all separate property of the deceased. The only real estate was a four-story brick building used for business purposes. The widow asked for an order of sale of the property and for an allowance of $5,000, in lieu of a homestead. The petition was denied, and in sustaining the order this court, on page 594, 73 Cal., and page 292, 15 Pac. Rep., said: "Here no homestead was selected during the lifetime of the decedent. Moreover, the appellant sought to have set apart to her a homestead out of the separate property of deceased. In such cases the court can only set apart a homestead 'for a limited period, to be designated in the order; and the title vests in the heirs of the deceased, subject to such order.' Code Civil Proc. § 1468." In the case of In re Lahiff's Estate, 86 Cal. 151, 24 Pac. Rep. 850, a homestead was set apart to the surviving husband out of the separate property of his deceased wife. The case was appealed to this court; and on page 153, 86 Cal., and page 851, 24 Pac. Rep., it is said: "No homestead having been selected and recorded during the lifetime of the decedent, it was the duty of the court to designate and set apart a homestead out of the community property, if there was any such; if not, then out of the separate property of the decedent. Code Civil Proc. § 1465. * * * If there was no minor child, then it was for the surviving husband alone. Code Civil Proc. § 1468. But if taken, as this was, from the separate property of the decedent, it could be for only a limited period, as was done in this case."

It is objected for appellant that the question presented here was not involved in either of the cases above cited, and that the language quoted was therefore obiter dictum. Conceding this to be so, still we think the provisions of the Code referred to were correctly construed. If follows, in our opinion, that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Fitzgerald, C.

SHERER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LASSEN COUNTY. (No. 14,825.)

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE'S COURT—EXTENT OF REVIEW—JUDGMENT.

1. The constitutional provision that the superior courts "shall have appellate jurisdiction in such cases arising in justices' and other inferior courts, in their respective counties, as may be prescribed by law," limits the exercise of their jurisdiction to the extent and mode which the legislature may prescribe.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 980, providing that, on appeal from a justice's court heard upon a statement of the case, the superior court "may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside or confirm or modify any or all proceedings subsequent to and dependent upon such judgment, and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial," the superior court, on appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of a justice for defendant setting aside a judgment previously rendered for plaintiff, and dismissing the action, cannot reverse the judgment appealed from, and affirm the judgment set aside, but can only reverse said judgment and order a new trial, since the last judgment is the only one appealed from, and the former judgment does not affect it, and for the further reason that, when the judgment was set aside, it ceased to exist, and there is no such judgment to affirm.

In bank.

Certiorari by Josiah Sherer to review the action of the superior court of Lassen county in entering a judgment against petitioner on appeal from a justice's court. Judgment annulled.

Spencer & Raker and Henry N. Clement, for petitioner. A. L. Shinn, for respondent.

Harrison, J. Certiorari to review the action of the superior court of Lassen county in entering judgment against the petitioner in a cause appealed from the justice's court of township No. 1, in that county. Whatever irregularities or errors were committed in the justice's court cannot be examined upon this proceeding. The writ is directed to a review of the action of the superior court, and its functions are limited to such acts of that court as were in excess of its jurisdiction. The provision of the constitution that the superior court "shall have appellate jurisdiction in such cases arising in justice's and other inferior courts in their respective counties as may be prescribed by law" limits the exercise of its jurisdiction to the extent and mode which the legislature may prescribe. The superior court cannot acquire jurisdiction of a cause pending in a justice's court, except in conformity with the steps prescribed by the statute for taking an appeal from that court, nor can it, after such appeal has been taken, exercise any other jurisdiction in the cause than has been authorized by statute. Within the limits thus prescribed, however, its errors in the exercise of its jurisdiction, however gross or glaring they may be, must be submitted to as a part of the sacrifice which every individual is compelled to yield to the infirmities of human government. After its appellate jurisdiction has once been acquired, its action within the limits of that jurisdiction, unless in direct contravention of some positive statute, is entitled to all the presumptions of regularity that attach to the exercise of its original jurisdiction. It appears from the statement of the case upon which the appeal was heard by the superior court that on July 25, 1891, judgment had been rendered in the justice's court in favor of the plaintiff, and that on August 1, 1891, upon motion of the defendant, the justice set aside the said judgment, and afterwards, on the same day, when the case came on for trial, gave and entered judgment dismissing the action and allowing the defendant his costs. Thereupon the plaintiff appealed to the superior court, and stated in his notice of appeal that he appealed "from the judgment entered herein on the 1st day of August, 1891, in favor of the defendant, and against this plaintiff," and that "said appeal is taken on questions of law alone, and from the whole of said judgment." In due time thereafter a statement of the case was prepared and settled by the justice, and when the matter was heard thereon in the superior court that court rendered and filed its decision that the judgment of July 25th be affirmed, and the judgment of August 1st be reversed, and thereupon caused to be entered in its records the following judgment: "This cause came on regularly to be heard on the 7th day of October, 1891, on appeal from justice's court of township No. 1, of the county of Lassen, state of California, on questions of law alone; and the cause having been submitted to the court for its decision, and the court on the 26th day of October, 1891, having made and filed its decision affirming the judgment given and made in said justice's court, on July 25, 1891, in favor of plaintiff, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff, H. L. Hoagland, do have and recover of the defendant, Josiah Sherer, the sum of ninety-five and five one-hundredths dollars, and his costs herein taxed at $12.35."

Section 980, Code Civil Proc., provides: "Upon an appeal heard upon a statement of the case the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside or confirm or modify any or all proceedings subsequent to and dependent upon such judgment, and may, if necessary or proper, order a new trial. When the action is tried anew on appeal the trial must be conducted in all respects as other trials in the superior court." In the present case the judgment appealed from is the one which was entered August 1, 1891; and, as there were no proceedings subsequent to or dependent upon such judgment, the action of the court was limited to a review of the orders "affecting" that judgment, or to the granting of a new trial. It had no jurisdiction to cause the judgment appealed from to be entered in its own records, nor could it enter its own judgment upon the merits of the case, except upon a new trial. While, upon certiorari to the justice's court, it would have had authority to annul the order of August 1st, vacating the previous judgment, and also the judgment of that date, yet, upon an appeal from the judgment of August 1st, it was limited to a review of that judgment, and if in its judgment the justice had erred in vacating the judgment of July 25th, and rendering the judgment appealed from, it should have reversed the judgment, and ordered a new trial. It could not, however, upon an appeal from the judgment of August 1st, affirm the judgment rendered by the justice on July 25th, for the reason that there had been no appeal from that judgment, and also because, having been vacated in the justice's court, there was no judgment of that date to be affirmed. If in the judgment of the superior court the justice erred in vacating the judgment and rendering the judgment appealed from, it should have ordered a new trial, and the parties could then have obtained its own judgment upon the merits of the controversy. It is therefore ordered that the judgment aforesaid, entered in the superior court, be, and the same is hereby, annulled, and that court is directed to proceed upon the appeal before it as is indicated in this opinion, and to render its judgment accordingly.

STEINHART et al. v. NATIONAL BANK OF D. O. MILLS & Co. (No. 14,502.)

BANKS—NOTE FOR COLLECTION—CHARGING MAKER'S ACCOUNT—PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against defendant bank to recover the amount of a note, it appeared defendant received the note from the payee for collection; that the maker was a customer of defendant, and that the next morning defendant's clerk presented the note for payment; that the maker wrote across its face, "Please charge the same to my account;" and that the clerk thereupon wrote on the back of the note, "Charged account;" and then stamped thereon the date and name of defendant. The stamp mark meant "Canceled." The clerk charged the amount of the note in the maker's pass book, and also in his account in defendant's journal. The same day defendant drew its check in favor of the bank through which plaintiffs sent the note, and after business hours mailed the check and a letter of advice to such bank. At the time the note was presented for payment the maker was insolvent, but defendant had no knowledge of that fact. The afternoon of the same day the maker made an assignment, and immediately after ascertaining the fact defendant procured the letter from the post office, and canceled the check, and returned the note by mail to plaintiffs' bank. There were no indorsers on the note, and neither plaintiffs nor their bank had any knowledge of the transactions between defendant and the maker until the check had been canceled. When the note was presented to the maker he had no money to his credit with defendant, but was indebted to it in a considerable sum. Held, that such transaction did not constitute payment of the note.

2. The maker of the note, after testifying that he made the assignment on February 18th, was allowed to testify that it took his lawyer about half an hour to write the assignment; that he went to his lawyer about 4 o'clock; and that he had a consultation about his affairs with the lawyer in the morning. Held, that this was not error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action by William Steinhart and others against the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. to recover the amount of a certain note. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Rothchild & Ach, for appellants. Denson & Oatman, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $860, money alleged to have been received by the defendant to and for the use of the plaintiffs. The court below gave judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal. The facts of the case, as found by the court, are as follows: On the 17th day of December, 1888, one G. Politz made his promissory note to the plaintiffs for $860, payable two months after date at the bank of defendant. They delivered it to the London, Paris & American Bank of San Francisco for collection, which bank forwarded it to the defendant at Sacramento, to be presented for payment, and it was received Sunday, the 17th day of February, 1889. The maker was a customer of the defendant, and on the morning of the 18th he deposited with the defendant $400 on general account. While he was at the bank, at the time he made the deposit, a clerk of the defendant presented the note for payment. The maker wrote across the face of the note: "Please charge the same to my account. G. Politz." The clerk then wrote on the back of the note: "Charged account. Littlefield." The clerk, Littlefield, then stamped these words on the back of the note, within a square: "National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co., February 18, 1889, Sacramento, Cal." The square and words were in red ink, and understood to mean "Canceled." The clerk then charged the amount of the note in the pass book of the maker, and in the journal of the defendant, in his account. Before the close of the business hours of the day the defendant drew its check in favor of the London, Paris & American Bank, upon the Bank of California, and after the close of business hours inclosed its check in an envelope, with a letter of advice, addressed to the London, Paris & American Bank. At the time of this transaction Politz had no money or other funds on deposit with the defendant. Some time previous he had made his note, payable one day after date to the defendant, to cover overdrafts, for the sum of $3,500, which was accredited to his account. Allowing this note as a credit in account with Politz, and charging him with the amount of said check, the journal of the defendant at the close of the business hour on that day showed a nominal credit in his favor of $367; but in fact he had overdrawn his account in excess of his note, then overdue, and moneys deposited, more than $2,000. At the time the defendant received from Politz the note for $3,500 to cover overdrafts he was in good credit, but in fact insolvent, and was insolvent on the 18th day of February, 1889, at the time of the transaction out of which this action arose; and about 5 o'clock of the afternoon of that day he made a general assignment, under the provisions of the Civil Code, for the benefit of his creditors. The defendant knew nothing of the insolvency of Politz until after the assignment was made. On the same day, and immediately after ascertaining that he had made an assignment, the defendant procured the envelope from the post office containing the check, and canceled it, and immediately indorsed on the back of the note these words: "Charged in error. F. Miller, Cashier." "Canceled in error. F. Miller, Cashier,—" and immediately, on the same evening, returned the note by mail, with letter of advice as to what had been done, to the London, Paris & American Bank of San Francisco. There were no indorsers on the note due plaintiffs. Neither the plaintiffs nor the London, Paris & American Bank knew or had any notice of the transaction between the defendant and Politz, or of the drawing of the draft by the defendant, until after the check had been canceled, and the defendant had declined to advance the money to pay the note. The defendant did not receive any money or other valuable thing from Politz to or for the use of the plaintiffs, and they have lost no rights by the acts of the defendant.

Upon these facts, the principal question presented for decision is, did the transaction between Politz and the defendant constitute a payment of the note? The appellants contend that it did, and that the finding that "the defendant did not receive any money or other valuable thing from Politz to or for the use of the plaintiffs, and they have lost no rights by the acts of the defendant," was not justified by the evidence. The above is the only finding objected to, and we do not think the contention in regard to it can be sustained. It is not disputed that when the note was presented to Politz for payment, and he wrote on it, "Please charge the same to my account," he had no money in the bank to his credit, but was indebted to it in a considerable sum. The request was therefore, in effect, that the defendant advance or loan to him the money to make the payment, and trust him till he could pay it back. This the defendant, supposing him at the time to be of good credit, seems to have been willing to do, but when, near the close of the business day, it learned that he had made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and was insolvent, it changed its mind, and concluded not to advance the money. It thereupon got back its check, and canceled it. At this stage the transaction was unknown to the plaintiffs, and was incomplete, and as against Politz the defendant had a clear right, we think, to do as it did. And if it be assumed, as claimed by appellants, that the transaction amounted to a contract on the part of defendant to advance the money to pay the note, still it had a right to rescind the contract if its consent thereto was given by mistake, (section 1689, Civil Code;) and that it was so given is shown by the evidence and findings. As against the plaintiffs, the test as to whether the note was paid or not is, could they afterwards have maintained an action upon it against Politz, the maker? It is settled law in this state that, when a creditor takes a note or check for an antecedent debt, it does not operate to extinguish the debt, unless it is received by express agreement as payment. Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 317; Welch v. Allington, 23 Cal. 322; Brown v. Olmsted, 50 Cal. 162; Bank v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64; Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. Rep. 28. If, then, the check of the defendant had been forwarded to and actually received by the plaintiffs, it would not, until collected, have paid their note, and released the maker from liability thereon. And the fact that the note was mutilated, and marked "Canceled," did not affect the plaintiff's right to sue upon it, since this matter could all be explained and accounted for. Section 1982, Code Civil Proc. In our opinion, therefore, the note was not paid, and the finding objected to was justified and proper.

The appellants also make the point that the court erred in the admission of evidence. Politz was called as a witness for defendant, and testified that he made an assignment on the 18th day of February, 1889. He was then asked by counsel for defendant: "How long were you preparing or having that assignment prepared?" The question was objected to as irrelevant and immaterial, the objection was overruled, and an exception taken. The witness answered: "It took my lawyer about half an hour to write it. I went to him about four o'clock. I had a consultation with my legal adviser about my affairs before that. I think it was the same morning." The witness then went on to say that his consultation in the morning was not about making an assignment, and that he then thought he was able to pay all his debts in the ordinary course of business. We are unable to see that there was any error in the ruling complained of, and, if there was, that the appellants were in any way prejudiced thereby. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PROBATE PROCEEDINGS—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

1. An order of the superior court sitting as a court of probate, denying an executor's motion to vacate an order denying his petition for an allowance for extraordinary services rendered by him, and to restore the cause to the calendar, is not appealable; the general rule being that appeals can only be taken from such judgments or orders in probate proceedings as are mentioned in Code Civil Proc. § 963, subd. 3, specifying the judgments and orders from which an appeal may be taken.

2. Such order is not a "special order, made after final judgment," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 963, subd. 2, allowing an appeal to the supreme court from such an order of the superior court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Columbus Bartlett filed a petition for an allowance against an estate for extraordinary services rendered by him as executor, and from an order denying his motion to vacate an order denying the petition and to restore the cause to the calendar he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Noble Hamilton, Joseph A. Joyce, and R. M. F. Soto, for appellant. H. C. Firebaugh and Frederick E. Whitney, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. In this estate, one of the executors, Columbus Bartlett, filed a petition praying to be allowed a certain sum of money for alleged extraordinary services rendered by him as such executor. Objections were made to the allowance prayed for by the other executors, and by various parties interested in the estate; and, the matter having been heard, the court, on March 11, 1891, made an order denying said petition. Afterwards, on March 30, 1891, the said Bartlett made and served notice of motion to vacate said order of March 11th, and to restore the cause to the calendar, upon the ground that no findings had been filed or waived; and that the court make findings, and that judgment be entered thereon as required by law. This motion was afterwards heard, and on May 29, 1891, the court made an order denying it; and from this last order, denying the motion to vacate, etc., said Bartlett has undertaken to appeal to this court. Respondents move to dismiss the appeal upon the ground, among others, that the said order denying the said motion to vacate is not an appealable order. The order appealed from is clearly not appealable. The general rule is well established that appeals can only be taken from such judgments or orders in probate proceedings as are mentioned in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure;[1] and the order appealed from in the case at bar is not one of those there mentioned. Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4; Estate of Calahan, 60 Cal. 232; Estate of Dean, Id. 613; In re Moore, 86 Cal. 58, 24 Pac. Rep. 816; In re Wiard, 83 Cal. 619, 24 Pac. Rep. 45. The only modification of the rule established by the cases just cited is to be found in Appeal of Bauquier, 88 Cal. 303, 26 Pac. Rep. 178, 532. In that case there was a regular contest and trial over the question of issuing letters testamentary to an executrix, and an appeal to this court from an order denying a new trial; and this court merely held that "in all cases in which the superior court, when sitting as a court of probate, is authorized to entertain a motion for a new trial, an appeal will lie from its order therein."

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 963, subd. 3, allows an appeal from the superior to the supreme court "from a judgment or order granting, refusing, or revoking letters testamentary or of administration, or of guardianship; admitting or refusing to admit a will to probate; or against or in favor of the validity of a will, or revoking the probate thereof; or against or in favor of setting apart property, or making an allowance for a widow or child; or against or in favor of directing the partition sale or conveyance of real property; or settling an account of an executor or administrator or guardian; or refusing, allowing, or directing the distribution of an estate, or any part thereof; or the payment of a debt, claim, legacy, or distributive share; or confirming or refusing to confirm a report of an appraiser setting apart the homestead.

But as in the case at bar the attempted appeal is not from an order made on a motion for a new trial, the Bauquier Case does not apply. And that the order here appealed from is not a "special order, made after final judgment," within the meaning of the second subdivision of said section 963, is also settled by the authorities first above cited. If it were otherwise, the third subdivision of said section could be entirely disregarded by simply assuming that a probate order not therein mentioned was a final judgment, and that an order refusing to vacate it was a "special order made after final judgment." The appeal is dismissed.

WELSH v. PLUMAS COUNTY. (No. 14,434.)

TOLL ROADS—ACCEPTANCE OF FRANCHISE.

Under act March 17, 1866, which authorized certain persons to "construct" a toll wagon road between certain points, the taking possession of a public road, already built, between the same points, was not an acceptance of the franchise.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Action by P. R. Welsh against Plumas county to quiet title to a certain road. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Goodwin and John Gale, for appellant. U. S. Webb and Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff brought this suit under section 738, Code Civil Proc., having in view the quieting of his alleged title to a wagon road in Plumas county, as against the adverse claim of that county. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, filed, and gave judgment thereon for the defendant. Upon an appeal being taken by the plaintiff to this court, the judgment was reversed. 80 Cal. 338, 22 Pac. Rep. 254. In that case the acceptance of the franchise, as tendered by the act of the legislature, under which the plaintiff claimed the title to the wagon road, was conceded by the demurrer. But, in the present instance, the case was tried upon its merits, and the findings of facts, which we think are amply sustained by the evidence, show that there never was any acceptance of the franchise, as tendered by the legislative enactment, under which alone the road could be acquired by the plaintiff through his grantor. The title of the act in question is: "An act to authorize the construction of a wagon road from the Cold Spring House, in Butte county, to Greenville, in Plumas county." The object had in view in the act must have been the construction of a wagon road between those two points. It was said in the former opinion in this case, where under the pleadings it was conceded that the plaintiff had constructed the road, that the manifestation of acceptance of the franchise was the building of the road within the time mentioned in the act. 80 Cal. 338, 22 Pac. Rep. 254. But, when the evidence was introduced on the present trial, it appeared that neither the plaintiff here, who succeeded to the rights of the original grantees, nor his grantor, ever built or constructed any road; that his grantor took possession and used a public road already constructed by the money of the taxpayers, paid out by the county authorities; but that he did nothing towards building the road, which should have been done to manifest acceptance of the grant. It will not be presumed that the legislature intended to turn over to the grantees in the act, private individuals, for their personal benefit, a public road already constructed by the county by means of public money; but rather that it intended what the title of the act under which the grant is made reasonably imports, that is, that the parties were to construct and maintain a road between two given points. This is in accordance with the rule that a private act, where there is doubt in respect to its interpretation, is to be construed most beneficially to the public interests. Bartram v. Turnpike Co., 25 Cal. 283; Spring Valley W. W. v. San Francisco, 52 Cal. 122. To constitute acceptance, it was necessary that the private parties should indicate such acceptance by building the road under the grant of the legislative act. It is not to be presumed that the legislature, as the appellant seems to think, was intent upon making a valuable franchise for private individuals, but that the intention was to facilitate public travel and convenience by the construction of an additional road between the points to and from which the road already constructed by the county ran. Private gain, and not the public good, would have been subserved by allowing private individuals wholly to appropriate a public road already constructed by the county, and to charge tolls for travel thereon from the taxpayers who had contributed to construct it. We are of opinion that the view taken by the trial court of the act in question was right, and should be upheld. As the finding of nonacceptance is conclusive in support of the judgment, and as it was warranted by the evidence, it becomes unnecessary to discuss any other point made by the appellant. We are of opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

Forsyth v. Dunagan et al. (No. 14,121.)

Highways—Dedication and Acceptance—Recorded Plats.

1. The owners of land subdivided it into lots with roads extending through them, recorded the plat, and marked the location of the roads by causing ditches to be dug on each side of them. They united in a deed to the county, conveying said roads to it on condition that it should "accept, declare, duly establish, and use the same as public highways." The county did not accept the conveyance until after nine years, and plaintiff had meanwhile been conveyed one of the lots, subject "to the right of way of the public over such portions of the land as may fall within any road laid out on such land." It did not appear that at the date of the conveyance the roads had been opened or actually used by the public, or that any conveyances had been made with reference to the recorded plat. Held that, the offer to dedicate such roads not having been accepted within a reasonable time, the board of supervisors would be enjoined from opening the same.

2. Evidence of the value of the land over which it was sought to open a road, and of improvements put thereon by plaintiff, was irrelevant and inadmissible.

3. Evidence of the manner in which the system of roads laid out in the subdivision connected with other roads was properly excluded, in the absence of evidence that conveyances had been made with reference to the recorded plat.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. Campbell, Judge

Action by William Forsyth against D. C. Dunagan and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. D. Tupper, H. H. Welsh, and F. H. Short, (Frank H. Short, of counsel,) for appellants. Church & Cory and E. F. Preston, for respondent.

Beatty, C. J. This is an action to enjoin the defendants, the members of the board of supervisors and a district road master of Fresno county, from opening a road through the land of the plaintiff. By the judgment of the superior court a temporary injunction was made perpetual, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

There is but little controversy as to the facts of the case. It appears that in the year 1878 F. Roeding was the owner of section 32 of a certain township in Fresno county. In conjunction with the owners of the adjoining sections, 31 and 32, he caused to be made and recorded a map of the entire tract, by which it was subdivided into 20-acre lots, with streets and roads extending through it north and south and east and west. On this plat or map so recorded the tract was designated as the "Nevada Colony," and the design was to sell the lots to settlers. Besides making and recording the map, the owners caused ditches to be dug on each side of the streets as surveyed, thus making their location on the ground, and in January, 1879, they united in a deed to the county of Fresno, by which they conveyed the roads so laid out to said county. But said conveyance was upon the express consideration that the county should "accept, declare, duly establish, and use the same as public highways." Among the roads so laid out and conveyed was a strip of 50 feet in width, extending north and south between the southwest and southeast quarters of said section 32. The county never in any way accepted said conveyance, or did anything in compliance with its conditions, until April, 1888, at which time the board of supervisors adopted a resolution declaring said streets and avenues public highways. At a subsequent date, they ordered the county surveyor to lay out a road 25 feet on each side of the half-section line, extending north and south through said section 32, and thereafter directed the road master of the district to open the road to the public, which he was proceeding to do, in obedience to such direction, when enjoined in this action. The plaintiff herein is owner of the southwest quarter of section 32, by grant from F. Roeding, dated December 6, 1881. In this grant the land conveyed is described as being a portion of the Nevada Colony, and it is made "subject nevertheless to the right of way of the public over such portions of the land herein granted as may fall within any road laid out on such land," etc. The southeast quarter of said section was conveyed to one Pugh, subject to the same reservation or exception. It does not appear that at the date of these conveyances the street or road in question had ever been opened or actually used by the public as a highway, or that Roeding or the proprietors of sections 31 and 32 had ever made any conveyances of lots or land in the Nevada Colony according to the recorded plat. An offer was made at the trial to prove the conveyance of a lot in section 33 according to said plat, but at what date—whether before or after the conveyances to plaintiff and Pugh—does not appear. Such being the case, plaintiff and Pugh inclosed the entire half section, obliterated the ditches defining the road or street between them; and the plaintiff, four years before the supervisors adopted their resolution declaring the road and avenues of the Nevada Colony public highways, planted the southwest quarter of section 32 in vines up to the half-section line,—or, in other words, he had planted in vines the 25-foot strip on the east side of his quarter section, which is embraced in the street or road as orginally laid out though the section.

It will be seen from this statement of the case that the principal question involved is whether the strip of land in controversy has been dedicated to the public as a highway. We do not think the facts show a dedication. The deed to the county was a mere offer of dedication, upon terms and conditions never accepted or complied with until long after the lapse of a reasonable time, and after the offer had been effectually revoked. So, also, the survey, marking, platting, and recording of the lands designated as the Nevada Colony was a mere offer to dedicate, revocable at the will of the proprietors or their successors until acceptance or user by the public, or conveyance by them of lots or blocks by reference to the streets. No such acceptance or user or conveyance occurred prior to the conveyance to plaintiff and Pugh, and the reservation or exception therein contained amounted to nothing, for the reason that the public had at that date no right of way over the land. After the conveyance to him of said southwest quarter, plaintiff might have kept the pending offer of dedication open, or might have renewed it if he had chosen to do so, but he did not. On the contrary, he and Pugh very clearly manifested their intention to revoke it by inclosing and planting the space laid out as a road. On the facts disclosed by the pleadings and evidence, we think the findings and conclusions of the superior court are clearly correct, because there was no acceptance or user of this road while the offer to dedicate was open, or within a reasonable time after it was made.

There are some errors assigned upon rulings of the superior court, excluding offered evidence, but they are without merit. The court did not err in excluding evidence of the value of the vines and of the strip of land sought to be taken. Such value was wholly immaterial. If the roadway had been dedicated the defendants had a right to open it, no matter how valuable the lands and vines. If it had not been dedicated the plaintiff had a right to resist the appropriation, no matter how worthless the lands and vines.

In the absence of any proof or offer to prove conveyance of lots by reference to the recorded plat of the Nevada Colony prior to the conveyance to plaintiff, the offer to prove the manner in which the system of roads therein laid out connected with other roads was irrelevant, and was properly refused.

A ruling of the court, excluding evidence of a user of the road in question, is specified as error. Counsel for appellants do not refer to the folio or page where such ruling is to be found, and I have failed to find it. There is evidence of the laying out and marking of the road in question and of other roads, both on the ground and on the recorded map, but no evidence or offer of evidence of any user by the public of this road. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Landregan v. Peppin. (No. 14,407.)

Quieting Title—Writ of Possession—Subsequently Acquired Title in Defendant—Pleading.

Upon recovery of judgment in an action to quiet title "by a person out of possession," he is entitled to "a writ for the possession of the premises," under Code Civil Proc. § 380, regardless of any adverse title to the land since acquired by defendant, notwithstanding that his complaint did not allege that he was out of possession, defendant's answer alleging possession in himself, and although, after the recovery of such judgment, plaintiff dismissed an action of ejectment contemporaneously brought. Beatty, C. J., and Harrison, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. Clough, Judge.

Action to quiet title by James T. Landregan against Joseph Peppin. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and an order for the issuance of a writ of possession, from which order defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodwin & Goodwin, for appellant. E. C. Robinson and W. W. Kellogg, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. This is an action brought under the provisions of section 738, Code Civil Proc., for the purpose of quieting title to certain quartz mines, situated in Plumas county. The complaint is in the usual form, and the answer denies the allegations thereof except as to the adverse claim, and further alleges that at and for a long time prior to the commencement of the action defendant was the owner of, in the possession and entitled to the possession of, all of said real estate. The court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and a decree was entered quieting plaintiff's title. After the entry of said decree plaintiff moved the court for an order to the sheriff that he be placed in possession of the property, and in support of said motion filed an affidavit setting forth the proceedings resulting in the decree, and also setting out the fact that at the commencement of said action plaintiff was out of possession, and the defendant was the party in possession, of the property. Defendant opposed the motion, and filed an affidavit setting forth the fact that, subsequent to the rendition of the decree, he obtained judgment on the merits against plaintiff, in an action of ejectment, to recover possession of the same land involved in this action. He also set out the acquisition by himself of an outstanding title created since the action was tried and determined. The court ordered the writ of possession to issue, and from this order defendant appeals. Section 738, Code Civil Proc., provides: "An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." Section 380 of the same Code reads: "In an action brought by a person out of possession of real property, to determine an adverse claim of an interest or estate therein, the person making such adverse claim and person in possession may be joined as defendants, and, if the judgment be for the plaintiff, he may have a writ for the possession of the premises, as against the defendants in the action, against whom the judgment has passed." It will be noticed that section 738, supra, which provides for the determination of adverse claims to realty, is very broad in its terms, and includes all adverse interests, from a claim of title in fee to the smallest leasehold, and unquestionably it is the duty of the defendant to set out his interest, whatever it may be, when called upon under this section of the Code. If he has an adverse claim which will support an issue at law upon which he desires a jury trial, it is his duty to set out that claim, make out that issue, and demand his jury trial. In this action it is not necessary to determine whether or not the pleadings were sufficient to entitle either party to a jury as to any of the issues created. If not sufficient, the defendant should have made them so, if his adverse claims of interest justified such a course, and, not having done so, he cannot now be heard to complain that he was deprived of his right to a jury trial. In Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. Rep. 1096, this court, in referring to section 738, supra, said: "The main effect of said section is to give parties the right to compel others by suit to litigate and determine controversies, in cases where such right did not before exist, but, if in such a suit issues arise which are clearly legal and cognizable in a court of law, the Code does not take away the right to have such issues tried by a jury." Appellant insists that plaintiff's complaint should have alleged that he was out of possession. The section does not appear to contemplate that the pleading should so state. What benefit could the defendant derive from such an allegation? How could he be misled by the absence of it? If alleged it would have created no issue, for it would not have been denied. In fact, defendant sets out possession in himself by his answer. Prior to the adoption of the Codes, a person out of possession could not bring an action to quiet his title, but now a party is not compelled to recover possession by an action at law, and then quiet his title in equity; but under the section of the Code previously quoted he has the right to secure all the relief in one action, and this was the sole object of the provision. We do not deem it essential that the judgment itself should direct the issuance of the writ of possession. The law is fully satisfied by a supplemental order to that effect. The section of the Code provides that if the judgment upon the main question, to wit, the adverse claim, be for the plaintiff, then he may have a writ for the possession of the premises. As already suggested, it is well settled that in an action of this character the defendant must set up whatever right of possession he may claim. When, therefore, as in this case, it has been adjudicated that defendant has no adverse claims or interests of any kind or nature whatever in this realty, the subject of litigation is exhausted, and if the plaintiff is out of possession the necessary effect of the judgment is that it entitles him to that possession. In speaking of a writ of assistance under a decree in foreclosure in Montgomery v. Middlemiss, 21 Cal. 107, this court said: "The legal effect of the decree is the same without the direction."

We do not think the fact that the defendant since the date of the judgment has purchased an outstanding title is a sufficient defense to the application for the writ of possession. Plaintiff's application for the writ is based upon the adjudicated right that the defendant, as against him, has no interest of any character. Defendant now claims a right to the possession, acquired subsequent to this adjudication, and which he insists is superior to the right there decreed. It is sufficient to say the court cannot determine the merits of defendant's claim upon this application. This is a proceeding upon affidavits, and no question of title can be litigated in this way. This is a hearing upon a motion, and a motion cannot be converted into a trial. There is but little authority upon this question, but the case of Kercheval v. Ambler, 4 Dana, 170, appears to be directly in point. At the same term of court, Forman and Ambler, in separate actions of ejectment, obtained judgments against one Kercheval. Forman was placed in possession under his decree, and thereupon leased the property to Kercheval. Kercheval relied upon his possession under the lease to defeat the writ of possession issued to Ambler, and the court said: "But he [Kercheval] alone is the party here, and, though he may have been a tenant, his possession was in fact his own and beneficial to himself, and he cannot, we think, defeat or evade Ambler's judgment against himself by interposing the unlitigated claims of a stranger to that judgment, however he may represent him. * * * After Ambler obtained his judgment, the appellant, as long as that judgment remained unreversed and unsatisfied, could not defeat or evade it by any act without the consent or fault of Ambler, and, of course, could not hold the possession against Ambler's execution, and in defiance of its authoritative mandate." And again: "If he have a better right than Ambler to the possession, his only remedy allowed by law is that of some legal process, when their respective claims to possession hitherto unlitigated may be tried and determined according to law." See, also, Ritchie v. Johnson, 50 Ark. 551, 8 S. W. Rep. 942. It appears that plaintiff began an action in ejectment against defendant for the recovery of this land upon the same day that the present action was commenced; that the action to quiet title came to judgment first, and thereupon, by stipulation of the parties, the ejectment was dismissed, each party paying his own costs. Appellant insists that under section 582, Code Civil Proc., this was a judgment on the merits, and therefore an adjudication that at that time appellant was entitled to possession of the land, and consequently was a perfect defense to the motion for the writ of possession. It is unnecessary to discuss the effect of this judgment of dismissal, under the peculiar facts of this case, although, as we have already decided that the effect of the judgment in this action was to declare plaintiff entitled to the possession of the land, it is difficult to discern any substantial benefit that could have been derived to plaintiff by prosecuting the ejectment suit to final judgment. In this case it is sufficient to say we do not think the judgment of dismissal, whatever its effect, could be set up to defeat the motion for a writ of possession. Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 547, and other cases upon this question, which have been called to our attention, decide that such judgment, if properly pleaded, will constitute a defense to another claim afterwards brought upon the same cause of action. That is not the case made by this record, and we are not disposed to extend the doctrine beyond the limits fixed by the authorities. Let the order be affirmed.

WILLAMETTE STEAM MILLS LUMBERING & MANUF'G CO. v. UNION LUMBER & SUPPLY CO. (No. 14,504.)

SALE AND DELIVERY—DELIVERY OF PART ONLY —VALUE OF DEFICIT.

1. One who agrees to sell and deliver a certain amount of lumber for a certain sum, can, though failing to deliver the full amount, recover for the amount delivered, it being received and retained.

2. Defendant's testimony that it cost him a certain amount to supply the lumber which plaintiff failed to deliver under the contract, will not, in the absence of any evidence on his part as to the value of the lumber, or that the amount of the cost of supplying it was necessary and reasonable, warrant a disturbance of the finding as to the amount that should be allowed therefor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by the Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manufacturing Company against the Union Lumber & Supply Company for the value of lumber sold and delivered. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hughes & Gordon, for appellant. Johnson & Borden and Sheldon Borden, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. The complaint contains two counts,—one for the value of certain posts and lumber alleged to have been sold by plaintiff to defendant, and delivered at Burwell, in Los Angeles county; and the other for certain other lumber sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant, to be used in the normal school building. The court found that defendant was indebted to plaintiff on the first count in the sum of $722.59, and on the second count in the sum of $715.23, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of said two amounts, viz., $1,437.82. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. As to the first count, it appears that there had been a special contract between the parties, by which plaintiff was to deliver to defendant at Burwell 39,340 feet of fencing lumber and 1,064 split posts for $782.48; terms, "spot cash upon delivery of the total amount of lumber and posts." The plaintiff delivered nearly all of the lumber mentioned in the contract, and it was accepted and retained by defendant; but there was a dispute between the parties as to whether the total amount had been delivered, and defendant refused to pay anything, upon the theory that nothing was due until the total amount had been delivered. Whereupon plaintiff commenced this action for the value of lumber sold and delivered. The court found that plaintiff had delivered all the lumber, except 3,422 feet of the 39,430 feet of fencing which the contract called for. The contention of appellant is that, as a portion of the lumber mentioned in the contract was not delivered, therefore nothing was due, and the action cannot be maintained. This contention involves the proposition that appellant could keep and use all the lumber received and retained by it without paying for it. There has been, no doubt, some conflict of authorities as to the rights of parties in the situation of the parties to this action; but the true rule is stated in the opinion of the court in Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 577. In that case the contract was for the delivery of "about fifty-three thousand pounds" of wool, and only 47,315 pounds had been delivered, but the defendants had retained the amount delivered. The court, in discussing defendant's right to recover damages for the part not delivered, alludes to the want of exactness growing out of the use of the word "about," and then proceeds as follows: "If, however, the quantity delivered was less than the quantity contracted for, the vendees were at liberty to refuse to accept it; and, having accepted a part, they might have returned that, and refused to accept less than the whole; but, having received and retained a part, they cannot refuse to pay for the part accepted." The only other point made by appellant as to the first count is that the court erred in not allowing defendant enough for the 3,422 feet of lumber not delivered. The court allowed $62.89, and it is contended that it should have been $82.62, because one of the defendant's witnesses testified that it cost defendant the latter sum to supply the lacking lumber. But, as defendant offered no evidence showing the value of the lumber, or that the amount of the cost of supplying it was necessary and reasonable, we are not warranted in disturbing the finding of the court on that point.

2. There is no contention about the amount, the price, or the delivery of the lumber sued for in the second count. The only point made by appellant is that the amount to be paid for the lumber was not due, because, as contended, there was a custom or usage by which payment need not be made until 60 days after delivery of the lumber. It is not necessary to consider here what the law is as to special customs, because the evidence about the existence of the custom contended for, and its application to the contract involved in this litigation, is not so free from conflict and uncertainty as to warrant us in disturbing the finding of the court that no credit was given. It is doubtful if the alleged custom, if it existed at all, was in vogue at the time of the contract, whether it was a mere courtesy, or something which amounted to a definite credit of 60 days, or whether it was not confined to a particular association of which plaintiff was not a member. Moreover, the alleged custom applied only to wholesale lumber dealers, and to contracts for entire cargoes; and we cannot say that the court erred in not finding from the evidence that the plaintiff was a wholesale dealer, and that the contract was for a cargo. We see no ground for a reversal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Ex parte HART. (No. 20,915.)

CONTEMPT—FAILURE TO PAY ALIMONY—VALIDITY OF DECREE.

A decree for divorce pursuant to Civil Code, § 139, for the offense of the husband, awarding alimony, is not void, although the period within which it was to be paid was not specified, it being payable until plaintiff's death or the modification of the decree, and a failure to pay the alimony is punishable as for contempt.

Petition of William N. Hart for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner remanded to custody.

James G. Maguire, for petitioner. Maguire & Gallagher, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner is imprisoned upon a charge of contempt of court, consisting in his refusal to pay alimony awarded to his divorced wife by the decree of divorce. He contends that the imprisonment is unlawful, because, as he claims, the decree as to the order for alimony is void, by reason of the fact that it does not specify the period during which the alimony is to be paid. As I construe the decree, it intends the payment of alimony to continue during the life of the plaintiff in the divorce suit, or until modified by the court. Such a decree the court had power to make in granting a divorce for the offense of the husband. Civil Code, § 139. The decree is, in my opinion, sufficiently certain in its terms. It is within the jurisdiction of the court, and can be enforced by process of contempt. The prisoner is remanded to custody.

MCMILLAN v. HAYWARD et al. (No. 13,073.)

LIMITATIONS — ACTIONS AGAINST ADMINISTRATORS —ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS.

1. The remarriage of an executrix, more than a year after taking out letters testamentary, but before the bar of the statute had attached to a debt in respect to which it had commenced to run in the lifetime of her testator, does not ipso facto cause her authority to cease; and an action—no claim having been made before—brought within one year after appointment of administrator with will annexed, but after the statutory bar had attached, is not saved by Code Civil Proc. § 353, which provides that, "if a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his representatives after the expiration of that time, and within one year after the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration."

2. Notice by an executrix to creditors is simply of probate procedure, and the giving or not giving of it does not affect the statute of limitations, nor does her failure to publish it affect a creditor who did not present his claim for allowance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by D. McMillan against L. A. Hayward, administrator, and others, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. Percy Wright and Jas. F. Tevlin, for appellants. W. B. Tyler and D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendants appeal from the judgment against them within 60 days; and the point made here is that the finding to the effect that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations is not sustained by the evidence, and is contrary to the other findings of fact. It appears that May 8, 1873, Frank Scherf executed a note secured by mortgage, which became due one year from the date thereof. That the mortgagor died, testate, November 15, 1875, and January 11, 1876, his widow was appointed executrix, and duly qualified. March 5, 1878, she married again, and her letters testamentary were revoked July 15, 1887. No notice to creditors was published by her. Hayward was appointed administrator with the will annexed September 6, 1887, and this suit was commenced September 14, 1887, against the administrator and the minor children of Scherf, his devisees, to foreclose the mortgage. No claim was ever presented against the estate for the amount due on the note and mortgage, and in the complaint all recourse against other property of the estate is expressly waived. The defense is the bar of the statute of limitations, (section 337, Code Civil Proc.,) which we think is fully sustained by the facts as above recited. Respondent, however, claims that his rights are saved by section 353 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "If a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his representatives after the expiration of that time, and within one year after the issuance of letters testamentary or of administration." Scherf died after the maturity of the note. The statute had therefore commenced to run, and would continue to run, unless it is brought within some express exceptions of the statute; and death is not made such, further than that the suitor may in such case commence his action within one year after letters are issued. This action was commenced neither within four years after the maturity of the note, nor within one year after letters were issued. Respondent contends that, inasmuch as the executrix married about 18 months after her appointment, but before the bar of the statute would have attached had Scherf lived, her authority ceased ipso facto, and suit could not have been brought to foreclose the mortgage until her successor was appointed. Therefore, since this statute was intended to extend, and not to shorten, the time, he had one year after the appointment of Hayward within which to begin his action. The evident purpose of section 353 is to secure to a party who has a cause of action against a decedent one year after the appointment of a legal representative within which to bring his action. This may or may not have the effect of extending the time. If it be necessary, in order that such person shall have one year after the appointment of a legal representative, then suit may be brought after the expiration of the general limitation; otherwise this section does not have, nor was it intended it should have, any effect whatever upon his rights. Such construction does not shorten his time, as limited by the general statute. It simply leaves him to that statute, because it was not necessary to extend the time in order to give him his year. The executrix had been acting as such more than one year before she remarried, long enough to have completed the administration and obtained her discharge. Had she done so, could respondent have asked to have the administration reopened, that he might have his time extended? In this respect he does not differ from any claimant against an estate. The fact that notice to creditors was not published cannot affect him, since he did not present his claim for allowance, and the giving or the not giving of that notice does not affect the general statute of limitations. That is simply of probate procedure. Indeed, respondent's case differs in no respect, so far as this aspect of it is concerned, from that of any other creditor of an estate. Any one is liable to lose a part of the period allowed by the statute of limitations for the commencement of his action if the other party dies. In case of judgments, the statute, in effect, says that he may sue at any time within five years. But, if his debtor die, he may be forced to present his claim within four months, and bring his suit within three months, thereafter. He might as reasonably as the plaintiff claim the right to revive the administration, and bring his action after such peridos. But we think the respondent mistaken in supposing that the authority of the executrix ceased upon her marriage. In Schroeder v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 343, 11 Pac. Rep. 651, this court held that the authority of the executrix does not cease ipso facto upon her marriage, but that she merely became incompetent, and may be proceeded against for removal, giving her an opportunity to admit or deny the marriage. The court say: "Are all the acts of an executrix who has secretly married, or married without the fact having reached the knowledge of the judge, absolutely void? If so, they are void, and may be attacked or disregarded after a final accounting and discharge. It would be difficult to distinguish between one never competent to serve as executrix and one whose capacity to serve as such has become extinguished. But if one originally appointed executrix was in fact under age, or a convict, she is clothed with all the powers of the office until she is suspended, or by proper proceedings removed. Does a different rule obtain where, by reason of an act done in pais, one originally competent has made herself incompetent?" This case was recognized, and its authority conceded, in Estate of Allen, 78 Cal. 581, 21 Pac. Rep. 426. The powers of the executrix, therefore, continued until her removal,—more than 11 years after her appointment,—and respondent had his full time within which to commence his action. Since the plaintiff did not present his claim to the executrix, and in his complaint waives all recourse except as against the mortgaged premises, it may be doubted whether his cause of action would come within the section discussed, if that had made any difference. But it is not necessary to decide such question, and it is only mentioned to prevent possible misapprehension. We think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vancliff, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

94 Cal. 376

In re Hewitt's Estate. (No. 14,590.)

Charitable Bequests—Validity.

Even if religious societies are not charitable or benevolent societies, within the meaning of Civil Code, § 1313, prohibiting bequests or devises to any "charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses," of more than one third of the estate, where testator leaves legal heirs, a bequest to the boards of trustees of several churches of more than one third of the estate, to be used by the trustees for missionary purposes, is a bequest in trust for charitable uses, within the prohibition of said section.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; JOSEPH H. BUDD, Judge.

Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, for appellant. Nutter & De Vries, Ed. I. Jones, P. W. Bennett, and F. T. Baldwin, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The executor of Nancy Hewitt, deceased, filed his petition for final distribution of his testator's estate, in which he claimed that under her will the residue of her estate, after the payment of certain specific legacies, debts, funeral and other expenses, should be divided equally among three Presbyterian churches. In the language of the will: "To the board of trustees of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of Alleghany, Pennsylvania; to the board of trustees of the United Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; and to the board of trustees of the First Presbyterian Church of Stockton, California,—share and share alike. It is my desire that the amounts bequeathed to the board of trustees of the several churches above named shall be used for missionary purposes, the same to be equally divided between foreign and domestic missions."

It is admitted that the residue of the estate is more than one third of the distributable assets of the testator's estate, and the distribution prayed for is resisted by certain heirs at law of the decedent on the ground that the clause of the will above quoted is null and void, except to the extent of the disposition of one third of the distributable assets above mentioned. In accordance with the claim of the heirs at law of the decedent, the court below made a decree of distribution to each of the churches heretofore mentioned, one ninth of the distributable assets of the estate; that is, to the three together, one third of such distributable assets. From this decree one of the churches only—the First Presbyterian Church of Stockton—appeals as to so much thereof as refuses to distribute to it a full one third of the residue of the estate of the decedent. The appellant, for a reversal of so much of the decree as is appealed from, claims that religious societies are not such charitable corporations as are mentioned in section 1313 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy, or each of them, shall be valid: provided, that no such devises or bequests shall collectively exceed one third of the estate of the testator leaving legal heirs, and in such case a pro rata deduction from such devises or bequests shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one third of such estate; and all dispositions of property made contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law." In Estate of Hinckley, 58 Cal. 511, it was said by this court: "It is admitted that 'learning' is a charitable use. We shall endeavor to show that 'religion,' in the broad sense in which the word is employed, is charitable. Thus the intent of the testator is made more specific, and those things are benevolent or beneficent which advance religion and learning and aid the poor." In Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 338, the court, in giving construction to a section of the statutes of that state, similar to section 1313 of our Civil Code, where a seminary for the instruction of theological students was the proposed devisee, said, among other things: "It is also 'benevolent,' for it was incorporated to impart religious instruction, without any purpose of gain. For the same reason it comes within the definition of 'charitable,' as charitable uses embrace gifts for general public uses, and may include both the rich and the poor." See, also, Perry, Trusts, § 701. But if religious societies, like the appellant, did not, as such, come within the definition of "charitable or benevolent," as meant by the statute, yet the will of the testator and the decree of the court both show, and there is nothing in the record to the contrary, that the bequests to these churches were in trust "for charitable uses," under section 1313 of the Civil Code, for "missionary purposes, the same to be equally divided between foreign and domestic missions." We conclude that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PEOPLE v. LEE YUNE CHONG. (No. 20,879.)

HOMICIDE—VERDICT—RECALLING JURY—APPEAL.

1. Where the jury, in a criminal case, after rendering a defective verdict, which is accepted by the court, are discharged, their functions as jurors cease, and they cannot be recalled, and directed to find a new verdict as they intended; and, if such proceedings are taken, they and the new verdict are a nullity.

2. In such case the verdict, as found in the first place and accepted by the court, stands unaffected by the subsequent proceedings; and this, notwithstanding that the order of the court that the jury be recalled also directed that the order directing the verdict to be recorded be set aside and vacated since the order, even if it could be construed as vacating the verdict, would be unauthorized and void, as the court has no control over a verdict after the jury have been discharged.

3. Since Pen. Code, § 1157, provides that, "whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict defendant, must find the degree of the crime," a verdict of guilty in a prosecution for murder, merely fixing the penalty at imprisonment for life, without stating the degree of murder of which defendant is guilty, is bad, and a judgment thereon will be reversed.

4. In such case defendant is not entitled to be discharged, but the supreme court, on reversing the judgment, will order a new trial, and this though defendant did not move for a new trial, but merely for his discharge; since under Pen. Code, § 1260, the appellate court may reverse, affirm, or modify a judgment appealed from, "and may, if proper, order a new trial."

5. On appeal in such case, defendant cannot raise the question of once in jeopardy, in opposition to the granting of a new trial, since that question can only arise on the new trial after an issue has been made by a plea of once in jeopardy.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Lee Yune Chong was convicted of murder, and appeals from the judgment, and from certain orders refusing to enter judgment of acquittal, and to direct him to be discharged. Judgment reversed and orders affirmed.

A. B. Ware and J. T. Campbell, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was accused of the crime of murder, and the jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty, and fix the penalty at imprisonment for life." This verdict was declared, and duly recorded, and the jurors were discharged for the term, and left the court room. Most of them went downstairs to the clerk's office to get warrants for their pay as jurors. Three or four of them went, by mistake, to the sheriff's office, on a still lower floor, where there was a conversation with a third party, who spoke approvingly of the verdict. In the clerk's office there was a controversy with the clerk about one day's pay, which occupied considerable time. A number of spectators mingled with the jurors as they went away from the court room, and the jurors considered themselves finally discharged, and free to talk about the case. Several of them did have conversations with different persons, who approved the verdict, and, among others, with one of the attorneys for the prosecution. After the jury had thus been discharged, the presiding judge, after having disposed of some other business, left the bench, and went towards or into his chambers. He then returned, and ordered the jury called back into the jury box, and told the clerk to make the following order: "That the order discharging the jury in the case of People vs. Lee Yune Chong be set aside and vacated, and also the order directing the verdict to be recorded be also set aside and vacated, and call the jury." The appellant was in court, and also his counsel, who had been notified to appear; and the latter objected and excepted to the order, saying that they were there only to protest against the action of the court in calling the jury back. The persons who had been jurors in the case were again brought together in the court room, and the court instructed them that their verdict was informal, and that they must amend it by finding the degree of the crime, etc. They then retired, and returned the following paper: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and fix the penalty at imprisonment for life." Appellant's counsel objected to all these proceedings, and excepted to the overruling of their objections, and moved for the discharge of the appellant, and excepted to the denial of said motion. The exact time which elapsed from the discharge of the jury until their return does not appear, one of the witnesses putting it from five to ten minutes; but it is clear that during that time they were beyond the control of the court, had thrown off their characters as jurors, and had mingled with their fellow citizens free from any official obligation. On the day appointed for rendering judgment appellant's counsel "moved the court to order judgment of acquittal, and that he be discharged from custody, and that the information herein be not further prosecuted, for the following reasons;" being substantially that the jury had been discharged without his consent, and without rendering a legal verdict against him, etc. The motion was denied, and appellant excepted. Judgment was then entered sentencing appellant to imprisonment for life. The judgment recited both the verdicts. The appellant appeals from the judgment, and also from the orders of the court refusing to enter judgment of acquittal, and to direct that appellant be discharged.

It is quite clear that all the proceedings by which the court reassembled the persons who had constituted the jury, and instructed them to find another verdict, and the so-called "second verdict" itself, were nullities. "With the assent of the jury to the verdict as recorded, their functions with respect to the case cease and the trial is closed;" and, "after the verdict is received and the jury discharged, * * * the control of the jury, and of the court, over such verdict is at an end. The court cannot alter it, nor can the jury be called to alter or amend it. As well might any other twelve men be called to alter it as the men who were jurors. The office of a juror is discharged upon the acceptance of his verdict by the court." Blum v. Pate, 20 Cal. 72; Sargent v. State, 11 Ohio, 472; Rigg v. Cook, 46 Amer. Dec. 473. The case of People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 7, cited by respondent, is not in point. In that case the court, noticing that the form of the verdict was irregular, before the verdict was finally accepted or the jury discharged, directed the jury to retire and reconsider their verdict. That course was entirely proper; and this court, on the appeal, after alluding to the duty of the trial court to see to the form of the verdict, say: "For that purpose the court can at any time while the jury are before it, and under its control, see that it is amended in form so as to meet the requirements of the law." The language hereinbefore quoted, to the effect that the functions of a jury cease with their assent to the recorded verdict, must be construed, of course, as applying to a final assent, followed by a discharge. A court would, no doubt, have the power to direct a jury to correct an informal verdict, although the mistake had not been discovered until after the verdict had been entered upon the minutes, "while the jury are before it and under its control." There might be peculiar circumstances under which questions difficult of solution would arise, but the facts in the case at bar are so broad and well defined as to bring it clearly within the general rule above stated. The case stands, therefore, as though there had been no attempt to revive the defunct jury, or to change the real verdict. The order that "the order directing the verdict to be recorded be also set aside and vacated," does not, in terms, vacate the verdict itself, but if it could be construed as in terms vacating the verdict it would be unauthorized and void.

The judgment must be reversed, however, because the verdict failed to find the degree of the crime. It has always been the statutory law that in a murder case the verdict of guilty must designate the degree of the crime of which the defendant is found guilty; and for many years the Penal Code has provided generally that, "whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime." Section 1157. And it has been held here in a number of cases that when the degree is not found by the verdict (when the crime has degrees) the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial granted. People v. Marquis, 15 Cal. 38; People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452; People v. Travers, 73 Cal. 580, 15 Pac. Rep. 293; People v. O'Neil, 78 Cal. 388, 20 Pac. Rep. 705.

Appellant's motion to be discharged was properly denied. While the failure of the jury to find the degree of the crime is an error for which the judgment must be reversed, it no more entitles appellant to a discharge than would any other reversible error committed during the progress of the trial. Appellant asks that the judgment be reversed, and that he be discharged; and contends that, as he did not move for a new trial, no new trial can be ordered. It will be observed that in the cases last above cited—where there was a failure to find the degree of the crime—new trials were ordered, though in most of them a new trial had not been asked by the appellant. Under section 1260, Pen. Code, the appellate court may reverse, affirm, or modify a judgment appealed from, "and may, if proper, order a new trial." It was expressly held in People v. Olwell, 28 Cal. 456, approved in People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, and People v. Travers, 77 Cal. 176, 19 Pac. Rep. 268, that—we quote from People v. Travers—"if a defendant in a criminal case is convicted and appeals, and the judgment is reversed, the appellate court may order a new trial, even though the defendant does not move for such new trial, and denies the power of the court to grant it." And the case at bar is clearly one in which it is proper that a new trial should be ordered.

Counsel for appellant argue the question of "once in jeopardy," but that question can arise only after an issue has been made by a plea of "once in jeopardy." It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss that question here, although it may not be out of place to say that the cases last above cited of People v. Olwell, People v. Barric, and People v. Travers are strong authorities against the position taken by appellant on that question. As to other points made, we see no error in giving or refusing instructions to the jury. There are a number of skeleton allusions in the brief to alleged errors in rulings upon the admissibility of evidence, but, as they are not argued or stated, we have not followed up the references to the transcript to see what they are. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial is ordered. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

REPLEVIN—JUDGMENT—DAMAGES—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

1. In an action to recover possession of certain charcoal, and damages for its detention, the verdict was as follows: "We, the jury, * * * find judgment for plaintiff in the following amount, to wit: Value of coal, $546.00; damages in pursuit of recovery of property, $384.00; total, $930.00." Held, that the verdict was a general finding that plaintiff was entitled to a return of the property, and a special finding as to value and damages.

2. It was proper to allow damages as compensation for the time and money expended in pursuit of the property. Arzaga v. Villalba, 24 Pac. Rep. 656, 85 Cal. 191, followed.

3. In replevin, upon the introduction of plaintiff's evidence as to the quantity and value of the coal alleged to be withheld, there was no abuse of discretion in permitting an amendment of the complaint so as to allege the detention of a larger quantity of coal, of greater value, and correspondingly increased damages.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mono county; O. F. Hakes, Judge.

Action by James S. Cain against M. J. Cody to recover possession of certain personal property and damages for its detention. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Virden, (Reddy, Campbell & Metson, of counsel,) for appellant. W. O. Parker, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. Action to recover possession of personal property, (2,850 bushels of charcoal,) or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had, and $384 damages for the wrongful detention thereof. The defendant denied that plaintiff was owner or entitled to possession of the property, denied that the value thereof exceeded $100, and denied all damages. But he avowed the taking and detention, and justified the same as sheriff, under a writ of attachment at suit of W. T. Elliot against one Hock Chung, alleging that the charcoal was the property of Hock Chung, and subject to the attachment. The cause was tried by a jury, whose verdict was as follows: "We, the jury impaneled to try the case in which J. S. Cain is plaintiff and M. J. Cody is defendant, find judgment for plaintiff in the following amount, to wit: Value of coal, $546; damages in pursuit of recovery of property, $384; total, $930." Upon this verdict the court rendered judgment that plaintiff recover possession of the charcoal described in the complaint, "to wit, 2,850 bushels, more or less," or the sum of $546, the value thereof, in case delivery cannot be had, and the sum of $384 damages for the detention of said personal property, together with plaintiff's costs. No objection to the form or substance of the verdict appears to have been made in the court below until 22 days after the verdict was recorded and the jury discharged.

[1] Rehearing granted.

1. It is urged by counsel for appellant that the verdict is insufficient, because it fails to find "the right of the plaintiff to the possession of the property," and therefore furnishes no basis upon which the judgment for a return of the property, or for the value thereof in case a return could not be had, can stand. Though informal, I think the verdict may be fairly construed to be a general verdict for the plaintiff, besides separately and specially finding the value of the property and assessing the damages. This general verdict for plaintiff responds to all issues as to which the law does not require a special verdict, and implies a finding that plaintiff was owner and entitled to the possession of the property, since no special verdict to this effect is required in an action of this kind. Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 288, 27 Pac. Rep. 668; Mendelsohn v. Anaheim Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657. The word "judgment" was evidently used by the jury in the sense of the word "verdict."

2. It is contended that the verdict is erroneous, for the reason that the jury allowed as damages compensation for the time and money expended in pursuit of the property. This question was well considered, and decided adversely to the views of appellant in the late case of Arzaga v. Villalba, 85 Cal. 191, 24 Pac. Rep. 656. Whether or not these damages should have been specially pleaded is not involved in this case, since no objection to the evidence thereof was made on this ground in the court below, and no point upon this question is made by counsel here.

3. During the trial, while the evidence for plaintiff as to the quantity and value of the coal was being given, plaintiff moved the court for leave to amend his complaint by inserting 2,850 bushels of charcoal, instead of about 1,500 bushels, and by inserting the sum of $712.50 as the value thereof, instead of $400, and by striking out the sum of $200 damages, and in lieu thereof inserting $384. The court took the motion under advisement until the evidence was closed, but before the case was submitted to the jury the court granted the motion. Before retiring, a juror, from his place in the box, asked the court if plaintiff's motion to amend his complaint was granted, and the court answered that it was. These amendments were not actually engrossed in the complaint until after the verdict of the jury had been rendered and recorded, when plaintiff's counsel asked the court to instruct the clerk to insert them in the complaint. The court so instructed, and the clerk then inserted them according to the order of the court; but the amendment as to the number of bushels of coal does not appear in the copy of the complaint in the transcript. It is insisted that the court erred in allowing these amendments. That it was within the discretionary power of the court to allow these amendments for the purpose of conforming the complaint to the evidence on the part of plaintiff, and that the action of the court in this respect will not be regarded as reversible error unless it appears that the defendant may have been injured thereby, seems to be well settled. Hooper v. Wells, 27 Cal. 35; Bank v. Stover, 60 Cal. 387; Cheney v. O'Brien, 69 Cal. 200, 10 Pac. Rep. 479; Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 Pac. Rep. 673. As to the number of bushels of coal, I think the amendment was unnecessary. The coal sued for was described in the complaint as being all the coal then in two certain buildings, and as being "about 1,500 bushels." The first part of the description, viz., "all the coal then in the two buildings," was sufficient to enable the officer or any person to find and identify the property sued for; and was limited by the last part of the description, "about 1,500 bushels," as it might have been had it been necessary to segregate or distinguish the coal sued for from other coal in the same buildings. Besides, there was no issue as to the quantity or identity of the coal sued for. The pleadings show that each party claims the same coal by the same description, to wit, all the coal in the two buildings. The defendant claims to have rightfully taken possession of it by virtue of writs of attachment and execution. Had the defendant prevailed in the action, he, as against the plaintiff, would have been entitled to the possession of all the coal in the two buildings at the time the action was commenced, even though the complaint had not been amended, and though the quantity had been proved to be 2,800 bushels, "more or less." As to the value of the coal, and as to the amount of damages, the pleadings were at issue before the complaint was amended; and it must be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the defendant was as well prepared as he could have been, with evidence, to reduce both the value and the damages to the lowest possible figure; and consequently that no additional preparation was necessary to meet or disprove the amendments of the complaint as to such value and damages; and as it does not appear that defendant stated to the court any ground or reason for his objection to the proposed amendments, or asked for any postponement of the trial to enable him to procure additional evidence, it is difficult to conceive how those amendments could have been unjustly prejudicial to his defense. On the contrary, so far as material, they appear to have been in furtherance of justice. Surely no abuse of the discretionary power of the court is made to appear.

4. For reasons above stated, the description of the property in the judgment, being the same as that contained in the complaint, is sufficiently definite.

5. Appellant's points on the admission of evidence on the part of plaintiff are not sufficiently plausible to require special consideration.

6. The instructions given to the jury were quite as favorable to the defendant as he was entitled to ask. The instruction asked by defendant, numbered 4, so far as correct, was embodied in the instruction given numbered 1. If there had been no evidence of a sale from McBride to plaintiff of a part of the coal sued for, the court might have so instructed the jury, as that was a question of law; but if, in the opinion of the court, there was evidence tending to prove such sale, the question as to whether such evidence was sufficient to prove a sale of all the coal, or only a part of it, was the only question that could have been properly submitted to the jury; and since it clearly appears that the evidence tended to prove a sale of all the coal sued for, it follows that, so far as the requested instruction submitted to the jury the question as to whether or not there was any evidence of such sale, it was erroneous, and was properly refused. The requested instruction numbered 6 was properly refused, for the reason (if for no other) that it excluded damages as compensation for time and money expended in pursuit of the property. So far as the requested instruction numbered 8 is correct, it is substantially embraced in the instructions given numbered 3, 6, and 7. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

LILLIS et al. v. PEOPLE'S DITCH CO. (No. 13,807.)[1]

RES ADJUDICATA—CONSTRUCTION OF JUDGMENT—PAROL EVIDENCE—WATER RIGHTS.

1. In an action to enjoin the diversion of "any water" from a river, and the obstruction thereof by "any" dam, defendant claimed a right, by adverse user, to divert "14,400 inches per second, under a four-inch pressure." It was adjudged that plaintiff's cause of action was barred, the court finding specially that defendant had adversely diverted "one hundred cubic feet per second, under a four-inch pressure." Held, in a subsequent action by plaintiff to enjoin the diversion of a greater quantity of water than "14,400 cubic inches per second," that defendant was not estopped by the first judgment to claim that it had acquired the right to divert more than that quantity, since the special finding in the first action should be construed to mean that it had a right to 100 miners' feet, equal to 14,400 miners' inches, per second, under a four-inch pressure, the amount intended to be claimed in the answer; and judgment was properly rendered that defendant was entitled to an equivalent quantity, "450 cubic feet of water per second," under the evidence, which showed, in addition to the rate at which the water would flow under such pressure through an aperture of 100 square feet, that defendant, when taking steps to appropriate the water under Civil Code, § 1415, after posting notices claiming 14,400 cubic inches per second under a four-inch pressure, constructed a ditch of sufficient capacity to carry off 777,600 cubic inches, equal to 450 cubic feet, per second, rather than 14,400 cubic inches only.

2. The judgment in the first action being ambiguous, parol evidence as to the capacity of the ditch was admissible to aid in construing it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by S. C. Lillis and others against the People's Ditch Company for an injunction. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Brown & Daggett, (Daggett & Adams, of counsel,) for appellants. N. O. Bradley, G. E. Lawrence, and W. D. Tupper, (Bradley & Farnsworth, of counsel,) for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The object of this action is simply to enjoin the defendant (a corporation) from diverting from the channel of Kings river, into its ditch in Tulare county, a greater quantity of water than 14,400 cubic inches per second, on the ground that it had been adjudged by the superior court of that county, in a former action between the same parties, that this defendant, as against the plaintiffs, was entitled to divert only that quantity of water. In their complaint in this action the plaintiffs pleaded the former judgment as an estoppel. Judgment herein was in favor of the defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, made on a bill of exceptions, which, among other things, contains a copy of the judgment roll in the former action.

The principal question presented for decision is, what was adjudged in the former action as to the quantity of water to which defendant was entitled? The former action was of the nature of a common-law action on the case, brought by the plaintiffs herein on September 11, 1883, to recover from this defendant damages for the diversion of water from Kings river, to the injury of plaintiffs' riparian rights upon that stream; and, in addition to this, sought equitable relief by injunction against a continuance of the diversion complained of. The plaintiffs' prayer in that action was that plaintiffs recover damages in the sum of $60,000, and that defendant be perpetually enjoined "from diverting any water from the channel of Kings river by means of said ditch or dam, or either of them; and from placing or maintaining in the bed or channel of said Kings river any dam or obstruction; and from interfering in any manner with the free and natural flow of the waters of said stream in their natural channel." The allegations of the complaint in that action, if true, were sufficient to entitle the plaintiffs to all the relief they prayed for. As to the quantity of water diverted, it was alleged that defendant had diverted a large quantity,—all the water,—so that there was none left flowing in the river below the head of defendant's ditch.

[1] Rehearing granted.

The answer in the former action denied the alleged riparian rights of the plaintiffs; denied that it had diverted any more water from the river than it was entitled to divert; alleged that in 1874 it "acquired the right, and has ever since had, and still has, the right to divert from said river, and to use for the purposes aforesaid, 14,400 inches per second, under a four-inch pressure, of the waters thereof," and that in 1875 it constructed across the river "a dam of sufficient height and strength only to turn into its ditch the quantity of water to which it was and is entitled;" and further alleged a continuous adverse user of its right so acquired during a period of more than five years before the commencement of that action; and further alleged "that the cause of action set forth in plaintiffs' complaint is barred by the provisions of sections 318, 319, Code Civil Proc." Upon the issues as to plaintiffs' alleged riparian ownership of lands on the stream below the point of defendant's diversion, the court found for the plaintiffs. But, upon the issues as to the alleged adverse appropriation and user by defendant, the court found that in January, 1874, "defendant, under the laws of this state, and in conformity therewith, publicly, openly, peaceably, notoriously, and adversely to the plaintiffs and to the whole world, constructed its ditch and dam, as hereinbefore found, and took from the waters of Kings river one hundred cubic feet per second under a four-inch pressure, * * * and diverted the same into its said ditch, * * * and has continued so to divert such water from about the 1st day of January, 1874, down to the time of the commencement of this [former] action." The finding further proceeds to state all the requisite acts and facts to constitute an adverse user from January, 1874, until September, 1883, and concludes as follows: "Wherefore, as conclusions of law, the court finds that plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, and that they are not entitled to recover anything, but that defendant is entitled to recover its costs herein, taxed at $382.89. Let judgment be so entered." Accordingly the judgment in the former action was simply "that plaintiffs take nothing by this action," and that defendant recover its proper costs. In the present action the court found as facts that, continuously from 1874 until the commencement of the former action, the defendant diverted from the river, and conducted through its ditch, adversely to the plaintiffs, 450 cubic feet of water per second, and that it never had diverted more than that quantity at any time before the commencement of this action, (June 9, 1888,) "or any greater quantity of water than that which it had always claimed that it appropriated and had acquired the right to divert prior to said year 1884;" and as conclusions of law found "that it is entitled to take and divert from said Kings river, as against plaintiffs, four hundred and fifty cubic feet of water per second; that plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitation; and plaintiffs are not entitled to recover anything, but the defendant is entitled to recover its costs herein incurred. Let judgment be entered accordingly;" and judgment was so entered. The evidence was abundantly sufficient to justify the finding of these facts, and these facts justified the conclusions of law. But appellants claim that the former judgment estopped the defendant from claiming or proving a right to more than 100 cubic feet of water per second, because, they say, the findings of fact in the former action limited defendant's right to 100 cubic feet per second.

Whether or not the former judgment was merely erroneous is not in question here, although, if uncertain, it may be construed for the purpose of ascertaining what was expressly, or by necessary implication, adjudged. Code Civil Proc. § 1908, subd. 2, provides that, in cases of this kind, "the judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest." And section 1911 declares, "That only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto." These sections of the Code are in harmony with the weight of authority in other states. Freem. Judgm. § 256. The former judgment was expressly based solely upon the defense that plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations; and necessarily so, because all other issues were expressly decided in favor of plaintiffs. Besides, this defense is a confession and avoidance of plaintiffs' cause of action.

Section 458 of the Code of Civil Procedure permits this defense to be pleaded by mere reference to the sections pleaded, without stating the facts constituting the defense; which facts, however, are implied in that form of the plea, and, if controverted, must be proved by defendant; and, being new matter constituting a defense, they are deemed controverted. Section 462, Code Civil Proc. The principal fact constituting this defense, thus implied in the plea, and controverted by the implied replication, is the uniform and continuous adverse user by defendant during a period of five years, coextensive with the greatest quantity of water diverted at any time during that period. In other words, the issue raised by the implied replication to the plea extends over and covers all diversions of water by defendant during that period, and a general finding by the court "that plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations" is sufficient, (Gaslight Co. v. Dameron, 67 Cal. 663, 8 Pac. Rep. 595,) and necessarily implies all that is implied in the plea, viz., all the facts required to constitute a complete defense, including the requisite adverse user to give title to defendant; since a plea of the statute of limitations by mere reference to the sections pleaded, according to section 458, Code Civil Proc., is a good plea of a prescriptive right to the use of water in cases of this kind. Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. Rep. 379. That the court denominated this finding a "conclusion of law" is of no consequence; for, conceding that it is a conclusion of law, the Code authorizes it to be pleaded and found as the representative and equivalent of the facts from which it is drawn. The Code makes this an exception to the general rule requiring facts only to be pleaded, for which, perhaps, no sufficient reason is perceptible; yet without doubt the legislature had power to make the exception.

From the foregoing considerations it would seem to follow that it was necessary to the former judgment sustaining the plea of the statute of limitations that the court should have found that the adverse user was commensurate with all diversions of water by defendant during the period necessary to give defendant a prescriptive right, and thereby to complete the defense that plaintiff's cause of action was wholly barred; otherwise the defense was incomplete, and could not have been sustained as to the whole cause of action, but only as to a part of it; in which case the plaintiffs must have recovered, at least, nominal damages. Had the defendant diverted only 100 feet during the whole period of five years' adverse user, but had diverted 200 feet during only the last two years of that period, the plea of the statute could not have been sustained as a defense to the diversion of the additional 100 feet during the last two years.

But for the merely affirmative finding in the former action, that the defendant adversely diverted and used "one hundred cubic feet per second, under a four-inch pressure," it would be clear that the finding "that plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations" necessarily implies that defendant's adverse user during said period of five years comprehended all diversions by defendant for which it otherwise would have been liable, whether such diversions were at the rate of 100 cubic feet of water per second, as found by the court in the former action, or at the rate of 450 cubic feet per second, as found by the court in this action. But it is contended for appellants that the finding in the former action specially limits the adverse user, and consequently the prescriptive right of the defendant, to 100 cubic feet of water per second, and that this special limitation must prevail over anything inconsistent with it in the more general findings in the same action. Conceding that, as a general rule, specific findings prevail over general findings which are inconsistent with them, I think this case furnishes no occasion for the application of the rule, for the reason, if for no other, that the special finding in the former action, properly construed, is not inconsistent with the general finding that plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, or with anything implied in this general finding. That the so-called "special finding" is ambiguous, uncertain, and therefore a proper subject of construction, appears upon its face. It cannot be so construed as to give effect to all its words and phrases of well-defined meaning. Either the phrase "under a four-inch pressure," or the words "cubic feet per second," must be denied any effect; and the question is, which of these shall be rejected?

The answer of the defendant in the former action alleged that in 1874 it acquired the right to divert and use 14,400 "cubic inches" of water per second, "under a four-inch pressure;" and the special finding is that in 1874 "defendant, under the laws of this state and in conformity therewith, * * * took from the waters of Kings river one hundred cubic feet per second, under a four-inch pressure," etc., which is equal to 172,800 cubic inches, and nearly 12 times 14,400 cubic inches, to which defendant alleged it had acquired the right. "The laws of this state," under and in conformity with which the court found that the defendant had acquired the right to one hundred cubic feet per second, must have been those contained in the Civil Code, § 1415, which is as follows: "A person desiring to appropriate water must post a notice in writing, in a conspicuous place, at the point of intended diversion, stating therein: (1) That he claims the water there flowing to the extent of [giving the number] inches, measured under a four-inch pressure; (2) the purposes for which he claims it, and the place of intended use; (3) the means by which he intends to divert it, and the size of the flume, ditch, pipe, or aqueduct in which he intends to divert it. A copy of the notice must, within ten days after it is posted, be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which it is posted."

The rule of measurement prescribed by this section is not by cubic inches, but by square inches, according to the well-known rule of miners' measurement, by which the "four inch pressure" is made an effective factor, which cannot be disregarded. An inch of water, by this rule of measurement, is the quantity that will be forced through an aperture of one inch square by a pressure of water four inches in depth above the aperture. Consequently one foot of water, by this measurement, would be equal to 144 square inches upon a cross section of the stream, and 100 feet would equal 14,400 square inches. Assuming that the head gate, through which the water is to be measured and admitted into the ditch, is 40 feet wide, (which accords with the evidence in this case,) the gate would have to be raised 2½ feet to admit the passage of 100 feet, or 14,400 inches, by the miners' or Civil Code rule of measurement. Then, in order to pass 450 cubic feet of water per second,—the quantity awarded to defendant in this action,—the water would have to flow through the gateway at the rate of 4½ feet per second, which would be equal to a rate of 270 feet per minute, or about 3 miles per hour. Assuming that, under a pressure of 4 inches, the water would flow at this rate, the quantity passing the gate per second would be precisely equal to 14,400 miners' inches, and also to 100 miners' feet. Therefore, if the special findings of the court on the former trial, as to the number of inches and feet of water, are construed to mean miners' inches and miners' feet, those findings will be perfectly consistent with each other and with defendant's answer in that action. Besides, they will not appear to be inconsistent with the findings in this action, since there is no evidence that 100 feet, by miners' measurement, is not equal to the 450 cubic feet per second, to which in this action the defendant was adjudged to be entitled. No attempt appears to have been made at the trial of this action to reduce the "450 cubic feet per second" to miners' feet, nor to reduce the 100 miners' feet to cubic feet per second. The finding that defendant acquired its right to the water under and in conformity with the laws of this state, (Civil Code,) and that the water was to be measured by inches or feet under a four-inch pressure, plainly indicate that the miners' rule of measurement, adopted by the Civil Code, was intended. Yet these were disregarded as meaningless, because inconsistent with the words "cubic feet per second;" and thereby the findings of fact were made inconsistent with each other, and inconsistent with the judgments in both actions. Why not, rather, reject the words "cubic feet per second," and thereby make the findings of fact consistent with each other, and consistent with both judgments? These ends are sufficient of themselves to turn the scale in favor of rejecting the words "cubic feet per second." But there is another circumstance which may be considered favorable to this construction, and which consists of the acts of the defendant, by its agents, under and immediately after the posting of its notice in accordance with section 1415 of the Civil Code, claiming "14,400 cubic inches per second under a four-inch pressure." Instead of constructing a small ditch of a capacity to carry merely 14,400 cubic inches per second, equal to about 8⅓ cubic feet per second, the defendant proceeded to construct a ditch of about 20 miles in length, and of sufficient capacity to carry 777,600 cubic inches per second, equal to 450 cubic feet per second, being of about 50 times the capacity required to carry 14,400 cubic inches per second, yet, presumably, of no greater capacity than required to carry 14,400 miners' inches. Through this ditch defendant continued to divert water to its full capacity, without interruption, for more than five years before the commencement of the former action. These acts show that, by its notice under the Code, the defendant intended miners' inches, and not cubic inches; and the findings of the court in the former action must have been so intended, and should be so construed. It cannot reasonably be presumed that in the former action the court intended to award to the defendant 11 times as much water as it claimed in its answer; yet, by the construction contended for, that court awarded 100 cubic feet per second, which is more than 11 times 14,400 cubic inches per second,—the quantity claimed by the answer. No doubt the intention of the court was to give defendant the equivalent of the number of inches claimed, (14,400,) reduced to feet, (100;) and, construing them to mean miners' inches and miners' feet, the reduction was correct, but, if cubic inches and cubic feet were intended, it was wildly erroneous. The effect of the findings and judgment in the present action is to reject the words "cubic feet per second," in the former findings, and to give effect to the words "under a four-inch pressure;" which, under all the circumstances, I think to be a correct construction of those findings. The parol evidence tending to prove the capacity of the ditch, and the quantity of water actually diverted during the adverse user, prior to the former action, was properly admitted as an aid to the construction of the former judgment, which, upon its face, is ambiguous and uncertain as to the quantity of water awarded to defendant in that action, and it could have had no other effect prejudicial to the plaintiffs. Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 266; Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 521; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. Rep. 379. The objection to this evidence improperly assumed that the former judgment was too plain to admit of construction, and that the effect of this evidence was to contradict it. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment affirming the order appealed from.

Ex parte GREEN. (No. 20,925.)

MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE—VALIDITY—IMPRISONMENT FOR NONPAYMENT OF FINE.

Act March 13, 1883, empowered the city of Pomona "to pass ordinances not in conflict with the constitution and laws of the state or of the United States," and to punish the "violation of any ordinance" by "fine or imprisonment or both," the fine not to exceed "three hundred dollars" and the imprisonment not to exceed three months. Const. art. 11, § 11, authorizes any city to make and enforce all police and other regulations not in conflict with general laws. Pen. Code, § 1215, provides that if a judgment is "for imprisonment, or a fine and imprisonment until it be paid," the defendant must be "detained until the judgment is complied with." Held, that an ordinance of said city might provide that a violation thereof should be punished by imprisonment "for ten days and by fine of one hundred and fifty dollars," and that, in default of payment of the fine, defendant should be imprisoned "until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every two dollars of such fine remaining unpaid."

MCFARLAND and PATERSON, JJ., dissenting.

Ex parte Rosenheim, 23 Pac. Rep. 372, 83 Cal. 390, distinguished.

In bank. Petition of Green for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner remanded.

Westerman & Broughton, for petitioner.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The return of the city marshal of the city of Pomona shows that he holds the petitioner in custody in the city jail of said city under and by virtue of a commitment issued out of the recorder's court of said city, which recites that petitioner was convicted in said court of the crime of misdemeanor, committed in said city, and upon such conviction said court ordered and adjudged that for said offense petitioner be imprisoned in the city jail of said city of Pomona for a period of 10 days and fined $150, and that, in default of the payment of said fine, he be imprisoned in said city jail in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for each and every $2 of said fine until the said fine be wholly satisfied, not exceeding 75 days, and that he be discharged on payment of such proportion of said fine as shall not have been satisfied by imprisonment at the rate prescribed. Then follows the command to said marshal to take and imprison petitioner in said jail 10 days, and also in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for each and every $2 of the fine not otherwise satisfied, not exceeding 75 days, and to discharge petitioner upon payment into court of such remaining portion of said fine as shall not have been satisfied by imprisonment at the rate above prescribed.

The misdemeanor of which petitioner was convicted consisted of a violation of section 1 of ordinance 89 of said city, which provides, among other things, that "every person convicted of violating this section of this ordinance shall be punished by imprisonment in the city jail of the city of Pomona for ten days, and by fine of one hundred and fifty dollars, (and the judgment of fine shall direct that, in default of payment of such fine, or any part thereof, defendant shall be imprisoned in the jail of the city of Pomona until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every two dollars of such fine remaining unpaid.)" If that provision of the ordinance be valid, the judgment, commitment, and imprisonment of petitioner are legal beyond any question. And the contention of petitioner's counsel is that the ordinance, so far as it imposes any imprisonment for a failure to pay a fine, is invalid. All the powers of a corporation are derived from the law and its charter, and it cannot enlarge, diminish, or vary its powers by ordinance or by law. The city of Pomona derives its powers from an act to provide for the organization, incorporation, and government of municipal corporations, approved March 13, 1883, under which that city is incorporated as a city of the fifth class. Power is conferred by that act upon the board of trustees of said city, "to pass ordinances not in conflict with the constitution and laws of the state or of the United States. To impose fines and penalties and forfeitures for any and all violations of ordinances, and for any breach or violation of any ordinance to fix the penalty by fine or imprisonment or both; but no such fine shall exceed three hundred dollars nor the term of such imprisonment exceed three months. To do and perform any and all other acts and things necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this chapter, and to exact and impose within the limits of such city all other local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as do not conflict with general laws." The power to impose fines is clearly conferred, but no mode is provided for their collection. We think in such a case it is clearly within the power of a municipal corporation to adopt any reasonable mode for the enforcement of the payment of any fine that it is authorized to impose. We think this power is clearly implied in the power to impose a fine. The payment of fines has always been enforced by imprisonment. Section 1215 of the Penal Code provides that, "if the judgment is for imprisonment, or a fine and imprisonment until it be paid, the defendant must forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer, and by him detained until the judgment is complied with." The provision of the ordinance for the enforcement of the payment of a fine by imprisonment is not in conflict with any general law. In this country, courts have often affirmed the general incidental power of municipal corporations to make ordinances, but have always declared that ordinances passed in virtue of the implied power must be reasonable, consonant with the general powers and purposes of the corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws or policy of the state. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 253.

In addition to the powers enumerated in the incorporating act, the trustees of the city of Pomona are authorized "to do and perform any and all other acts and things necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this chapter, [the chapter relating to municipal corporations of the fifth class,] and to exact and enforce within the limits of such city all other local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as do not conflict with general laws." We can conceive of nothing more necessary and proper for carrying out the provision empowering the board of trustees to impose fines for violations of ordinances than a mode of enforcing the payment of them. Without the power of enforcing the payment of such fines, the imposition of them would be nugatory. The constitution of this state provides that "any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce, within its limits, all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." Const. art. 11, § 11. It is not claimed that the ordinance which petitioner was convicted of having violated conflicts in any manner with any general law. Therefore the power to enforce it is expressly conferred by the constitution, subject, of course, to the rule that the mode of enforcing it be a reasonable one. The whole term of imprisonment fixed by the ordinance is less than three months, and the circumstance that the greater part of the term fixed by the ordinance is conditional is not unfavorable to those who are imprisoned. The option given might, under the incorporating act, have been withheld, and the petitioner have been imprisoned for a longer period than he can be under the ordinance. And yet the petitioner's main objection to the ordinance is that it does not provide for an imprisonment of 3 months, instead of 85 days, with the option of paying a fine, and avoiding 75 of the 85 days of imprisonment. We think the ordinance is clearly within the powers conferred by the incorporating act, and not in conflict with any general law.

In Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 390, 23 Pac. Rep. 372, a case which seems to be very much relied on by counsel for petitioner, the court construed a provision of the Penal Code, and held that it did not authorize imprisonment for the nonpayment of a fine where the judgment imposed both imprisonment and fine. In that case the judgment was that the defendant be imprisoned for the full term fixed by the Code, and afterwards imprisoned until the fine should be satisfied, at a specified rate per day. We are not now called upon to construe any such provisions of law as were construed in that case. All that we are required to do in this case is to decide whether the ordinance which petitioner was convicted of violating is a valid one. If valid, the legality of the imprisonment of petitioner is unquestionable. We are not satisfied that the ordinance is invalid; therefore the petition is dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent. The maximum term of imprisonment prescribed by the ordinance is 10 days, and I do not think that the petitioner can be legally imprisoned longer than that time. The law under which he was tried is not the charter, but the ordinance; and, as that law prescribes 10 days as the maximum term of imprisonment, he cannot, under the general statutory rule, be imprisoned longer than that time under the guise of working out a fine.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. When the legislature said that violations of the ordinances might be punished by "fine or imprisonment or both" it meant to provide for precisely the same kind of punishment it has provided for in a multitude of cases in the Penal Code, where the court is authorized to impose a fine or imprisonment or both. We have held here in several cases lately that the power to impose a fine or imprisonment or both does not include the power to impose a fixed term of imprisonment and a fine, and also imprisonment for nonpayment of the fine. The judgment may be for a fixed term of imprisonment, and a fine to be enforced by execution; but it cannot be for a fixed term, a fine, and imprisonment in satisfaction of the fine. Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. Rep. 372; Lowrey v. Hogue, 85 Cal. 600, 24 Pac. Rep. 995. It seems to me that there is an obvious inconsistency between those decisions and the decision in this case. It is said that the trustees are clothed with general authority to enforce all municipal regulations, and that imprisonment is a common and not an unreasonable mode of enforcing payment of a fine. The same thing could have been said in the Rosenheim and other cases; but the question there considered—as it is here—is not as to the reasonableness of the method of enforcing payment or satisfaction of the fine, but the power of the court to impose the additional penalty. I am unable to appreciate the force of the suggestion that, the whole term of imprisonment being less than three months,—the maximum term of imprisonment allowed by the charter,—the petitioner cannot complain. The legislature has provided that the penalty for battery shall be a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding 6 months, or both. Lowrey was convicted of battery, and was sentenced to serve a term of 30 days and pay a fine of $200, with the usual alternative of imprisonment, until the fine should be paid at the rate of one day for every dollar thereof. If he had remained in jail under the judgment, according to its terms, until the fine was satisfied, the imprisonment would not have exceeded the maximum term which the justice might have imposed; and yet we held that the alternative clause was void. Lowrey v. Hogue, supra. I think the same thing should be done here.

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACT PRELIMINARY TO INCORPORATION—CONSTRUCTION—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—JUDICIAL OPINIONS—DICTA—SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES.

1. By an instrument preliminary to incorporation the subscribers agreed to take the number of shares set opposite their names respectively, and to pay 20 per cent. of the par value of the shares so subscribed to one W. By the same instrument the subscribers appointed defendants and another as their agents and as the agents of the corporation to be formed, with authority to purchase property for the corporation, and to draw from W. the money paid to him, and to use such money in paying for the property purchased. Held, that defendants and their colleague were authorized, as agents of the subscribers, to negotiate for the purchase of property until the formation of the corporation, when their agency for the subscribers would cease, and thereafter they should act for the corporation.

2. Such instrument did not give defendants and their colleague the custody of the money paid to W.

3. In a prior action by W. for the recovery of the 20 per cent. agreed to be paid by the subscribers, to which action the corporation was not a party, any statement in the opinion rendered by the supreme court on appeal thereto, that the corporation had no right to the custody of the money collected by W., was dictum binding neither on the court nor on the corporation.

4. In an action by the corporation against W. for the money collected by him as money held by him for plaintiff's use and benefit, where defendants, who had repudiated their agency for plaintiff, were substituted as defendants for W., the substitution of their coagent also was not necessary for the determination of plaintiff's right to the money.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

Action by San Joaquin Land & Water Company against F. M. West, for whom J. L. Beecher and George Gray were substituted. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. S. Pillsbury and W. L. Dudley, (Gordon Blanding, of counsel,) for appellants. Baldwin & Campbell, S. D. Woods, and P. W. Bennett, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The controversy involved in this action arises out of the construction to be given to the terms of an instrument executed between the subscribers thereto for the incorporation of the plaintiff, and preliminary to such incorporation. The instrument itself was before this court in the case of West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 19, 21 Pac. Rep. 1123, and is there set out at length. It was then held that West was authorized to collect in his own name 20 per cent. of the amount that the parties to that instrument had agreed to subscribe to the capital stock of the plaintiff, by reason of their express agreement therein to pay it to him. After that decision the subscribers paid this 20 per cent. to West, and at the commencement of this action he had in his hands of the amount so collected by him, $35,861.25, for the recovery of which the plaintiff brought this action, as money had and received by him to and for its use and benefit. After the commencement of the action, West, under the order of the court therefor, paid the money to the clerk of the court, to be held subject to the order of the court, and the appellants were substituted as defendants in his place, and answered the complaint. Upon the trial of the issues the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendants who were substituted for West have appealed.

1. The agreement in question is of that character which is not unfrequently made by the subscribers to a corporation prior to its actual incorporation, and as preliminary thereto,—its object being for their mutual benefit and protection until the organization of the corporate body, and also for the ultimate benefit of the corporation. Upon the formation of the corporation such an agreement, with its advantages and rights, inures to the benefit of the corporation, irrespective of any agreement or want of agreement to that effect, and notwithstanding it may contain special provisions for carrying its own terms into execution. By the express terms of this instrument West was simply "the agent to collect the amount" which should become due to the plaintiff by virtue of the subscription to its capital stock which the parties to the instrument should make in pursuance of their agreement. By the instrument itself the subscribers agreed to "take," i. e., to subscibe for, the number of shares set opposite their names respectively, and "to pay twenty per cent. of the par value of said shares so subscribed, and that they would pay 'the same' to West in five days after the articles of incorporation were filed. The only money which the subscribers agreed to pay to West was for the stock which they should subscribe for to the plaintiff, and West was simply constituted the 'agent' for the corporation, to collect the amount which should become 'due' under their subscription, and, after its collection, to hold it for the use and benefit of the corporation. By the same instrument the subscribers appointed the appellants, together with one Shippee, as their 'agents,' and 'the agents of the corporation so to be formed,' with authority to 'negotiate for the purchase' of property 'for said corporation,' and to draw from West any or all moneys paid to him, 'and use said money for paying for same.'" Giving to this language its reasonable construction, it was an authority to these three individuals, as agents of the subscribers prior to the organization of the corporation, to make negotiations for the purchase of the property, and that, upon the formation of the corporation, their agency for the subscribers should cease, and thereafter they should act for the corporation. They could not be the agents of the subscribers and of the corporation for the same purpose at the same time, inasmuch as the interests of the subscribers as individuals would be adverse to the interests of the corporation. The instrument does not provide that the appellants, with Shippee, should at any time be the custodians of the money collected by West. They were only to "draw" from him such money as they might need to use in paying for any property that they should purchase for the corporation; and, as it is not claimed that they have negotiated for the purchase of any property for the corporation, there was no occasion for them to draw any of the money from West, or for him to deliver it to them. They, as well as West, were at all times after the incorporation of the plaintiff only its "agents," and, having no interest coupled with their agency, it was competent for the plaintiff to remove them at any time, and appoint other agents in their place, or itself assume the custody and disposition of the money. The finding of the court that upon the incorporation of the plaintiff the appellants not only ceased to act as the agents of the subscribers, but that, "before any of the moneys were paid to West, they repudiated such agency, and refused to act under said appointment, and wholly abandoned the same," fully established the right of the plaintiff as against their claim to the custody of the money.

The appellants, however, contend that the court below in its judgment disregarded the construction given to the agreement by this court in its opinion in the case of West v. Crawford, supra; and that it was then held that the plaintiff herein had no right to the custody of the moneys which might be collected by West under that agreement. While there is some language in that opinion that upholds this contention, the opinion must be construed with reference to the case then before the court for its determination. That was merely whether West could maintain an action for the recovery of the 20 per cent. agreed to be paid by the subscribers, and his right to maintain such action was upheld upon the ground that the subscribers had made an express promise to pay it to him at a fixed date after the filing of the articles of incorporation. The only parties before the court were West and some of the subscribers, and the ultimate right to the custody of the money was not involved in the action. For the purpose of meeting the argument of the appellants therein that the money belonged to the corporation, and could be collected only by it in the manner provided by statute for collecting assessments, it was stated in the opinion that it did not appear from the agreement that the corporation would ever be entitled to receive the money. It was not intended thereby to preclude the corporation from asserting its right to the money, nor could any statement in the opinion have that effect. The corporation was not before the court, and, as its right to the money had not been submitted by it to this court for determination, it could not be estopped by any statement in the opinion from subsequently asserting such right, and any statement in the opinion respecting its right to the money would be only a dictum, and not binding either upon the court or the corporation.

2. It was not necessary that Shippee should have been made a party defendant. The action was brought originally against West to recover certain moneys which had been collected and were held by him for the use and benefit of the plaintiff. This money was paid into court, and the appellants were substituted as defendants in place of West, and in their cross complaint they ask that the money be paid to them alone. Inasmuch as West held the money for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, he could not, by paying that money into court, change or diminish the right of the plaintiff to receive it, nor was its right in any respect affected by the substitution of the appellants as defendants in the place of West. The appellants, after having repudiated their agency, cannot claim that Shippee's presence in court was essential to a determination of the plaintiff's right. Shippee and the appellants are in no respect trustees under the instrument for the purpose of carrying into effect any of its provisions. There was no trust created by the instrument other than such a trust as always exists between a principal and his agent, nor do the moneys in question constitute a trust fund to be disposed of under the directions of a court of equity. They are simply moneys belonging to the plaintiff, and which it has the right at any time to demand from its agent. The judgment and order are affirmed.

RIMMER v. BLASINGAME et al. (No. 14,579.)

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—DAMAGES.

Plaintiff in an action of forcible detainer alleged her possession of certain land, and entry of defendants in her absence. She also alleged a demand and refusal of surrender, and that the defendants "have ever since said demand refused, and they still refuse, to surrender the same to plaintiff." The complaint claimed restitution, damages, and that damages be trebled. Defendants denied plaintiff's possession, but admitted their entry and detainer of possession till five days after demand, and denied damage; thus putting plaintiff's possession and the question of damage alone in issue. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff entitles her to a judgment for treble the amount of the verdict.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action by Elizabeth Rimmer against A. A. Blasingame and another for damages and treble damages for forcible detainer of land and premises. Judgment for plaintiff. Plaintiff appeals. Damages trebled.

O. L. Abbott, for appellant. E. D. Edwards, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action of forcible detainer. After stating her possession of the demanded premises, plaintiff avers: "That on or about the 10th day of January, A. D. 1890, during the temporary absence of plaintiff from said land, the defendants above named, without the consent and against the will of plaintiff, entered upon the said real property, the above-described parcel or tract of land, and took possession and occupancy thereof, and have ever since retained and had, and they still retain and have, possession and occupancy of all of said tracts or parcels of land. That on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1890, of the said defendants the plaintiff made demand for the surrender forthwith to her of the said tracts or parcels of land, and of the possession and occupancy thereof; but upon the said demand so as aforesaid by plaintiff made for such surrender, the said defendants refused, and they have ever since said demand refused, and they still refuse, to surrender the same to plaintiff, the former occupant thereof." She also alleges that the defendants herded on the land large bands of sheep, and that she was damaged in the sum of $2,000. She asks judgment for restitution, for damages, and that the damages be trebled. The defendants answered, denying the alleged possession of plaintiff, but admitting their entry upon the land, and that they retained possession for about three months, up to about March 10, 1890, and no longer. They admit herding sheep upon the land, but deny the damage. The case was tried by a jury, which found a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff in the sum of $162.75." Upon this verdict, judgment was entered for plaintiff for $162.75, the amount of the verdict. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, without a bill of exceptions, and makes the point that the judgment should have been for three times the amount of the verdict, for restitution of the premises, and for costs.

The respondents claim that the complaint is insufficient to constitute an action for forcible detainer, because it is not expressly averred that defendants refused to surrender possession within five days after demand. A demand made March 4th is alleged, and that defendants refused, and have ever since said demand refused, and still refuse, to surrender, etc. The complaint was verified September 3, 1890, and filed September 6th of that year. It is alleged, therefore, that defendants continued to refuse to surrender possession up to September 3d. This is a sufficient allegation. We do not concede that an action commenced under the provisions of the Code in reference to forcible or unlawful entry or detainer can be converted into an action for trespass; but, if so, we hold this complaint sufficient for unlawful entry and forcible detainer. The answer admits the entry, and that for a time the defendants held possession. It was something more, therefore, than a mere trespass. The only real issues were whether plaintiff had the actual possession at the time of the entry, and as to the amount of damages. The verdict is a finding of these issues in favor of the plaintiff. She was plainly entitled to a judgment for three times the amount of the verdict, for restitution of the premises, and for costs. The judgment should be so modified, and we so advise.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with directions to modify the judgment in accordance with the views expressed; the plaintiff's costs to include the costs of this appeal.

Yost v. Commercial Bank of Santa Ana. (No. 14,491.)

Chattel Mortgages — Sufficiency of Certificate — Pleadings — Setting Out Exhibits in Several Counts.

1. Under Civil Code, § 2957, which provides that a chattel mortgage shall be void against creditors unless accompanied by an "affidavit that it is made in good faith," an affidavit to a chattel mortgage was sufficiently signed, "W. K. J., Secretary," without other words descriptive of official character, where the body of the certificate recited that it was made to "W. K. J., secretary of * * *, the mortgagee in said mortgage named."

2. Where a note and mortgage are pleaded and set out in one paragraph of the answer, they may be counted on in following paragraphs by reference, without again repeating them.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Action by Charles Yost against the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana to recover personal property, and damages for the detention thereof. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. S. McKelvey, for appellant, cited, as to the sufficiency of the certificate, Hardware Co. v. Sullivan, (Mont.) 16 Pac. Rep. 588; Baker v. Power, Id. 589; Leopold v. Silverman, Id. 580.

Victor Montgomery, for respondent.

Foote, C. This appeal is taken from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and comes here upon the judgment roll alone. From the pleadings and findings, it appears that T. H. Owens and J. M. Edington for several years had been partners in the business of cultivating and raising barley on the San Joaquin ranch, in the county of Orange; that the land on which a certain crop of barley was raised, involved in this action, was leased by Owens alone, and that Edington was a silent partner; that Owens obtained a loan of $2,000 from the defendant, a banking corporation, and, to secure his note therefor, executed a chattel mortgage on the crop then growing on the leased premises. This money was used in raising the crop. Afterwards, on the 12th of September, 1889, both partners made an assignment in writing of all their right, title, and interest in the crop heretofore mentioned to one F. K. Ludlow, which instrument was duly certified and acknowledged so as to entitle it to be recorded in the proper office, where it was actually recorded on the next day. This assignment stated that it was subject to the chattel mortgage to the defendant. Owens never paid the money due on the note secured by the chattel mortgage; and on the 21st of September, 1889, Ludlow, the assignee, gave his assent whereby the defendant received possession of the growing crop, threshed, harvested, and sold it, and applied the proceeds as directed in the chattel mortgage. After this, Owens & Edington became voluntary insolvents under the statutes of this state, and their assignee brought this action for the recovery of the possession of the crop of barley in sacks, and for damages for its detention. The defendant corporation answered, setting up three defenses: The first, a general denial. The second, that the chattel mortgage had been executed by Owens for money loaned him; that he alone was known to the bank as the lessee of the land on which the crop was grown, and that the borrowed money was used to make the crop, and that the debt remained unpaid, and that the crop was sold under the mortgage in accordance with its provisions, and the proceeds applied by the defendant to the payment of the debt. The third defense set out facts as to the assignment to Ludlow, etc., which we have heretofore stated, and which, in our judgment, amounted to an assertion of a ratification by the other partner, Edington, prior to the insolvency of the firm, of the acts of the partner Owens in his dealing with the bank, known to it as the lessee of the land on which the crop mortgaged was grown. The answer was demurred to, and it is claimed by the appellant that the demurrer to the second and third defenses of that pleading should have been sustained.

Passing the question as to whether the second defense was demurrable or not, we think it plain that the third defense contains a statement of facts which show a complete bar to the action. We do not think that there is anything in the point that the certificate required by section 2957 of the Civil Code is defective. The body of the certificate shows that the "W. K. James, Secretary," who signed the certificate, was the "secretary of the Commercial Bank of Santa Ana, the mortgagee in said mortgage named." Thus it sufficiently appears that "W. K. James, Secretary," was the secretary of that bank, and it was unnecessary to repeat after "secretary," as appended to his signature, what was stated in the body of the certificate; that is, that he was secretary to the bank, mortgagee, etc. The cases cited from Montana are not in point here.

We think ratification is sufficiently pleaded in the third defense of the answer, and the probative facts found following the pleading, from which the ultimate fact of ratification by the other partner necessarily must be inferred, and this is sufficient from which to draw the conclusions of law which support the judgment. Hayne, New Trial & App. § 292. Hence the point made that certain of the findings are not within the issues made by the pleadings, and should be disregarded, is without merit. Nor do we perceive any force in the argument made by the appellant, that the facts are insufficient, as set up in the third ground of defense, because, as claimed, the note and mortgage are only referred to therein as being set out in the second defense, and are not set out in the third defense. If the note and mortgage had been made Exhibits A and B to the answer, and referred to as such in the third or any of the defenses stated, we do not see why that would not have been sufficient. No more difficulty or inconvenience in looking at them could result from the method adopted here, of referring to the note and mortgage as set out in the second defense, than in the method above adverted to. The practice condemned in Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. Rep. 398, is not that which is here involved. This is no averment "in subsequent counts that certain pargraphs of the first count are true." The case cited is therefore not in point.

We deem it unnecessary to notice any other point made, and we see no reversible error in the record, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Fitzgerald, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

California Southern Hotel Co. v. Callender. (No. 14,432.)

Findings—Presumptions.

1. In an action to recover the balance alleged to be due on a subscription to a corporation, the trial court found that defendant "recognized the validity of the corporation," and "acquiesced" in its expenditures "by paying" the first two calls on his subscription, and then concluded in law that defendant "has waived any defense he might otherwise have had to said subscription by reason of the manner of plaintiff's incorporation." Held that, the findings not being inconsistent with the legal definition of "waiver," it must be presumed that there was sufficient evidence to justify the conclusion of law.

2. Defendant agreed in the contract of subscription to the corporation that he would pay his subscription upon the call of the board of directors thereof. The complaint alleged and the court found his ownership of the number of shares subscribed for by him. Held, that it was unnecessary to defendant's ownership that a stock certificate should have been issued to him, it not being due till his subscription is fully paid, nor that the directors should have levied assessments on the stock, and there is a good cause of action on the contract for the balance of the subscription.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Action by California Southern Hotel Company against C. R. Callender to recover balances of subscription due upon a contract of subscription thereto. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Venable & Goodchild, for appellant. J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. The plaintiff is a California corporation, to whose capital stock the defendant subscribed $5,000 before its organization, that being 50 shares of the 1,000 shares into which the capital stock of $100,000 was divided. After having paid $2,000 of this subscription, the defendant refused to pay any part of the remainder, and this action was brought to recover from him the remaining $3,000. The cause was tried by the court, and judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff for the sum demanded. The defendant appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll, without bill of exceptions, and contends that upon the findings of fact the judgment should have been given for the defendant. The following is a copy of the written agreement to and upon which defendant subscribed for the stock: "We, the undersigned, do hereby agree to and with each other that we will organize and form a corporation, under the laws of the state of California, for the purpose of erecting, building, and owning an hotel building in the city of San Luis Obispo, county of San Luis Obispo, state of California, and for the purpose of purchasing and owning all such real and personal property as may be necessary to be used in connection with said hotel building; and we agree that the capital stock of said corporation shall be one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, divided into one thousand (1,000) shares, of the par value of one hundred dollars each; and we agree to and with each other that we do respectively subscribe for the number of shares of the stock of said corporation as are set after our respective names, and that we will pay for the same the said par value thereof at such times and in such manner as may be determined by the board of directors of the said corporation, to be hereafter chosen. And we further agree that whenever seventy thousand ($70,000) dollars of said capital stock has been subscribed for, a meeting shall be called for the purpose of electing a board of directors, and taking such steps as are required by law to form the said corporation, and that at such meeting the owners of a majority of said subscribed stock shall constitute a quorum, and are authorized to elect said board of directors, and transact any business necessary to fully complete the organization of the said corporation. That the number of directors and the term of said corporation shall be determined at such meeting." Here follows the list of subscribers, among whom is the defendant for "fifty shares,—$5,000." These subscriptions amounted to 772 shares. Among them was one of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company and Pacific Coast Railway Company for 100 shares, payable in freightage. This subscription purports to have been made through the agency of Goodall, Perkins & Co. Another of the subscriptions is by Edwin Goodall for 125 shares, partly payable in a block of land, if accepted by the company, estimated at $7,500, and the balance of $5,000 in cash. The court finds that Goodall, Perkins & Co. were not authorized to subscribe for the steamship and railway companies, but that the subscriptions of these companies, and also that of Edwin Goodall, entered into the computation, and constituted a part of the 772 shares subscribed before the organization of the corporation. The court further found that the corporation was organized on August 17, 1887, and that the articles of incorporation included as subscribers the name of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company for 100 shares, amounting to $10,000, and that of Edwin Goodall for 125 shares amounting to $12,500, without conditions; and further found "that at the preliminary meeting of stockholders, held for the purpose of considering whether or not the incorporation aforesaid should be organized and formed, defendant was not present, and did not vote for the shares subscribed for by him as aforesaid, and did not acquiesce in or agree that the incorporation should be formed on the subscription aforesaid. * * * That Edwin Goodall, for himself and for the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, united in the call for the meeting of the stockholders last aforesaid, and each were represented at said meeting to the full amount of the stock subscribed for by them as aforesaid by Edwin Goodall, and he voted and acted at said meeting for the full amount of the stock subscribed for by them, viz., 225 shares of the value of $22,500; and each has ever since the incorporation of the plaintiff been, and now is, a stockholder in said corporation for the full value and amount of the stock aforesaid subscribed by him." And further found that the subscriptions of the steamship company and Goodall were accepted and acted upon by plaintiff, and have been fully paid to the company. And further found that "defendant has at all times recognized the validity of the corporation aforesaid by paying $2,000 of said original subscription of $5,000, and not otherwise, and has never dissented from or protested against any of its acts. That defendant has, since said corporation was formed, acquiesced in the building of the hotel mentioned in said agreement, and furnishing the same, and the incurring of debts and expenditures of money therefor, by paying said $2,000 of said subscription to said corporation, and not otherwise. * * * That a large indebtedness has been incurred by plaintiff, and large sums of money expended, relying upon the subscriptions aforesaid." And further found (under the head of "conclusions of law") that the defendant "has waived any defense he might otherwise have had to said subscriptions by reason of the manner of plaintiff's incorporation." The findings show that calls were made upon the subscribers, including the defendant, as follows: November 16, 1887, 20 per cent., payable November 25th; March 17, 1888, 20 per cent., payable March 25th; May 23, 1888, 20 per cent., payable June 1st; 20 per cent., payable June 15th; and 20 per cent., payable July 1st.

1. The first and principal point made by appellant is that the corporation was organized before there was a valid subscription of $70,000 of the capital stock, contrary to the agreement subscribed by defendant, inasmuch as Goodall, Perkins & Co. subscribed for the steamship company and railway company without authority, and, in part, conditionally. It appears, however, that these subscriptions were changed before the corporation was organized, the railway company being dropped, and the subscription of the steamship company being substituted for that of both of these companies, and for the full amount thereof, and the subscription of the steamship company and that of Goodall being made unconditional, and so entered in the articles of incorporation. It is also found by the court that Goodall, for himself and for the steamship company, united in the call for the meeting of the subscribers for the purpose of considering the propriety of organizing the corporation; that Goodall represented all their stock at that meeting; that he signed and acknowledged the articles of incorporation; and that the steamship company and Goodall paid all the calls upon all the stock subscribed by them. It is not expressly found, nor, it seems to me, by necessary implication, that Goodall was not authorized by the steamship company to join in the call for the meeting, to make the change in the subscription, and to represent the steamship company in the organization of the corporation; but only that the original subscription by Goodall, Perkins & Co. for the two companies was without authority. If Goodall was authorized by the steamship company to represent it in all these matters, the corporation was properly organized, according to the subscription agreement, and the defendant has no ground of complaint. As, however, the findings are not quite clear upon this point, and as I think the judgment should be affirmed on another ground, which does not involve any doubtful question of construction of the findings, the decision of the case need not rest upon this point.

2. The court found that the defendant had "waived any defense he might otherwise have had to said subscription by reason of the manner of plaintiff's incorporation." Says Mr. Cook, in his book on Stock, Stockholders, and Corporation Law, (section 181:) "A subscriber may waive the defense that the full capital stock of the corporation has not been subscribed. This waiver may be either express or implied from the acts or declarations of the subscriber." Again, at section 186, the same author says: "Where the subscriber made his contract of subscription previous to, and in anticipation of, the incorporation, and does not, by his subsequent acts, acquiesce in the mode of incorporation, he may set up that the corporation has not been incorporated, and that he is not liable." At section 198 he says: "A subscriber to stock in a corporation may waive any defense he may have to the subscription. The waiver may be express, or it may be by implication from the acts and declarations of the subscriber. Thus a payment of a call with full knowlege of the defense is held to be a waiver; and any act indicating a clear intent to abide by or accept or pass over an objection which the subscriber might make will be held to be a waiver." See authorities cited in notes to above quotation. Thompson, Liab. Stockh. § 120; Taylor, Corp. § 519; and Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 64 Amer. Dec. 307. In Fishback v. Van Dusen, 33 Minn. 111, 22 N. W. Rep. 244, Mr. Justice MITCHELL, speaking for the court, said: "Whether there has been a waiver is a question of fact. It may be proved by various species of evidence, by declarations, by acts, or by forbearance to act." Other authorities say it is a mixed question of law and fact, but that each case must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances and surroundings. "It is a question of intention, and a fact to be determined by the triers of fact," (Okey v. Insurance Co., 29 Mo. App. 111; Ehrlich v. Insurance Co., 88 Mo. 249; Drake v. Insurance Co., 3 Grant, Cas. 325; Witherell v. Insurance Co., 49 Me. 200;) "and, though the waiver must be intentional, and clearly proven, the sufficiency of the evidence relating thereto is for the jury." Insurance Co. v. Schollenberger, 44 Pa. St. 259. The only question of law that can be involved in the question of waiver must relate to the legal definition of the word. For example, a jury might be properly instructed as matter of law that a waiver must be voluntary, and that it implies a knowledge of the right, claim, or thing waived; yet whether it was voluntary, and whether the party had knowledge of the right or thing waived, are still questions of fact to be submitted to the jury. In this case the court found the ultimate fact that defendant had waived any right he may have had to object to the organization of the corporation. This finding implies the defendant's knowledge of the right waived and that this waiver was voluntary, since these attributes are included in the legal definition of a waiver. Nor is this conclusion affected by the fact that the court also found certain probative facts, the only tendency of which was to prove the waiver. That defendant recognized the validity of the corporation, and acquiesced in the building of the hotel, etc., "not otherwise" than by paying the first two calls on his subscription, and never dissenting or protesting against any of the acts of the corporation, are in no degree inconsistent with the waiver found, as they do not tend to prove that the waiver was involuntary, or without defendant's knowledge of his alleged right. Conceding, therefore, that the probative facts (unnecessarily) found are insufficient to prove a waiver, yet, as the record contains no part of the evidence it must be presumed that there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of a waiver.

3. It is contended that this action cannot be maintained "on the theory that defendant is a stockholder, and, as such, liable to the corporation for assessments," for the alleged reason that it does not appear "that the corporation ever awarded any stock to defendant, or entered his name on its stock book, or anything to show that defendant was a stockholder." It is alleged in the complaint, and expressly found by the court, that defendant was the owner of 50 shares of stock at all the times when the calls were made. It was not necessary to defendant's ownership of the stock that a certificate for the stock should have been issued to him, (Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 121, 28 Pac. Rep. 110, and authorities there cited;) nor was the corporation bound to issue such certificate until the subscription price was fully paid; nor was it necessary to a recovery on the contract of subscription that the directors of the corporation should have levied assessments upon the stock in the mode prescribed by the Civil Code. By the contract of subscription the defendant agreed to pay upon the call of the board of directors, viz., "at such time and in such manner as may be determined by the board of directors of the said corporation, to be hereafter chosen;" and the action was properly brought upon this contract. West v. Crawford, 80 Cal. 27, 21 Pac. Rep. 1123. Water Co. v. Herberger, 82 Cal. 600, 23 Pac. Rep. 134; Ang. & A. Corp. § 549. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

WILSON v. CALIFORNIA CENT. R. Co. (No. 14,376.)

CARRIERS OF FREIGHT—LIABILITY AFTER STORAGE—NOTICE—ACTION ON CONTRACT OF AFFREIGHTMENT — NEGLIGENCE — BURDEN OF PROOF—REMOVAL OF GOODS—REASONABLE TIME.

1. A trial judge may, in a case tried by his predecessor in office, grant a new trial on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of conflicting evidence.

2. Failure of a carrier to deliver goods on demand, after storage, without lawful excuse, is a breach of the carrier's original contract, for which suit may be brought on that contract.

3. Under Civil Code, § 2120, providing that if for any reason a carrier does not deliver freight to the consignee or his agent, personally, he must give notice to the consignee of its arrival, and keep the same in safety on his responsibility as a warehouseman, until the consignee has had a reasonable time to remove it, storage of the goods does not create a new contract, which must be pleaded and distinguished from the original contract in order to recover the goods or their value.

4. Under said section, to reduce the degree of care of the carrier to that of a warehouseman on arrival and storage of the goods, it is necessary that notice be given.

5. Pol. Code, §§ 3152-3157, having been in force before the passage of act of March 30, 1874, (Amendments to Codes, 1873-74, p. 247,) anything in said sections inconsistent with Civil Code, § 2120, relative to the obligations of carriers, is repealed; said section 2120 being the original section as amended by said act of 1874, section 286 of which provides that all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of that act are thereby repealed.

6. Plaintiff having sued defendant on its original contract as carrier for failure to deliver the goods, and defendant having admitted the contract, and then alleged that the goods were safely carried to the point of destination, and there stored in its warehouse under circumstances that reduced its obligation to that of warehouseman, and that the goods while so stored were destroyed by fire, "without negligence or fault on its part," the burden of proving the defense, including the loss without defendant's negligence or fault, is on defendant.

7. Where household goods were shipped from Indiana to California, and the owner, being taken sick on the way, wrote to the freight agent a letter, which he received two days after the arrival of the goods, stating that she was sick, and asking him to store the goods in a fire-proof warehouse, and the evidence for plaintiff tended to prove that the only attempt at giving plaintiff notice of the arrival of the goods was a letter in answer to hers, which was defectively addressed, and by reason thereof was not received, but was returned to the sender two months thereafter, an instruction that the reasonable time within which plaintiff should have removed her goods was limited to three months from the date of their arrival was properly refused.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by M. Wilson against the California Central Railroad Company for goods shipped and not delivered. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. There was an order granting a new trial, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. A. Brunson and Curtis D. Wilbur, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover from defendant the value of certain household furniture which it is alleged the defendant, as a common carrier by railroad, in consideration of a certain sum paid it by plaintiff as freightage, pro rata itineris, agreed safely to carry from Indianapolis, Ind., to Los Angeles, Cal., and to deliver to the plaintiff or order at the latter place, but failed and refused to do so according to said agreement, whereby said furniture was wholly lost to plaintiff, to her damage in the sum of $4,000. The answer of the defendant, for want of information or belief, denies that the furniture was worth $4,000 or any sum, and then proceeds as follows: "It denies that it did not safely carry said goods pursuant to its agreement to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $4,000, or in any other sum whatever, but, on the contrary, it alleges that it safely carried said goods from the town of Barstow, where it received the same of the Atlantic & Pacific road, and delivered the same in the city of Los Angeles, at its warehouse in said city, where said goods were received on the 19th day of July, 1887, and were on the same day unloaded into the warehouse of this defendant at said city, and the plaintiff in this action was on said 19th day of July, 1887, duly notified of the arrival of said goods, but said plaintiff wholly neglected to remove said goods from said warehouse, and negligently permitted them to remain therein until the 28th day of October, 1887, at which time said warehouse, with its contents, including the goods mentioned in this complaint, was wholly and totally destroyed by fire, and that without the carelessness or negligence of this defendant." The case was tried by a jury. Verdict for plaintiff, assessing the damages at $4,000. Judgment accordingly. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was granted; and this appeal is by the plaintiff, from the order granting a new trial. The case was tried before Hon. H. K. S. O'MELVENEY, who settled the statement on motion for new trial after the expiration of his term of office, February 18, 1890; and the new trial was granted by his successor, Hon. W. H. CLARK, December 13, 1890. On granting the motion the court filed a written opinion, which is brought up with the transcript, and acquiesced in by counsel as being a correct copy, though it does not appear to have been made a part of the settled statement. It appears by this opinion that the new trial was granted on two grounds: (1) That the verdict was against the weight of conflicting evidence on a material issue; and (2) that the court misinstructed the jury. Appellant's counsel contend that inasmuch as it is admitted, and is incontrovertible, that the evidence is substantially conflicting, the court below, not having tried the case, nor heard the evidence, should have been governed by the same rule that prevails in the appellate court as to conflicting evidence. This question has been decided adversely to the views of counsel for appellant in the following cases: Altschul v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 535; Macy v. Davila, Id. 648; Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 100; Blum v. Sunol, 63 Cal. 343. Therefore the order granting a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence should be affirmed, without regard to what may be said or thought of the reason of the rule established by those cases; and whether the instructions to the jury were correct or not. For purposes of the new trial, however, it is proper to pass upon other questions presented by the record and discussed by counsel, especially such as relate to the propriety of instructions given to the jury, or refused, as requested.

1. The court did not err in refusing the first instruction, as requested by defendant. As requested, the instruction was as follows: "(1) The court instructs you that in this case defendant is charged as a common carrier, and not as a warehouseman; and if you find from the evidence that the goods sued for arrived in Los Angeles July 19, 1887, and were at that time unloaded from the cars into defendant's warehouse, and plaintiff was notified of such arrival, then the court instructs you that defendant is not liable as a common carrier, and your verdict should be for the defendant." That the defendant "was a common carrier of goods for hire," and as such received and "agreed safely to carry to Los Angeles, and there to deliver to plaintiff or order," the goods in question, is admitted by the pleadings, and that defendant did safely carry the goods to Los Angeles, and there store them in its warehouse, where they were afterwards destroyed by fire, is alleged in defendant's answer, and was proved on the trial. Therefore the requested instruction must be understood as meaning that, if plaintiff was properly notified of the arrival of the goods, she could not recover in this action, because the defendant was sued on its contract as a common carrier, and not as a warehouseman, even though the goods may have been destroyed through the negligence of defendant, and for the reason that the notice to the plaintiff and storage of the goods entirely discharged the defendant's obligations under the contract alleged in the complaint, although the goods had not been delivered as required by the admitted terms of that contract. I think this is a mistake; for, while it is true that the contract did not require of the defendant so great a degree of care after the arrival and proper storage of the goods as while they were in transitu, it nevertheless required ordinary care after storage. The different degrees of care required under different circumstances are seldom expressed in the carrier's contract, but are supplied by the law in reference to which such contracts are made, and which enters into and forms a part of such contracts. Hutch. Carr. § 338. These implied legal terms of the carrier's contract require different degrees of care, appropriate to changing circumstances, as well while the goods are in transit as after they reach their destination; yet the original contract is not changed by the change of circumstances, but remains the same and continues in force until the goods are delivered to the consignee, or until they are lost by some cause to which the negligence of the carrier did not contribute. Therefore a failure to deliver the goods on demand, even after storage, without lawful excuse, is a breach of the carrier's original contract, for which suit may be brought upon that contract. No authority opposed to this view has been cited by counsel, and after diligent search I have been able to find none. In Jackson v. Railroad Co., 23 Cal. 270, wherein the complaint was upon the original carrier's contract, as in this case, it was contended that, before the plaintiff could recover, he must prove that the loss occurred before the goods reached the depot at the place to which they had been consigned. The point was disposed of by the court as follows: "We do not think this objection of the defendants to the complaint sufficient to justify us in reversing the judgment on that ground. Although the complaint is very specific in charging the defendants as common carriers, yet we do not see that they have been taken by surprise in any way, or misled thereby, or prevented from setting up every defense they may have had to the action. In this class of cases there is certainly great propriety in stating the two characters in which the defendants acted; but it is not, perhaps, essential to the sufficiency of the complaint." I think the intention and effect of section 2120 of the Civil Code (hereinafter quoted) is merely to reduce the degree of care for which the carrier shall be held responsible, after the arrival and proper storage of the goods, to the same measure of care as that for which warehousemen are responsible, and that it does not imply that the storage of the goods creates a new contract, which must be specially pleaded and distinguished from the original contract in order to recover the goods or the value. It may often happen that the consignee may not know, or be able to learn, whether his goods were lost while in transit or after their arrival, or even whether they have been lost at all. In cases of this kind, by the rule contended for, he must guess, at his peril, whether he should sue on his original contract with the carrier, or upon an implied new contract with the same person; yet this great disadvantage to the consignee is not compensated by any just advantage to the carrier, as is well illustrated in the case of Jackson v. Railroad Co., supra, and, indeed, by the case at bar. When, how, and where the goods were lost, if lost at all, is presumptively known to the carrier, but not to the consignee.

2. At the request of the defendant's counsel the court gave the following instruction as to the burden of proof: "When the defendant shows that the goods sued for were destroyed by fire, then the burden of showing that such fire was the result of defendant's want of care is upon the plaintiff, and, unless such want of ordinary care is shown, your verdict should be for the defendant." As applicable to the pleadings and admitted facts, I think this instruction erroneous. While it is true, as contended by counsel for respondent, that defendant is sued upon its original contract as carrier only, it must not be overlooked that the answer admits that the defendant assumed the obligation of common carrier, as alleged in the complaint, and then, by allegations of new matter, seeks to show that by safely carrying the goods to the point of destination, and there storing them in its warehouse, the defendant reduced its admitted obligation of common carrier to that of warehouseman, and further alleges that after they were stored in the warehouse the goods were destroyed by fire without negligence or fault of the defendant. The burden of proving this defense, including the loss by fire without negligence or fault on his part, devolved on the defendant. "When the carrier claims exemption on the ground that, under the particular circumstances of the case, he held the goods, not as carrier, but as an ordinary bailee, it devolves upon him to show not only that he has done his whole duty to effect a delivery according to the course of his business, but that he has been guilty of no negligence which has caused or contributed to the loss." Hutch. Carr. (2d Ed. 1891,) §§ 354, 355, and authorities there cited. All the facts pleaded by defendant in avoidance of its confessed contractual obligation were material and necessary to constitute a defense to the action, and of course the burden of proving all such facts was upon the defendant. It will hardly be contended that the new matter pleaded would have constituted a defense without the allegation that the destruction of the goods by fire was "without the carelessness or negligence of this defendant." Had the defendant been sued as a tort feasor, and charged in the complaint with negligence whereby plaintiff's goods were destroyed by fire, the burden of proving the alleged negligence would have been upon the plaintiff. Wilson v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 171. But not so where, as in this case, the action is upon the carrier's contract to carry and deliver goods; the alleged breach being a failure to carry away and deliver according to the contract, and the defense being that the goods were destroyed by fire without the carelessness or negligence of the defendant. As a general rule, the burden is on the defendant to prove new matter alleged as a defense, (Osborn v. Hendrickson, 8 Cal. 31; Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 22; Kuhland v. Sedgwick, 17 Cal. 124; Bryan v. Maume, 28 Cal. 244; Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 136,) even though it requires the proof of a negative. "It makes no difference, therefore, whether the actor is plaintiff or defendant, so far as concerns the burden of proof. If he undertake to make a case, whether affirmative or negative, this case must be made out by him, or judgment must go against him. Hence it may be stated, as a test admitting of universal application, that, whether the proposition be affirmative or negative, the party against whom judgment would be given as to a particular issue, supposing no proof be offered on either side, has on him, whether he be plaintiff or defendant, the burden of proof, which he must satisfactorily sustain. If there is a case made out against a defendant, on which, if the plaintiff should close, a judgment would be entered against the defendant, then the defendant has on him the burden of proving a case by which the plaintiff's case will be defeated." Whart. Ev. § 357, and authorities thereto cited. Again, at section 362, the same author says: "When a person who contracts to perform a particular duty to another person or thing is sued for negligent injury to such person or thing, then the plaintiff need only prove the injury; and the burden is on the defendant to excuse himself by proof of the exercise of due diligence. What such diligence is depends upon the nature of the contract, as elsewhere discussed. That must be proved as an excusatory defense by the defendant, and that the burden is on him to do so is plain. The defendant has engaged to perform a particular duty, and the suit is for the nonperformance of such duty. That the defendant failed to perform his duty through negligence is not part of the plaintiff's case. The plaintiff, it is true, in proving the nonperformance of duty by the defendant, may bring out such incidents as show negligence on the part of the defendant. But it is not a necessity of the plaintiff's case to do this, and, if the defendant desire to relieve himself by showing a due performance of duty, he must do so either by directly traversing the plaintiff's case as to the fact of injury, or by proving (and the burden is on the defendant to do this) that the injury occurrred without his particular fault. A creditor, for instance, receives a piece of silver plate in pawn. If this is lost without any culpa on his part, he must prove this fact in order to be released from liability. A herd of goats is taken by a herdsman to pasture. They are carried off by robbers without the fault of the herdsman. It is not necessary for the owner to prove want of due care in the herdsman, but the burden is on the herdsman to prove that the loss of the herd was not due to want of care by himself." In the following three sections (363-365) the author states the effect of the distinction between actions upon contract and actions on tort upon the burden of proof. The failure to observe this distinction has probably occasioned much of the conflict of the cases upon this point. The conflicting cases are referred to and discussed in notes to the above citations from Hutchinson on Carriers and Wharton on Evidence, and the conclusions of these authors seem to be sound in principle, and supported by a preponderance of the well-considered cases. The opposing conclusion seems utterly to disregard elementary principles of pleading and evidence. A cause of action upon contract consists merely of a breach of the contract, (the contract, of course, being a necessary condition,) and the plaintiff need allege and prove only the contract, the breach, and the debt or resulting damages; whereas a cause of action ex delicto consists of a tort, which the plaintiff must allege and prove, whether it be culpable negligence or other violation of plaintiff's right. Our Code of Civil Procedure, § 426, requires only the facts "constituting the cause of action" to be stated in the complaint, and section 437 requires that the answer shall contain a denial of such material allegations of the complaint as are controverted by the defendant, and a statement of any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim. Section 1869 requires each party to prove his own affirmative allegations, and also his negative allegations, when they are "an essential part of the statement of the right or title on which the cause of action or defense is founded." Kohler v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 26 Cal. 611. Negligence of the defendant is no essential part of the statement of the right or title on which plaintiff's cause of action is founded; but the negative of such negligence is an essential part of the statement on which the defense is founded, if it may be properly called a "negative" when it is only equivalent to an "affirmative" allegation of ordinary care, and considering that it might have been proved by affirmative evidence of ordinary care. "Section 1981. The party holding the affirmative of the issue must produce the evidence to prove it. Therefore the burden of proof lies on the party who would be defeated if no evidence were given on either side." While the logic of this section seems a little obscure, the conclusion is in harmony with section 1869, and doubtless the whole section was intended to be so, and should be so construed.

3. The court did not err in refusing the following instruction, requested by the defendant: "A consignee has a reasonable time within which to remove goods from the cars of a common carrier into its warehouse, and the court instructs you that three months is a reasonable time in this case, and it was her duty to have removed them within that time, and their loss by fire subsequently to that time relieves defendant from any liability for said goods or their value, unless you find from the evidence that such fire was caused by the want of ordinary care by defendant; and the burden of showing such want of ordinary care is on the plaintiff, who must prove that the defendant had by some act or omission violated some duty, by reason of which the fire originated, or that some negligence or want of care, such as a prudent man would take under similar circumstances of his own property, caused or permitted or contributed to cause or permit the fire by which the property was destroyed, and, in the absence of such proof, you should find for the defendant." This instruction is erroneous as to the burden of proof, for reasons above stated. Nor do I think, under the circumstances, the jury should have been instructed, as matter of law, that three months was a reasonable time within which it was the duty of the plaintiff to remove her goods. The goods were shipped and the freightage paid at Indianapolis, Ind., on the 30th day of June, 1887, and consigned to the plaintiff at Los Angeles, where they arrived on July 19, 1887. After the shipment, the plaintiff, who is a widow, started to Los Angeles, intending to arrive there before the arrival of the goods, but on account of her sickness was compelled to stop at Chicago, from which place, on July 13th, she wrote the following letter: "Chicago, Ill., July 13, 1887. Frt. Agt., California, Sthn. or Santa Fe, Los Angeles—Dear Sir: Have you household furniture for Mrs. M. Wilson at your depot, shipped from Indianapolis, Ind., about June 30th, via I. B. W., C. & A., and Santa Fe, (I presume, I don't know?) Mrs. Wilson is sick here, and cannot come on as soon as her furniture. Will you please take care of same, and store in fireproof warehouse, if at your depot. She will be there as soon as she is able. Please answer at once, and very much oblige, yours, truly, M. L. Wilson, 1245 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill. P. S. If not at your depot, please tell me where it will be. Wilson." This letter was received by the defendant, as appeared by the testimony of its agents, after the arrival of the goods, but not later than July 21st, on which day the defendant wrote and posted the following answer: "Los Angeles Station, July 21, 1887. Mrs. M. Wilson, Chicago—Dear Madam: Replying to yours of the 15th inst., I beg to advise you that H. H. goods to your address were received on the 19th of this month, and are now stored in our warehouse, where I shall hold them subject to your order. Yours, truly, E. Chambers, Ag't. M." This letter, not being directed to the address of the plaintiff, as given in her letter of July 13th, viz., "1245 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.," was not received by her, and was returned to defendant about two months after it was written. As to whether or not the defendant gave plaintiff the notice required by section 2120 of the Civil Code, the evidence is conflicting. On the part of the defendant the evidence tends to prove that upon the arrival of the goods—July 19th—the defendant, not knowing the address of the plaintiff, dropped a postal card in the post office at Los Angeles, addressed to her at that place, notifying her of the arrival of the goods. On the part of the paintiff the evidence tended to prove that no such postal card, or any other letter than that of July 21st, addressed to Chicago, was ever addressed to defendant at any place, and posted. Within one or two days from the time the goods arrived the defendant had notice, by the letter of July 13th, that plaintiff was sick at Chicago, and did not know when she would be able to travel, and by the same letter was directed to store the goods in a fireproof warehouse to await her arrival at Los Angeles, and requested to answer at once. The answer to this letter, being defectively addressed, was not received by plaintiff, of which the defendant had notice by its being returned two months from its date. Furthermore the evidence for plaintiff tended to prove that the defendant never in any way notified plaintiff of the arrival or storage of the goods, unless the defectively addressed letter, which was not received, constituted constructive notice, which I think it did not. Under this state of the evidence, it seems to me that the court properly refused to instruct the jury that the reasonable time within which plaintiff should have removed her goods was limited to three months from the date of their arrival.

4. As to the other instructions given by the court, it is only necessary to say that they were quite as favorable to respondent as it was entitled to ask. If any of them are erroneous, none of them is so to the prejudice of respondent. Further than this it is unnecessary to decide, since counsel for appellant have made no point on them.

5. Respondent's counsel contend that "the storage of freight by a common carrier (by railroad) in its warehouse at the point of destination, either with or without notice to the consignee of the arrival thereof, changes the liability of the common carrier, as such, to that of warehouseman. Upon this point, prior to the enactment of our Codes, the authorities were irreconcilably conflicting, and it seems to have been the object of the legislature to settle the question in this state by sections 2118–2120 of the Civil Code; section 2120 being as follows: "If for any reason a carrier does not deliver freight to the consignee or his agent personally, he must give notice to the consignee of its arrival, and keep the same in safety, upon his responsibility as a warehouseman, until the consignee has had a reasonable time to remove it. If the place of residence or business of the consignee be unknown to the carrier, he may give the notice by letter dropped into the nearest post office." The plain meaning of this section seems to be that, in order to reduce the responsibility of the carrier to that of a warehouseman, the notice required by the section must be given. Nor is this meaning changed or qualified by sections 3152 to 3157, inclusive, of the Political Code, as claimed by respondent's counsel. The general subject of the article composed of these sections is "unclaimed property," which has been received by common carriers, express companies, commission merchants, innkeepers or warehousemen for transportation or safe-keeping; and the principal object of the article is to give each of these classes of bailees a lien upon such property for their reasonable charges for freightage or storage, and power to sell so much thereof as may be necessary to pay such charges. Beyond this special subject-matter, it does not purport to prescribe or define the duties or obligations of common carriers, whereas, the subject-matter of the article of the Civil Code, including section 2120 above quoted, is "obligations of the carrier;" and this article particularly prescribes and defines the obligations and duties of common carriers alone. Furthermore, section 2120 of the Civil Code is a re-enactment of the original section, as amended by act of March 30, 1874, entitled "An act to amend the Civil Code." See volume of "Amendments to the Codes," 1873-74, p. 247. Section 286 of this amendatory act (page 268) provides that "all provisions of law inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." Therefore, if there is anything in the sections of the Political Code above cited inconsistent with section 2120 of the Civil Code, then, to the extent of the inconsistency, they are repealed, since they were in force before the passage of the act above referred to, amending the Civil Code, and have never since been amended. The rule requiring railroad companies to give notice to consignees of the arrival of their goods, so far as practicable, in order to reduce the liability of the carrier to that of a warehouseman, irrespective of statutory enactment, seems to be founded upon the better reason, and supported by the weight of authority in other states and in England. Hutch. Carr. §§ 373, 374, and notes.

Upon the sole ground that the court below found that the verdict was contrary to the weight of evidence on the issue as to notice of the arrival of the goods, I think the order granting a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order granting a new trial is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF SAN DIEGO v. FALKENHAN et al. (No. 14,398.)

PROMISSORY NOTES—TRANSFER AFTER PAYMENT—LIABILITY OF INDORSER—WAIVER OF PROTEST.

1. Defendant, who, as payee of a nonnegotiable note, already paid before maturity for valuable consideration, waived protest in writing thereon, and indorsed it over in blank to plaintiff, is liable as an indorser, unless a contrary intention be made to appear.

2. The expression "waiver of protest," when applied to paper which cannot or is not required to be protested, acquires the meaning of waiver of demand and notice of nonpayment.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by First National Bank of San Diego against Joseph Falkenhan and Coronado Beach Company, as maker and first indorser, respectively, of a note, to recover its amount. Judgment for plaintiff against first indorser, who appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal by the defendant corporation from that part of the judgment which authorizes judgment against that defendant. The action is brought upon a promissory note executed by the other defendant to the appellant, and is not negotiable because it contains a stipulation for an attorney's fee. In the complaint the note is set out at length, and it is averred "that on the 30th day of August, 1888, before the maturity of said note, the defendant the Coronado Beach Company, for a valuable consideration, waived protest in writing thereon, and indorsed said note in blank, and then and there delivered the same to plaintiff." It also alleges demand and nonpayment, but does not aver notice to the indorser. To this complaint the appellant interposed a general demurrer, which having been overruled, it answered, denying that it waived protest, or that demand had been made on the maker, and averring that no notice of nonpayment by the maker had been given. The maker answered, alleging that he paid the note in question to the appellant April 7, 1888, which was prior to the maturity of the note or its assignment to plaintiff. The court found in regard to the assignment of the note and waiver of protest as charged in the complaint, and that no part of the principal or interest had been paid to plaintiff; and also that the other defendant had paid the appellant the amount due on the note prior to its maturity or assignment.

It is contended by appellant that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the demurrer should have been sustained. This raises two questions: Is one who assigns a nonnegotiable note by writing his name on the back, and delivering it to the assignee, liable as an indorser? and, if so, was appellant entitled to notice of nonpayment? Upon the first question the authorities are not harmonious, but a review of them will show that ever since the statute of 3 & 4 Anne there has been a disposition to hold one who transfers a nonnegotiable promissory note to a responsibility beyond that of an assignor of other choses in action. The rules applicable to negotiable paper have to some extent been applied to such assignments. The first departure seems to have been to hold that such indorser is liable as the maker of a new note, or as the drawer of a new bill, as had been sometimes held as to the indorser of a negotiable promissory note. Liedy v. Tammany, 9 Watts, 353. Judge Kennedy, in the above case, quotes Lord Mansfield in Heylyn v. Adamson, 2 Burrows, 676, to the effect that the indorsement is an order by the indorser upon the maker of the note to pay the amount thereof to the indorsee. This view seems to have been very widely adopted. Seymour v. Van Slyck, 8 Wend. 404; Dean v. Hall, 17 Wend. 214; Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & S. 227; Brenzer v. Wightman, 7 Watts & S. 264, and many other cases. The cases upon the subject are cited and discussed in Hare & Wallace's notes to Gerard v. La Coste, 1 Amer. Lead. Cas. 302. The learned annotators conclude, after reviewing the cases, that the true rule is that a mere indorsement is but a transfer of the note; that the question whether any, and what, liability is incurred by the delivery of such a note so indorsed, will depend upon the intention of the parties and the circumstances of the transaction. Under this rule, prima facie, no responsibility is assumed, but it may be shown that there was a different understanding, and the indorser held accordingly. If this rule were followed, the appellant would be held in this case. In its indorsement it waived protest. Of course this implies responsibility as indorser. But in all the text-books which I have examined it is laid down that "in respect to the immediate indorsee of the payee of a nonnegotiable promissory note, the indorsement will ordinarily create the same liabilities and obligations as the indorsement of a negotiable note." Story, Prom. Notes, § 128; Story, Bills, §§ 119-179; Bayley, Bills & N. 120; Ch. Bills, 219; Byles, Bills, 142; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 664. A great many cases are cited in support of this proposition, although there are also a goodly number of cases which hold differently. Beyond this it is not necessary to go in this case, and it strikes me as the most convenient and reasonable rule. It is also the consequence most likely to be intended by the parties. Even a nonnegotiable promissory note is an ordinary paper, and mercantile business men are not likely to determine between instruments which are or are not governed by the law merchant.

Section 1459 of the Civil Code does not affect this question. It but states the rule that, as to the payor, the transfer is but an assignment of the instrument, subject to any defenses in his favor which he might have against the payee; and that the transferee may sue on it in his own name. Title 15 of the Civil Code, which contains all the provisions of our statute in regard to demand, notice, and protest, has no application to this case. The first section in that title is: "The provisions of this title apply only to negotiable instruments as defined in this article." Section 3086, Civil Code. Whether waiver of protest amounts to waiver of demand and notice must be determined without reference to the Code as direct authority. Neither the Code nor the law merchant requires protest in such a case, but neither is it required in the case of an inland bill. In Daniel on Negotiable Instruments it is said upon this point: "But the word 'protest' has by general usage acquired a more extensive signification than the mere formal declaration of a notary. Inland bills and promissory notes may be protested by statutory enactment in many states, and the protest is accorded the same weight to them when it is made, though it be not necessary to make it. And the weight, as well as the number, of authorities predominate in favor of construing a waiver of protest to signify as much when applied to inland bills and notes as when used in respect to a foreign bill." In fact, unless the waiver of protest in this case was meant to be a waiver of demand and notice, it would have no effect whatever. It would seem that when applied to paper which could not be or was not required to be protested, the word "protest" must have the acquired meaning of demand, nonpayment, and notice, rather than the formal evidence of dishonor. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Fritts v. Camp et al. (Nos. 13,483, 14,231.)

Change of Venue—Jurisdiction of Action.

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, requiring all actions for quieting the title to land to be brought in the county in which the land is situated, a court outside of the county has no jurisdiction; and the proper remedy of a defendant, sued in the wrong county, is, not an application for a change of venue, but a motion to dismiss.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; James E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John A. Fritts against James Camp and others for an injunction. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed and dismissed.

Lucas & Miller and Knight & Heggerty, for appellants. L. F. Cooper, (Sawyer & Burnett, of counsel,) for respondent.

Temple, C. There are two appeals in this case, both taken by the defendants. The first is from an order refusing to change the place of trial from Del Norte county to Siskiyou; the second, from a final judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and an order refusing defendants' motion for a new trial. As we have reached the conclusion that the case must be dismissed, it is not necessary to consider the appeals separately.

The action was brought in Del Norte county to enjoin the defendants from dumping into Indian creek, above plaintiff's premises, tailings, boulders, stones, sand, gravel, or clay from mineral lands, whereby they foul the waters of the creek, fill up his milldam, deprive him of water to irrigate his garden, stop his sawmill from running, and destroy other lands along said creek, to his damage, etc. Plaintiff charges that "since the discovery of gold on this creek, over thirty years ago, mining has always been carried on along said stream; but until the commencement of hydraulic mining on said stream on a large scale by the defendants, as hereinafter stated, the said Indian creek, in crossing the premises of plaintiff, ran on a hard rock bottom." The manner of conducting hydraulic mines is then shown, and that by such process "refuse matter, consisting of boulders, stones, pebbles, sand, and clay, generally known as 'tailings' or 'mineral debris,' is washed into and down said Indian creek and deposited in the beds and channels thereof throughout its entire length, below the defendants' mine and on the lands of plaintiff, and in his milldam; and that this mode of mining has been carried on to some extent on the premises now owned and occupied by defendants for over ten years." The concluding allegation of the complaint is as follows: "And plaintiff avers that the defendants refuse to discontinue said wrongful and injurious acts, and they, and each of them, threaten and intend to prosecute their mining works at the point where they are now working the same, as hereinbefore described, and to dump and discharge the debris from their mine into the said Indian creek in the manner they have heretofore done, as hereinbefore alleged, and they claim adversely to this plaintiff an easement to flow and deposit upon plaintiff's premises, and in said creek running through the same, their tailings or mining debris, whereas plaintiff alleges that none of the defendants possess any or either of the rights or easements so claimed, and that all such pretenses are contrary to law and equity, and to the wrong and injury of plaintiff." The complaint also shows that the lands of plaintiff to which the action relates are situated wholly in Siskiyou county. The defendants answered, denying, among other allegations of the complaint, those which appear to show title in the plaintiff to the lands in question, averring that the lands are mineral lands of the United States which have been and are excluded from sale as agricultural lands or for agricultural purposes; that, by permission of the government, mining has been carried on, and tailings dumped in the creek, for more than 30 years, and by the defendants Camp and Titus since 1871; that in 1877 defendant Camp received a patent from the United States for his mining claim, which granted to him the right and easement of dumping into said Indian creek, and on the lands of said government; that all the sluicing, washing, and dumping into said creek by the defendants, any or either of them, was reasonable, and necessary for working said mine. They deny the alleged injury, or their threats to continue the same, and also deny "that none of the defendants possess the rights and easements to flow and deposit their tailings and mining debris into said creek."

We have here, therefore, a distinct averment in the complaint that the defendants claim, and each of them claims, adversely to the plaintiff, an interest in the land, to wit, an easement to flow and deposit upon it tailings and mining debris. This claim of an easement plaintiff disputes. The judgment asked by plaintiff would be conclusive that they have no such easement. In their answer, they justify the alleged trespasses under the claim of an easement. Looking now to the findings, we see that the court found upon this issue. In finding 10 we have: "I find that said defendants claim adversely to the plaintiff herein an easement and right to flow and deposit upon plaintiff's premises and in said Indian creek, running through the same, the tailings or mining debris from the said Classic Hill placer mine; and I find that neither all nor any of said defendants have any such right or easement." In finding 16 it is found that there are no mining customs, rules, or regulations "to allow any one to flood the premises of another with mining debris;" and, in finding 17, "that the United States never conveyed to the defendant James Camp an easement to dump and drain the mining debris from the Classic Hill placer mine into either said Indian creek, or on or over the premises since settled and claimed by the plaintiff as a homestead." Thus the plaintiff in his complaint avers that the defendants claim adversely to him an easement in his land and in the creek to do the acts charged as trespasses, which claim of easement he denies, and he asks a judgment which would, in effect, quiet his title as against the claim. The defendants, in their answer, justify the alleged trespasses under the claim of an easement; and the court found against them, and, by granting a perpetual injunction, preventing them from the enjoyment of the easement, quieted plaintiff's title as against their claim.

In section 5, art. 6, of the constitution of this state, it is provided, as to superior courts, that their process shall extend to all parts of this state, "provided that all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon, real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated." If our reasoning so far is correct, it must be apparent, without further argument, that this case is one which, under the constitution, should have been commenced in the county where the land is situated, to wit, in Siskiyou county. Summons was issued in the action November, 1888, and on the 22d day of December following the defendants appeared and filed a demurrer to the complaint, and with it a demand that the place of trial be changed to Siskiyou county. March 14, 1889, the court denied this motion on the ground that no affidavit of merits was filed. No such affidavit was required. On the contrary, if that was the proper remedy of defendants, it was incumbent upon the court to transfer the cause upon a mere suggestion. No appeal, however, was taken from this order, and on May 20th of the same year the defendants renewed their demand. This was also denied, and from the order, as well as from the judgment and order refusing a new trial, the defendants have appealed. Admitting that the proper remedy of the defendants was to have the case transferred to Siskiyou, the failure to appeal from the first order was not a waiver. This is not one of the cases contemplated by section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under the supposition made, all that the court could do would have been to transmit the papers to the only court that had jurisdiction. But we do not think that was the proper remedy of defendants. The court had no jurisdiction, and this is an objection which cannot be waived. We see very plainly how great inconvenience may result, but the requirement of the organic law is plain, and cannot be judicially repealed. Where such questions are brought in after the suit has been commenced, or arise incidentally, there is room for argument. But where, as here, one avowed purpose of the action is to quiet an adverse claim to real estate, courts outside of the county in which the land is situated have no jurisdiction. It is so held in Urton v. Woolsey, 87 Cal. 38, 25 Pac. Rep. 154. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the action dismissed, and that the appeal from the order refusing to change the place of trial be also dismissed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the action dismissed; and the appeal from the order refusing to change the place of trial is also dismissed.

MASTICK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 14,820.)

RIGHT OF GUARDIAN TO RECOVER WILL OF LUNATIC—OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION—WAIVER.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 1800, providing that a guardian may recover "money, goods, or effects, or an instrument in writing belonging to the ward or to his estate," from any person who has "concealed, embezzled, or conveyed away" the same, refers to such "instruments" only as the guardian is entitled to as assets or evidence of his ward's title to property; and it does not authorize the guardian of a lunatic to recover the will of his ward from a person in whose custody the ward had placed it before she was declared insane.

2. Where defendant, in a special proceeding in the superior court, answers, offers testimony, and submits the case, he is not thereby precluded, on a writ of review, from objecting that the superior court had no jurisdiction to make such order.

In bank.

In a proceeding by R. M. Fitzgerald, the guardian of Mrs. Langdon, adjudged incompetent, the superior court ordered George H. Mastick to deliver up possession of a will placed in his custody by the ward while competent. Mastick petitions the supreme court for a writ of review. Order annulled.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for petitioner. T. C. Coogan, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner drew a will for Mrs. Langdon, which she executed and left in his possession, with directions to retain the same, unless otherwise directed, and at her death to deliver it to the person named as executor therein. Some time afterwards—the exact time does not appear—Mrs. Langdon sent a messenger to petitioner requesting him to deliver the package to the former. This request was complied with, and subsequently the same messenger, at the request of Mrs. Langdon, delivered to petitioner a sealed package, indorsed on the envelope, "Mrs. Langdon's will." This package was placed in the petitioner's safe, and the possession thereof has ever since been retained by him. It does not appear who made the indorsement on the envelope, nor does any one know the contents of the package. Some time after it was returned to the petitioner, Mrs. Langdon became incompetent to manage her affairs, and, after due proceedings had, R. M. Fitzgerald was on December 17, 1890, appointed guardian of her person and estate. Thereafter said guardian demanded of the petitioner the delivery of all property and instruments in his hands belonging to the estate of Mrs. Langdon. The petitioner refused to comply with this demand, whereupon Mr. Fitzgerald applied to the superior court for an order directing petitioner to show cause why he should not deliver up the instrument. After a hearing the court decided that the guardian was entitled to the possession of the package. The petitioner appeared in court, and offered to allow the court to open the package, and, if anything was found therein except Mrs. Langdon's will, to surrender the same to the guardian, but declined to deliver any document purporting to be the last will and testament of Mrs. Langdon. The court thereupon found that the package belonged to the estate of Mrs. Langdon, that the petitioner had the ability to surrender the possession of the same, but had refused to do so, and that the guardian was entitled to the order prayed for. An order was entered accordingly, and thereafter an application was made to this court for a writ of certiorari. A return to the writ has been filed, in which is set forth the affidavit of the guardian upon which the order of the court below was made, the citation, the answer made by the petitioner, the findings and order of the court, and also a bill of exceptions setting forth briefly the testimony taken at the hearing. Counsel for the respondent claim that the order was a proper one under section 1800, Code Civil Proc.[1] We think that this section should be read in connection with sections 1459[2] and 1460, Code Civil Proc., and that the phrase "instrument in writing," as used in section 1800, must be construed as referring to instruments to the possession of which the guardian is entitled as an asset or as evidence of his ward's title to property. The last will and testament of the ward is not an asset. Neither is it an instrument which the guardian could use in the recovery of an asset. It cannot in any way relate to any matter within his power or duties, or in any manner affect his action as a guardian, because it cannot take effect until after his authority has ceased. He certainly cannot annul, revoke, destroy, or in any way dispose of it, nor can the court authorize him to do so; and we are unable to see upon what ground he is entitled to its possession, or to a knowledge of its contents. If it were in his hands, of course it would be his duty to preserve it, but here it appears that the maker of the will, before she became incompetent, selected the petitioner as the custodian thereof, with special directions to retain the same until her death, unless she called for it, and upon her death to deliver it to her executor. The petitioner is charged with the execution of this trust. It is a trust which could be revoked only by Mrs. Langdon herself. The petitioner could not lawfully deliver it to any third person, and it would be a gross breach of trust in him voluntarily to disclose the contents to any one. Story, Bailm. § 92; Civil Code, § 1835. The guardian occupies the same position that a third person would. A person competent to make a will has a right to select the custodian, and to cause it to remain in his hands until called for, or until death makes it necessary for the custodian to deliver it to the court, or to a person named in the will. To hold that the subsequent incompetency of the maker of the will entitles the guardian to the possession of the instrument would defeat the evident purpose of the maker.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 1800, reads as follows: "Upon complaint made to him by any guardian, ward, creditor, or other person interested in the estate, or having a prospective interest therein, as heir or otherwise, against any one suspected of having concealed, embezzled, or conveyed away any of the money, goods, or effects, or an instrument in writing belonging to the ward or to his estate, the superior court, or a judge thereof, may cite such suspected person to appear before such court, and may examine and proceed with him on such charge in the manner provided in this title with respect to persons suspected of and charged with concealing or embezzling the effects of a decedent."

It is claimed by counsel for respondent that if there was any trust it was extinguished when petitioner delivered the package to the messenger, and that it was only the second package with which the court dealt. We think the facts stated in the findings show that the will was called for, not with the intent of terminating the trust, but only for a temporary purpose, and that the subsequent delivery by Mrs. Langdon, without further instruction, and under circumstances showing no intention to revoke or modify her directions, left the package in the possession of the petitioner upon the terms of the original trust.

Counsel for respondent contends that we ought to deny this writ, because the petitioner appeared in person in the court below, answered, offered testimony, submitted the case, and never in any way suggested that he questioned the jurisdiction of the court; "in fact, never did question it by plea or otherwise." We do not know what was said in the argument in the court below. Of course, in fairness to the court, counsel for the petitioner ought to have called its attention fully to the points now made; but the failure to do so does not deprive him of his right to have the order annulled, if it was in fact made in excess of jurisdiction. Furthermore, he was bound to submit himself to examination; and, in his answer, and after the decision of the court, he insisted upon his right to retain the will, and denied the power of the court to compel him to surrender it.

The court found that "said sealed package belonged to said Nora Langdon, and belongs to the estate of said Nora Langdon, and said guardian is entitled to the possession of the same." It is claimed by counsel for respondent that this finding is conclusive. Assuming that the facts found, and not the issues and order, are the tests of jurisdiction, and are decisive of the question whether certiorari will lie, the point made is not well taken. The finding quoted is the conclusion of law which the court drew from the facts found. No one knows what is in the package; but it must be treated as containing only the will of Mrs. Langdon. The findings show that the petitioner tendered the package to the court for examination of its contents, and offered to deliver the possession of anything contained therein except the will. If we are right in the views we have expressed on the main question, this is all the petitioner can be required to do. We think that the learned judge of the court below erred in his conclusion, and that the order is void for want of jurisdiction. The order under review is annulled.

WRIT OF ERROR—ADJUDICATION IN INSOLVENCY—ELECTION OF ASSIGNEE.

1. A writ of error will not lie to review the action of the superior court in adjudicating a person an insolvent debtor; the remedy being by appeal under the insolvent act, § 67, providing for an appeal from an order granting or refusing an adjudication in insolvency.

2. A writ of error, being an original suit, and

[2] Code Civil Proc. § 1459, reads as follows: "If any executor, administrator, or other person interested in the estate of a decedent complains to the superior court, or a judge thereof, on oath, that any person is suspected to have concealed, embezzled, smuggled, conveyed away, or disposed of any moneys, goods, or chattels of the decedent, or has in his possession or knowledge any deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts, or other writings which contain evidences of or tend to disclose the right, title, interest, or claim of the decedent to any real or personal estate, or any claim or demand, or any lost will, the said court or judge may cite such person to appear before such court, and may examine him on oath upon the matter of such complaint. If such person is not in the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted, he may be cited and examined, either before the superior court of the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted. But if, in the latter case, he appears, and is found innocent, his necessary expenses must be allowed him out of the estate."

not in the nature of a writ of review, can only affect parties or strangers from the service of the citation.

3. Where a claim against an insolvent is partly secured, the unsecured portion thereof may be voted at the election for an assignee.

McFARLAND, J., concurs in the judgment.

In bank.

Original proceeding by writ of error by F. H. Widber against the superior court of San Joaquin county, state of California, and Joseph H. Budd, as judge of said court. Writ dismissed.

E. S. Heller and Carter & Smith, for petitioner. Nutter & De Vries, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an original proceeding by writ of error to review the action of the superior court of San Joaquin county in adjudging one W. W. Stockwell an insolvent debtor, and also in allowing one E. R. Stockwell and the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank to vote their respective claims held against said insolvent debtor in the election of an assignee, and in adjudging the election of said E. R. Stockwell as assignee of the estate of said insolvent debtor. Respondent has moved to quash the writ upon various grounds. Among others, it is insisted that neither the court which committed the alleged error nor the judge thereof is a proper party to the proceeding, but that the persons directly interested in the result of this litigation should be made defendants, and given an opportunity to be heard before their rights are judicially declared. The controversy upon the main questions involved appears to be so entirely without merit that we refrain from considering the motion to quash the writ, and pass directly to the alleged errors of law which we are called upon to review. It is claimed that the court erred in adjudicating Stockwell an insolvent debtor upon his voluntary petition, while an involuntary petition therefor was pending before the court. It is also claimed that the court erred in allowing the claim of E. R. Stockwell and the claim of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank to be voted for assignee. Counsel insist that such claims were secured claims, and that holders of secured claims are not entitled to participate in the election of an assignee. As to the alleged error in adjudicating Stockwell an insolvent debtor, section 67 of the insolvent act provides: "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court (1) from an order granting or refusing an adjudication in insolvency." There being an appeal from such order of the court, a writ of error will not lie. Railroad Co. v. Harlan, 24 Cal. 334. The record and bill of exceptions make it apparent that the claim of E. R. Stockwell was not secured, and that the claim of the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank was only secured to the extent of $675. There can be no question but that the unsecured portion of this claim could be voted at the election for assignee, and that of itself was sufficient in amount to secure the election of the assignee declared by the court elected. There are many matters discussed in respondents' brief, unnecessary to consider, for the points referred to dispose of the case. The plaintiff in error appears to have considered this proceeding to have been in the nature of a writ of review, but such is not the fact. In Lessee of Taylor v. Boyd, 3 Ohio, 354, the court said: "In the obvious nature and character of the proceeding a writ of error is a new and original suit. Original process issues in it, and must be served to bring the adverse party into court. The relative character of the parties is changed. New pleadings are made up, and a final judgment upon it, though it may operate on the original cause, is nevertheless a termination of the new suit or process in error. * * * We adhere to the doctrine that the writ of error is a new suit, and can only affect parties or strangers from the service of the citation." Let the writ be dismissed and respondent have judgment for costs.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment. As to whether or not a writ of error lies, in any case, under our system, I express no opinion.

MURRAY, Ramie Commissioner, v. COLGAN, State Comptroller. (No. 14,602.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — ACT CONTAINING TWO ITEMS OF APPROPRIATION.

Act March 31, 1891, entitled "An act to encourage the cultivation of ramie in the state of California; to provide a bounty for ramie fiber, and to make an appropriation therefor; to appoint a state superintendent of ramie culture, and make an appropriation for his salary,"—by section 1 appropriates $10,000 "for the purpose of encouraging the cultivation of ramie." Section 2 provides an expenditure "either for the purchase of ramie roots for free distribution to farmers, or in the payment of a bounty for merchantable ramie." Section 4 provides for appointment and payment of a state superintendent. Held, that the act contains two distinct items of appropriation, for expressly different special purposes, and is in violation of Const. art. 4, § 34, which provides that "no bill making appropriation of money * * * shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose, to be therein expressed."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Demurrer by E. P. Colgan, state comptroller, to application by W. H. Murray, ramie commissioner, requiring him to draw warrant for salary, sustained. Murray appeals. Affirmed.

Ash & Matthews and W. H. Murray, for appellant. Barham & Bolton, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This was an application to the superior court of the city and county of Sacramento by the appellant, who, pursuant to an act of the legislature of March 31, 1891, (St. 1891, p. 283,) was appointed state superintendent of ramie culture, for a writ of mandate to respondent, state comptroller, requiring him to draw his warrant for the salary of the appellant.

A demurrer to the application was sustained upon the sole ground that the appropriation for the payment of such salary is in violation of section 34 of article 4 of the constitution, which reads as follows: "No bill making an appropriation of money, except the general appropriation bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose, to be therein expressed." As no amendment of the application could avoid this ground of objection, judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff brings this appeal therefrom. The title of the act making the appropriation is as follows: "An act to encourage the cultivation of ramie in the state of California; to provide a bounty for ramie fiber, and to make an appropriation therefor; to appoint a state superintendent of ramie culture, and make an appropriation of his salary." The first section of the act appropriates $10,000 "for the purpose of encouraging the cultivation of ramie in the state of California." The second section provides that this appropriation shall be under the control of the state board of agriculture, and may be expended "either for the purchase of ramie roots for free distribution to farmers, or in the payment of a bounty for merchantable ramie fiber; but no greater sum than one thousand dollars shall be paid in any one year for the purchase of ramie roots, and no greater amount than one cent per pound shall be paid as a bounty for merchantable ramie fiber." The third section directs the comptroller to draw his warrants upon the state treasurer in favor of the state board of agriculture, or the proper officers thereof, in the same manner as other appropriations are drawn upon and paid to the state board of agriculture. The fourth section provides for the appointment by the state board of agriculture of a state superintendent of ramie culture, whose salary shall be $100 per month, to be paid by the state treasurer in the same manner as the salaries of other state officers are to be paid, and prescribes his duties. The fifth section appropriates $2,400 for the payment of the salary of the state superintendent of ramie culture during two specified years.

The act certainly does contain two distinct items of appropriation, payable to different persons, and for expressly different special purposes, distinctly stated in both the title and the body of the act; and there is no pretense that it is a general appropriation act. It is claimed by appellant, however, that the act has but one general purpose, and that the two appropriations subserve this general purpose, viz., "to encourage the cultivation of ramie in the state of California." Conceding this, still the constitution prohibits more than one item of appropriation in the same bill, for any one purpose; and, in addition to this, requires the one item to be "for one single and certain purpose." To permit numerous appropriations for different specific purposes, more or less promotive of some general purpose, would not only be opposed to the plain literal meaning of the section of the constitution under consideration, but would evade and defeat any conceivable effect of that section which the framers of the constitution can be presumed to have intended. Indeed, the intention of the section is too plainly expressed to admit of construction, whatever may be thought of its policy. I think the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Los Angeles, P. & G. Ry. Co. v. Rumpp.

(No. 14,449.)

Eminent Domain—Compensation.

In an action to condemn land, where the length of the strip of land sought to be condemned was 1,001 feet, and the only evidence given at the trial as to the cost of building a lawful fence along its right of way was 30 cents per foot, a finding by the court that it would cost only $100 to build such fence was not sustained by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles, Pasadena & Glendale Railway Company against Minnie Rumpp. From a judgment awarding certain damages to defendant, and refusing certain other damages claimed, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Dooner & Burdett, for appellant. Brousseau, Hatch & Thomas, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is from a judgment and order refusing defendant a new trial, in an action brought to condemn land for a right of way for plaintiff's railroad. The case was tried without a jury, and the points made are: (1) The judge heard material evidence out of court. (2) The evidence does not justify the finding that the value of the land was $75 only, but shows that such value was $350. (3) The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the damage to the portion of defendant's land not sought to be condemned will be $600, whereas it appears from the evidence that such damage will be upward of $4,000. (4) The evidence does not justify the finding that the cost of building a good and sufficient fence along the line of said proposed railroad, upon the strip of land sought to be condemned, will be $100, but the evidence shows that the cost of such fence will be upwards of $500.

It is evident that, if any of these grounds be found to necessitate a reversal, no good can result from a discussion of the other points made. The length of the right of way, or strip sought to be condemned through defendant's land, is 1,001 feet. The only evidence given at the trial, as to the cost of building a lawful fence along this right of way, was 30 cents per foot. Of course the finding that it will cost $100 is not sustained by the evidence, but is contrary thereto. By stipulation of the parties, the judge during the trial visited the premises for the purpose of making a personal inspection, and it is claimed that what he saw and learned by inspection is evidence in the case; that he may have seen that there were natural obstructions which would amount to a fence, or that under the circumstances no fence was necessary or even practicable, as the proposed roadbed was the wash of Arroyo Seco creek. To this suggestion it may be replied that it is not so found, and, if it had been, such finding would be inconsistent with the other testimony in the case; and, further, by finding that good and sufficient fences would cost $100, the court concedes the necessity of a fence. It is also said that the defendant cannot complain, because it has been held that the assessment of the cost of fencing is made to enforce a duty imposed by law, and not as damages to the landowner for an injury to his land. Butte Co. v. Boydston, 64 Cal. 110, 29 Pac. Rep. 511; California S. R. Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 67 Cal. 59, 7 Pac. Rep. 123. But, if such be the case, it is the duty in which the landowner has a special interest, and, if the railroad company does not build the fence, the statute expressly authorizes him to collect the amount. And, on the other hand, the railroad company, by paying the amount assessed to the landowner, diminishes its responsibility, and renders the landowner liable for certain losses which may occur unless he builds and maintains the fence. Plainly, therefore, it is a matter in which the defendant has a substantial interest, and the error is prejudicial to her. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

COWDEN v. PACIFIC COAST S. S. Co. (No. 14,377.)

CARRIERS OF FREIGHT—DISCRIMINATION—COMMON-LAW LIABILITY.

At common law an action will lie against a common carrier for an unreasonable and excessive freight charge, but not for a mere discrimination in favor of another shipper.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by J. B. Cowden against the Pacific Coast Steamship Company to recover damages for a discrimination in freight charges.

L. L. Boone, for appellant. Luce & McDonald, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff to recover damages of defendant for a discrimination in freight rates. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and that no cause of action was stated. The demurrer was sustained, and the ruling of the court in this regard is the only matter before us for review.

The complaint substantially alleges that the defendant is a common carrier of freight, by vessel, between San Francisco and San Diego, via the Pacific ocean; that between certain dates plaintiff, as a merchant of San Diego, paid to defendant, according to its regular schedule of rates, large sums of money as charges for freight; that defendant charged a second merchant 12½ per cent. less for freight of the same character and quantity than it did plaintiff; that said charges were a discrimination against plaintiff, and, though often requested so to do, defendant refused to allow plaintiff such reduced rates, whereby he has been damaged in the sum of $1,674.14. The amount sought to be recovered as damages is the difference between the freight charges made to plaintiff and those made to the more favored merchant. It would seem to be entirely immaterial, to the extent, at least, of the consideration of the merits of this appeal, whether the present action is one of contract or of tort. From either standpoint it arises from a maritime contract solely, and courts of admiralty alone have jurisdiction, unless the cause comes within the reservation found in section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: "The jurisdiction vested in the courts of the United States, in the cases and proceedings hereafter mentioned, shall be exclusive of the courts of the several states; * * * (3) Of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." There can be no question but that the voyage of a carrier made upon the high seas, even though the ports of departure and destination are in the same state, is under the exclusive control and regulation of congress. It is only the internal commerce and navigation of a state that is under the control and regulation of the state. As was said in Carpenter v. The Emma Johnson, 1 Cliff. 638: "Great mischief would inevitably result from any rule denying admiralty jurisdiction in all cases where the place of the departure of the vessel and the place of her destination are both within the same state, when any part of the voyage is upon the high seas, for every navigator knows that in many such cases nearly the whole voyage is out of the limits of the state." See Lord v. Steamship Co., 102 U. S. 544; Pacific Coast Steamship Co. v. Board of Railroad Com'rs, 18 Fed. Rep. 10.

It follows from the foregoing authorities that plaintiff has no standing in the courts of this state, unless his rights are reserved to him under the reservation of the Revised Statutes previously quoted. In other words, has he a cause of action at common law against the defendant, under the facts of his complaint? The gist of the complaint is that for the same quantity and character of freight plaintiff was charged a sum 12½ per cent. greater for transportation from the same point than the other merchant. Respondent insists that at common law the right of action was based upon the rate charged being unreasonable and excessive in itself, and that a mere discrimination, as disclosed in this case, gave no cause of action; that no wrong was committed if the charge was reasonable for the service, and, there being no wrong, no remedy was demanded. Appellant insists that at common law it is the duty of the carrier to "receive and carry goods for all persons alike, and that the rates must not only be reasonable, but equal, when the conditions are substantially the same." It will thus be seen that the merits of this appeal will be concluded by a determination as to what is the common law upon this question; and that is a matter of some difficulty of solution, owing to the divergent views expressed upon the subject by the various courts of this country. This divergence of opinion among the courts has undoubtedly been caused to some extent by the fact that for more than 50 years the courts of England have had no occasion to expound the common law upon this subject; common carriers, especially railway companies, having been placed entirely under the control of the statute law. In this country, to some extent, there is a lack of direct authority upon the question, owing to the fact that constitutional and legislative provisions are common in nearly all the states of this Union, prohibiting common carriers from practicing discrimination in their rates of toll. And, while these statutory and constitutional provisions have been regarded and incidentally declared to be reiterations of the common law by many courts of this country, sound authority upon which to base such declarations is wanting in the books. The fundamental and statute law of the various states upon this subject appears to have been founded upon the principles embodied in the early acts of parliament pertaining to the conduct and control of railways as common carriers, rather than upon the common law of England. Indeed, we have been able to obtain but few direct adjudications from English courts upon this question, owing to the fact that it would seem the business of inland common carriers in that country was not a matter of great concern until railroads were operated; and, immediately subsequent to that great epoch in the world's progress, statutory enactments followed, entirely taking away from the courts the necessity of any further application of the common-law rights and remedies. If the common law were as appellant here contends it to be, there would have been no necessity for parliament to have enacted these stringent "equality clauses," as they were termed. It appears that this principle of equality of charges arose from the necessity of the times, a necessity created by the operation of railroads, which swallowed up and destroyed all other common carrier systems of England, and thereby created a monopoly of the business, and a power for wrong that at once demanded the restrictions of legislative enactments. This conclusion is fully borne out by the language of Mr. Justice Blackburn in Railway Co. v. Sutton, L. R. 4 H. L. 238, wherein he said: "I think it appears from the preamble of the 90th section of the railways clauses consolidation act (1845) that the legislature was of opinion that the changed state of things arising from the general use of railways made it expedient to impose an obligation on railway companies acting as carriers beyond what is imposed on a carrier at common law. And, if this be borne in mind, I think the construction of the proviso for equality is clear, and is that the defendants may, subject to the limitations in their special acts, charge what they think fit, but not more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others under the same circumstances. And I think it follows from this that if the defendants do charge more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others, the charge is, by virtue of the statute, extortionate. And I think the rights and remedies of a person made to pay a charge beyond the limit of equality imposed by the statute on railway companies, acting as carriers, on their line, must be precisely the same as those of a person made to pay a charge beyond the limit imposed by the common law on ordinary carriers as being more than was reasonable. The mode of establishing that the demand is extortionate differs in the two cases. Where it is sought to prove that the charge is unreasonable, and therefore extortionate, the fact that another was charged less is only material as evidence for the jury tending to prove that the reasonable charge was the smaller one. When it is sought to show that the charge is extortionate, as being contrary to the statutable obligation to charge equally, it is immaterial whether the charge is reasonable or not; it is enough to show that the company carried for some other person or class of persons at a lower charge during the period throughout which the party complaining was charged more under the like circumstances."

It is not the purpose of the court to review the authorities of this country upon the question under discussion. For the reasons previously suggested, the matter was only indirectly involved in the great majority of them, and, as authority upon the subject, they are weakened to that extent. The case of Scofield v. Railway Co., 43 Ohio St. 571, 3 N. E. Rep. 907, is the leading case in the United States supporting appellant's contention, and it is upon this case that appellant says "he has pinned his faith and hung his hope." The case of Johnson v. Railroad Co., 16 Fla. 623, is the leading case in this country holding to the contrary view, and the opinion of the learned judge in the Scofield Case does not appear to overrule the doctrine there declared, but would seem to look to the statute law of Ohio for support, rather than to the common law. It says, in speaking of the Florida case: "Reliance is placed on the doctrine that discrimination is not necessarily unlawful, and that all the freighter is entitled to is a reasonable rate, not necessarily equal to all, and, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, we are not inclined to question the correctness of these decisions." The facts in the Florida case appear to be practically identical with the facts of this case. Florida had no statutory law upon the subject of the regulation of common carriers, and hence, as here, the merits of the case rested upon the determination as to what was the common law upon the subject. In this case the ancient, as well as the modern, authorities are ably reviewed, and the court says: "Our conclusions are that, as against a common or public carrier, every person has the same right; that in all cases, where his common duty controls, he cannot refuse A. and accommodate B.; that all, the entire public, have the right to the same carriage for a reasonable price, and at a reasonable charge for the service performed; that the commonness of the duty to carry for all does not involve a commonness or equality of compensation or charge; that all a shipper can ask of a common carrier is that for the service performed he shall charge no more than a reasonable sum to him; that whether the carrier charges another more or less than the price charged a particular individual may be a matter of evidence in determining whether a charge is too much or too little for the service performed; and that the difference between the charges cannot be the measure of damages in any case, unless it is established by proof that the smaller charge is the true, reasonable charge, in view of the transportation furnished, and that the higher charge is excessive to that degree." The court also says: "In the last edition of Story on Bailments we find the rule of the common law thus stated: 'At common law a common carrier of goods is not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. He is bound to accept and carry for all upon being paid a reasonable compensation. But the fact that he charges less for one than for another is only evidence to show that a particular charge is unreasonable,—nothing more. There is nothing in the common law to hinder a carrier from carrying for favored individuals at any unreasonably low rate, or even gratis.'"

By reason of the variance which exists in the views of the courts of this country as to what is the common law upon this subject, it would seem that the adjudications of the common-law courts of England upon such a matter should have preeminent and controlling weight with the courts of the various states. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Sutton, to which reference has already been made, Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, in a very luminous opinion, addressed in part directly to this question, said: "At common law a person holding himself out as a common carrier of goods was not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. The obligation which the common law imposed upon him was to accept and carry all goods delivered to him for carriage according to his profession, (unless he had some reasonable excuse for not doing so,) on being paid a reasonable compensation for so doing; and, if the carrier refused to accept such goods, an action lay against him for so refusing; and if the customer, in order to induce the carrier to perform the duty, paid, under protest, a larger sum than was reasonable, he might recover back the surplus beyond what the carrier was entitled to receive, in an action for money had and received, as being money extorted from him. But the fact that the carrier charged others less, though it was evidence to show that the charge was unreasonable, was no more than evidence tending that way. There was nothing in the common law to hinder a carrier from carrying for favored individuals at an unreasonably low rate, or even gratis. All that the law required was that he should not charge any more than was reasonable." The learned justice in his opinion clearly indicates that the prime object of the railway equality clauses enacted by parliament was to cover the exact case of injury by discrimination in freights, such as is claimed by plaintiff in this record. During the progress of the argument in Baxendale v. Railway Co., 4 C. B. (N. S.) 78, Justice BYLES said: "I know no common-law reason why a carrier may not charge less than what is reasonable to one person, or even carry him free of all charge." For the foregoing reasons the court concludes that the complaint is deficient in not stating that the charge to plaintiff was unreasonable; and that the allegation of discrimination or inequality is not the equivalent of an allegation of an excessive charge. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SAN BERNARDINO & E. RY. CO. v. HAVEN et al. (No. 14,375.)

EMINENT DOMAIN — COMPENSATION—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE.

1. Under Const. art. 1, § 14, which provides that no right of way shall be appropriated until compensation is made, irrespective of any benefits from the proposed improvements, the court properly refused to permit a railroad company to show that the construction of its road would prevent the depreciation of the land not taken, by reason of making the products more accessible to the markets.

2. Where the land through which a right of way is sought to be taken is adapted to cultivation, the increased cost of cultivating it, caused by building the road, may be considered in assessing damages.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. H. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Proceedings by the San Bernardino & Eastern Railway Company against Frances T. Haven and others to condemn a right of way through defendants' lands. From a judgment entered on a verdict assessing damages in favor of each defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

A. Brunson, E. E. Rowell, and Harris & Gregg, for appellant. Rolfe & Freeman, Paris & Fox, and Geo. E. Otis, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff, a railway corporation, instituted this action against certain parties, as the owners of separate tracts of land, for the purpose of condemning to the use of the corporation a portion of the land of each of the parties owning the tracts, as a right of way for the line of its road across these several tracts. Some of the parties made no answer, and the matter of their compensation is not in issue here. Some answered, setting up that the lands sought to be condemned were not necessary to be taken for the proposed use of the railroad as a right of way, but demanding that, if the lands are taken, the value thereof and damages for the taking, etc., be awarded them. Others filed an answer in the nature of a general denial of the allegations of the complaint. A trial was had before the court and a jury between the plaintiff and the defendants, J. W. Hall, A. M. Ham, H. H. Linville, H. H. Jones, F. E. Dudley, J. D. Langford, C. H. Tyler, J. B. Tyler, James Fleming, and C. A. Lamb. The jury assessed damages in favor of all the parties with respect to each tract of land affected by the taking of the proposed right of way, and upon that the court rendered its judgment, following the verdict of the jury, etc. From that and an order denying a new trial the plaintiff appeals.

The principal errors relied on for a reversal of the judgment and order seem to be the rulings of the court upon the admission and rejection of evidence. The damages alleged to have been done to the land of defendant H. H. Linville, who owned it separate from the other defendants, was being inquired into from him as a witness, and upon cross examination he was asked by plaintiff's counsel these questions: "Is it not a fact that oranges will bring a better price by reason of the railroad being there? Isn't the value of the crop dependent on the market that you have for it, and its accessibility to the market? Will not the accessibility of the produce of the land to the market by reason of the construction of that road prevent any depreciation in its value?" These were all objected to, and the objections sustained by the court on the ground that they were immaterial and irrelevant, in that they sought to show benefits accruing to the land by reason of the improvement proposed; that is, the construction of the railroad. It is argued for the appellant that these questions only sought for evidence to show that the land not taken for the right of way would not be depreciated in value; and therefore no damages could result to it, and that such evidence would not go to show a benefit. We do not so understand the questions. They certainly called for evidence which might show a benefit from the improvement proposed. Article 1, § 14, of the state constitution reads thus: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner, and no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation other than municipal until full compensation therefor be first made in money, or ascertained and paid into court for the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation, which compensation shall be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived as in other civil cases in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." It is argued for appellant that the prohibition contained in this section against taking into consideration the benefit to arise from the improvement is limited to that land which is taken for the right of way, and has no reference to benefits that may accrue to the land not taken. This position, however, is in direct opposition to the construction given to the section by this court in Railway Co. v. Porter, 74 Cal. 261, 15 Pac. Rep. 774, and which was afterwards expressly approved in Muller v. Railway Co., 83 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. Rep. 265. While it is true that, if it could be shown that the value of the land would be enhanced by reason of the improvement, the damage sustained by the owner would be to that extent reduced, still such evidence would be only another mode of showing the amount of benefit derived from the improvement; and inasmuch as the constitution declares that the owner is entitled to receive full compensation for the damage done to his land, as well as for the land which is taken, irrespective of any benefit to be thereafter derived by reason of the improvement, such evidence would be irrelevant and immaterial.

Other exceptions were taken by the appellant to the rulings of the court in excluding as well as in admitting evidence upon the issue of damages, but, as the rulings of the court in these particulars appear to have been made in accordance with the foregoing construction of the constitution, it is unnecessary to consider them in detail. For the same reason the following instruction, given at the instance of the defendants, and excepted to by the appellant, was correct, viz.: "In fixing the amount of damages to that portion of the tract of each defendant not sought to be condemned, which may accrue by reason of the running of the railroad through their premises, the jury must ascertain and fix the amount, irrespective of any benefit which may result to defendants from the proposed railroad." It is also claimed by the appellant that the court erred in admitting evidence of the increased cost which might result from a system of irrigation upon some tracts, which would have to be adopted if the railroad were built, beyond that which would be suitable if the road was not built. The objection urged is that the land is uncultivated, and that no such system has yet been adopted, or is in contemplation of adoption. The land appears to have been unadapted to cultivation unless irrigated, and the damage caused by the building of the railroad would be increased if, by reason of such building, the owner was compelled to incur greater expense in its irrigation. Although then uncultivated, the land was shown to be adapted to cultivation. If so, the increase of any cost for bringing it under cultivation, caused by the building of the railroad through the land involved, would be a legitimate subject of inquiry, for the purpose of ascertaining the damage sustained by the owner.

McCreery v. Wells. (No. 14,515.)

Action for Money Had and Received—When Lies—Harmless Error.

1. An action for money had and received does not lie to recover money placed in defendant's hands as an officer of a land pool, and with plaintiff's consent invested in land contracts in trust for plaintiff, though defendant, after the purchase, contrary to plaintiff's wishes, transferred the contracts to a corporation formed of the members of the pool, and refused to issue to plaintiff his proportion of stock in the corporation.

2. Since, in any event, the money could not be recovered in this form of action, the error of finding, contrary to the evidence, that defendant did not receive plaintiff's money, was harmless.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action for money had and received, by Fenton R. McCreery against C. M. Wells. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Brousseau & Hatch, for appellant. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for respondent.

Foote, C. The plaintiff sues to recover $5,000 and interest from the defendant. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant, on the 4th of November, 1887, received $5,000 of the plaintiff's money to be invested for the latter in lands of the "California Cheap Land Pool;" that the defendant did invest the money in that pool, and in some lands or other investments, but not to the use and benefit of the plaintiff, but in the name of the defendant and for himself; that the plaintiff has demanded his money thus invested in the name of the defendant, and has not received it or any part of it, or anything for and on account thereof. For a second cause of action it is alleged that the $5,000 came into the possession of the defendant for and on account of the plaintiff, and as his property, and that it still is held in trust for the plaintiff by the defendant; that the defendant has been called on by the plaintiff for an accounting for that sum of money, and that it be returned and paid to the plaintiff, with interest from the 4th of November, 1887, to which demand the defendant has failed and refused to accede, or to pay anything to the plaintiff, and that the defendant still retains it for and on account of the plaintiff; that the latter is entitled to the return of the money and interest; and, therefore, judgment is demanded, etc. The answer denies these allegations. The cause was tried by the court, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made and denied. From the order made in that behalf this appeal is taken.

The findings are assailed as being unsupported by the evidence. They read thus: "(1) The defendant did not receive the sum of $5,000 or any sum of the money or property of plaintiff at any time, for the purpose of investing the same in any lands, or for any purpose, or at all; but the said $5,000 was received by parties other than the defendant, for the purpose of investing the same in said lands. (2) That defendant did not invest said money, or any money, of the plaintiff to his, the defendant's, use or benefit in any manner, or at all. That said sum of $5,000 was invested for the benefit of and on account of plaintiff in lands of the California Cheap Land Pool, and plaintiff derived the benefit and use of said investment of said $5,000. (3) That defendant has never received or come into possession of $5,000, or any sum, belonging to, or for or on account of, plaintiff, and has not held any money in trust for plaintiff, and did not and does not retain the same on account of or to the use of plaintiff. (4) That plaintiff is not entitled to said or any sum of money, or to have the same returned to him from the defendant." From these findings this conclusion of law is declared: "That the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief against the defendant, and defendant is entitled to a judgment that plaintiff take nothing, and for his costs."

The facts of the case, about which there is neither question nor conflict, are, among others, that the defendant received authority from the plaintiff's father to invest a certain $5,000 which the father had of the son's money in a certain cheap land pool, about which the father had been advised by a letter from the defendant; and in pursuance of this arrangement the defendant drew a draft on the father, and sent it for collection through a bank in Los Angeles, of which one Arnold was cashier, as also a member, as was the defendant, of this cheap land pool. The money, when collected, was directed by defendant to be placed to the credit of Arnold as treasurer of this land pool. When the draft was paid, its proceeds were accordingly placed to the credit of Arnold, and were invested, according to the original directions of the father, in the purchase of certain contracts for the purchase of lands, which contracts were taken in the names of Arnold and the defendant. The plaintiff then came to Los Angeles, and seemed to acquiesce in this disposition of his money, which we think beyond all question was in fact invested for him by the defendant, even although he may not and did not actually take the money into his hands or pay it out; for what was done with it was certainly done by his direction. Then, for certain reasons, the plaintiff became dissatisfied, and wanted the land pool to turn over certain of the lands to him as his own. This they would not consent to do, and finally, by a vote of the members of the pool, except the plaintiff and one Crawford, they formed a corporation, and Wells, the defendant, and Arnold, against the consent of the plaintiff, transferred the land contracts—that is, equities in lands which they had in their own names individually, but really as trustees for all the pool members—to this new corporation, and issued stock in certain proportions to all the members, who accepted it; but, as the plaintiff would not agree to the incorporation or transfer, or consent to the acts of Wells, the defendant, (who, all the while up to the final transfer, held the equitable interest in these lands which the plaintiff's money had purchased, in his, Wells', own name, in conjunction with Arnold as trustees for the plaintiff,) the proportion of stock which would otherwise have been the plaintiff's was issued to the defendant. Plaintiff's money having been invested in the pool by his consent, his right was to his proportionate share of the property purchased by them and held by Arnold and Wells as his trustees. If Wells, or Arnold and Wells, have, in violation of their trust,—a question which we are not now called upon to decide,—turned the property over to a corporation, he or they are responsible to plaintiff for such violation of their trust, but not for the money invested in good faith in obedience to plaintiff's orders, and this suit, which is substantially an action for money had and received, cannot be maintained. The finding that Wells did not receive plaintiff's money, though contrary to the evidence, is harmless, for, supposing that fact to have been found the other way, still plaintiff could not recover. From this it follows that the order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

Williams v. Dennison. (No. 13,987.)

Pleading—Reply—Appeal—Assignments of Error—Evidence.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 462, which declares that the statement of any new matter in the answer, in avoidance or constituting a defense, "must on the trial be deemed controverted by the opposite party," in an action for money had and received, where defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, the jury could consider any question of fraud on the part of defendant which would take the case out of such statute, even though the complaint contained no averment as to those matters.

2. A specification by defendant that "the evidence shows that all amounts of money collected by defendant, and all amounts of cash which had been paid him by plaintiff, were more than two years before the commencement of this action, and therefore barred by the statute of limitations, except the $70 paid by R.," was insufficient to raise the question on appeal as to whether there was any evidence of fraud on his part.

3. Where a witness for plaintiff had produced a summarized statement of the account from plaintiff's books, it was not error to admit a statement as to the footings made by plaintiff's attorney, in answer to a question by one of the jurors.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by C. B. Williams against E. F. Dennison for money had and received. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. McKinne, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action for money had and received. The complaint was filed September 12, 1889, and it alleged that the money sued for—$1,131.73—was received by the defendant for the use and benefit of the plaintiff on the 28th day of October, 1887, at the city and county of San Francisco. The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint, and alleged that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. The case was tried before a jury, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $581.67. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The principal point made for a reversal is that all the items of plaintiff's demand, except $70, were received by defendant more than two years before the commencement of the action, and hence their recovery was barred by the statute. It appears that in 1887 the plaintiff was a street contractor, and the defendant was employed by him to solicit contracts and to collect the moneys due thereon, and that he was to receive for his services a certain percentage of the contract prices. Under this arrangement defendant proceeded to get contracts and to make collections until the latter part of September, 1887. At the trial plaintiff offered in evidence several statements made by defendant of his collections, but attached to them were no dates showing when any of the collections were made. Plaintiff also introduced evidence tending to show that defendant collected and failed to account for more money, after deducting his commissions, than was found by the verdict to be due from him. When the plaintiff rested, the defendant first introduced in evidence a bill of particulars furnished by the plaintiff, commencing as follows: "The following are the items of the account or indebtedness alleged in plaintiff's complaint in above-entitled action. All the amounts received by defendant were received by him at the city and county of San Francisco within two years prior to the commencement of said action." The items of cash received were then stated, but without dates, aggregating $1,131.73, after deducting the credits. Defendant also offered in evidence certain pages of his ledger and block book, "showing the several amounts collected by him under these several contracts, the dates of each payment, and the names of the persons from whom he collected." He was then sworn as a witness in his own behalf, and testified, among other things, that he did not receive all the items of cash charged against him in the bill of particulars, and that "all the amounts collected by me (except the seventy dollars collected from Rose Auerbach) were collected more than two years before the commencement of this action; all the cash advanced by plaintiff to me was advanced more than two years before the commencement of this action." When the case was submitted, the court gave to the jury all the instructions asked by defendant, and among them the following: "All amounts collected by defendant more than two years prior to September 12, 1889, the commencement of this action, which were known by plaintiff to have been collected by defendant, or which he had the opportunity of ascertaining, and were not ascertained by him, or unless the collection of said amounts were fraudulently concealed by the defendant, are barred by the statute of limitations. Should you find that some of said accounts were collected within less than two years prior to 12th day of September, 1889, then your verdict should be only for the amounts so collected. Facts constituting fraud must be proved. If the jury believe from the evidence that defendant was the agent of plaintiff in the collection of any moneys claimed in the complaint, and plaintiff has failed to prove that defendant made any concealment of facts, or misrepresentations, or deceit, or other facts constituting a fraud as to said collections, and for all sums that plaintiff has failed to prove were collected within two years before said 12th day of September, 1889, then said sums are barred by the statute of limitations." And when the jury retired "the books, contents, and exhibits of respective parties were, by consent of respective parties, submitted to the jury, and taken by them into the jury room."

It is now suggested that the jury had no right to consider any question of fraud, concealment, or deceit on the part of defendant, for the reason that the complaint contained no averment as to those matters. But no such averments were necessary. Under our statute "the statement of any new matter in the answer, in avoidance or constituting a defense or counterclaim, must on the trial be deemed controverted by the opposite party," (Code Civil Proc. § 462;) and any proper evidence is admissible to meet and overcome that defense, (Curtiss v. Sprague, 49 Cal. 301; Water Co. v. Raynor, 57 Cal. 588.) It is further suggested that there was no evidence of any fraud on the part of the defendant, and hence that the verdict was not justified. The only specification as to the sufficiency of the evidence in this regard is as follows: "The evidence shows that all amounts of moneys collected by defendant, and all amounts of cash which had been paid him by plaintiff, were more than two years before the commencement of this action, and therefore barred by the statute of limitations, except the $70 paid by Rose Auerbach." This specification is clearly not sufficient to raise the question suggested, and it therefore cannot be considered here. It follows that the judgment cannot be reversed on the ground that the verdict was not justified by the evidence.

The only other point made by appellant is that the court erred in the admission of certain evidence. It appears that one F. W. Williams was a witness for plaintiff, and produced a synopsis or summarized statement of the account from plaintiff's books. That synopsis is not brought up in the record, and the only matter referred to as erroneously admitted was a statement made as to the footings by plaintiff's attorney in answer to a question by one of the jurors. In this we see no reversible error. We advise the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PLUMMER v. SHELDON et al. (No. 14,493.)

HIGHWAYS—DEDICATION—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A road was laid out along what was presumed to be the western boundary of a patent by persons supposing that they were acting under the authority of the board of county supervisors; and, although the proceedings were insufficient to constitute it a public road, its use as such was acquiesced in until the true line of the patent was found to be further west. Thereupon the owners of the land included in the patent moved their fences and inclosed the road, but by mutual consent they and the owners of the opposite lands left uninclosed a strip of land between them for use as a public road instead of the other, and it was so used for more than 10 years. Held, that it was thereby dedicated as a public highway, Pol. Code, § 2618, defining "public highways" as "roads * * * laid out or erected as such by the public, or, if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action by A. M. Plummer against W. C. Sheldon, A. Mull, and Sarah W. Belcher. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Blanchard and A. L. Hart, for appellants. Elwood Bruner and F. D. Ryan, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff, a road overseer in the county of Sacramento, brought a separate action against each of the appellants here for the obstruction of a public road. For convenience, the appeals are to be heard upon a single consolidated statement on motion for a new trial and the judgment roll of each case. The court below found in favor of the plaintiff in each case, and from the judgment therein rendered, and orders denying a new trial, these appeals are prosecuted. The determination of one involves that of the others. The main questions raised for a reversal of the judgments and orders are that the evidence does not support the findings; and that, even if the findings are supported by the evidence, they do not justify the judgment. The facts, as set out in the findings, are about these: About 25 years before these actions were brought there was a certain road in Sacramento county called the "Grant Line Road," which was supposed to run along the base line of a grant of land from the Mexican government, and patented by the government of the United States to one Jared Sheldon. The parties who are defendants here owned land included in this grant, and along the westerly boundary of the grant this road ran and was much traveled. It was a thoroughfare commencing at the upper Stockton road and followed thence the line of the grant, as first surveyed by one Cleal, to a public road called the "Jackson Road," which ran from the city of Sacramento to the town of Jackson, in Amador county. This "Grant Line Road" was 60 feet wide, and was laid out on the ground, by throwing up a furrow on each side thereof, and harrowing in the center, and was plainly and visibly marked upon the ground throughout its course. It was laid out by those who supposed they were acting under the authority of the board of supervisors of the county, although the proceedings taken, as shown in the evidence, do not appear to have been entirely correct or sufficient to constitute it a public road. From the time it was so laid out it was traveled by the public, and constituted for a period of 10 or 12 years the main line of travel between the southeastern or lower part of the county of Sacramento and Jackson and Placerville, and was commonly called and known as the "Grant Line Road." After that time the travel fell off to some extent, but the road continued to be used by the public on the Cleal line, as originally laid out, until some time in the years 1873 and 1874. About April, 1873, the patent to the grant from the government of the United States was received and recorded, and it then appeared that what had been always supposed, according to the Cleal survey, to be the true base line of the grant, was not such line, but that the true line was that established by another, called the "Thompson survey." The effect of this was to throw the base line of the grant further westward, commencing at a little town called "Sheldon," and running to where the road in controversy intersects the Jackson road. Thus it happened that what was the original grant line road now appeared to be not on the line, as had been supposed, but inside the grant, and varying from a few feet at Sheldon to several hundred feet at the intersection of the Jackson road. After this last base line had become known and established, the road in controversy not having been up to that time generally fenced out by adjoining proprietors, they began to fence out to that line and inclose their lands, and, by common consent, the thoroughfare was changed from the Cleal line to the Thompson line, and the old roadbed became a part of the inclosed premises. But those building fences across the Cleal line left outside these fences enough of their land for the road along the Thompson line. That is, they all recognized the road to have been established as a thoroughfare, but changed its location, by common consent, to where it was intended originally to run; that is, along the true line of the grant. Both before and since this change, down to the year 1883, from about the year 1858, it was an open road, traveled by the public, and generally recognized in the community and by the owners upon said grant as a public highway, and was worked and repaired in different parts by the road authorities of the county. No objection was ever made by any of the landowners along the line of the road to its maintenance as a public highway, up to the year 1883, and since this road was first traveled there has been no other road on or near the grant line, pursuing the same general course, and no other road leading so directly to the towns of Jackson and Placerville, from the lower part of the county of Sacramento. When the road was changed by general consent from the Cleal to the Thompson line, the defendant Mull owned a portion of the land in the Sheldon grant, and also owned a piece of railroad land which was west of and adjoined a portion of the grant land which one Cotton then owned. The grant line of Mull has never been fenced, but about the year 1873–74 he did fence his railroad land, and in doing so left 25 or 30 feet of that land between it and the grant line where Cotton owned outside his (Mull's) fence. About that time Cotton (who owned Sheldon grant land opposite Mull's railroad land) threw up a ditch on his land which was not fenced, about 30 feet inside his land; this left about 60 feet, for a road between Mull's fence and Cotton's ditch. This space was mutually intended by Cotton and Mull for the purposes of said grant line road, and was thereafter used by the public until about 1883, when Mull fenced and obstructed the roadbed thus left by him and Cotton in 1873–74.

J. C. Belcher, the husband and immediate predecessor of Sarah W. Belcher, was the first of the grant landowners to fence his line in 1873 out to the Thompson line. He set his fence inside his line 30 feet, for the express purpose of leaving space for the grant line road. The land west of and opposite to his was at that time government land, and was unfenced. About the year 1873 he died, and the defendant, his widow, thereafter bought a piece of government land, which lay west of and adjoining her grant land. In 1883, desiring to have both her tracts of land under a common fence, she fenced across the road here involved, and up to her government land on its west side, thereby inclosing and obstructing the highway and compelling the travel to turn out at her fences and make a circuit of her government land, and these fences she has since maintained. As to Sheldon, it appears that at the time the grant line road was changed from the Cleal to the Thompson survey base line, Mr. Cotton, above mentioned, owned a portion of the Sheldon grant south of the Jackson road, which was then unfenced. When the change was made, Cotton threw up, as heretofore stated, a ditch on his land 30 feet inside his line, which was intended to mark the line of his land abutting on what he left for the road on his side thereof. About that time Mull, who owned railroad land west of and adjoining Cotton's said land, as before stated, fenced his (Mull's) land, and left outside his fence 25 or 30 feet of his land, which, with the strip left out by Cotton, made a strip of land 60 feet wide between the Cotton ditch and the Mull fence, which Mull and Cotton fenced out for the purposes of the said grant line road. This remained thus until 1883, when Mrs. Belcher obstructed the road, as above stated. After that, about 1885, Sheldon (the immediate successor of Cotton of a portion of the interest held by Cotton in the land above mentioned) fenced in about one half of the grant line roadbed so that it was inside his inclosure. The findings are supported by the evidence, as we think.

The only question, then, left for determination, is whether, from the facts as found, it follows as an ultimate fact necessarily deduced therefrom, that the land here involved was dedicated by the defendants or their predecessors in interest for the purposes of a public road. We think that the facts as found are sufficient to show that the acts of defendants or their predecessors are inconsistent with any construction except that the land was used by the public for a highway with the consent and approval of the owners thereof. We do not think that any of the cases in opposition to this view cited by the appellants involved any such state of facts as those here. And the facts of the case, as set out in the findings, make the conclusion inevitable that at least the owners of the land abandoned possession of it for a public road, and that, therefore, such road thus established on the land is the public highway; for no objections were made by the owners of the land or their predecessors for more than five years as to the use of the land for a public road, either on the Cleal or the Thompson line, and the legal presumption is that the owners abandoned possession of the land for the road. "Public highways," as defined by the Code, "are roads, streets, alleys, lanes, * * * laid out or erected as such by the public, or, if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public." Pol. Code, § 2618. "A highway thus created continues to exist until it is vacated or abandoned by order of the board of supervisors of the county in which it is situated, or by operation of law or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction." Babcock v. Welsh, 71 Cal. 402, 12 Pac. Rep. 337; Pol. Code, §§ 2619–2621; Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. Rep. 871. We conclude, therefore, that the contentions of the defendants are without merit, and advise that the judgments and orders be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgments and orders are affirmed.

COOK et al. v. SUDDEN. (No. 14,399.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—NOTICE—DEDICATION OF HIGHWAY.

1. Where notice of intention to move for a new trial is served by defendant, under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1010, 1011, upon attorneys representing all the plaintiffs, the inadvertent omission of one of the plaintiffs from the title at the top of the notice cannot be held to have misled the attorneys into the belief that the notice was not intended for him, or to have otherwise prejudiced him.

2. Where no offer to dedicate land as a public street is made or intended by the owner, but fences are maintained, and an attempt to open it as a street is resisted, a public map made by the city, on which the land is laid down as a street, is not of itself evidence of dedication or user, nor is a private map, which has never been filed. People v. Reed, 22 Pac. Rep. 474, 81 Cal. 70, followed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by F. S. Cook and others against Robert Sudden. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. A. Shepperd and A. N. Drown, for appellant. Blackstock & Shepherd, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to recover money on an alleged street assessment, for work done by certain contractors. Plaintiffs had judgment as prayed for, from which, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken by defendant. It is claimed by the respondents that the judgment and order should not be disturbed because the notice of motion for a new trial, although served on the attorneys for all the plaintiffs, did not state in the caption thereof the name of one of the plaintiffs. It is perfectly clear that the notice of intention to move for a new trial by defendant was given and made under sections 1010 and 1011 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was directed to and served on the attorneys who were the attorneys for all the plaintiffs; and the fact that by inadvertence the name of one of the plaintiffs, Robert Bell, was left out of the title of the cause, at the top of the notice, should certainly not be held to have misled these attorneys into the belief, as there is no pretense that it did, that no such notice was intended as to their client, Robert Bell. In fact, there is nothing in the record which shows any prejudice done in this regard.

We do not deem it necessary to determine any other question raised here, except as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings upon the matter of the dedication of the land involved, as a public street, by its owner, the defendant. The action is based on a street assessment. If there was no public street, of course there could be no valid street assessment, for no recovery can be had for any street work done upon private property. The evidence in this case is all one way, to wit, that no offer to dedicate the land as a public street was ever made or intended to be made by the owner; and the alleged acceptance of the street by the city of San Buenaventura, by merely putting it on a map, was of no value, because no offer had been made which could have been accepted. The lease and deeds introduced, executed by the defendant, and the evidence of the defendant, in our judgment show that no offer to dedicate, or anything looking that way, was ever made or intended to be made. The private map introduced, which was never filed, was no evidence to show any offer to dedicate to the public. People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. Rep. 474. In truth the evidence is utterly void of anything which shows either a dedication, or an offer to dedicate, and no acquiescence in any user of the public by the owner appears. The evidence, particularly that of the defendant, which was brought out by the plaintiffs, he being their witness, and which is not contradicted, plainly shows that the land in dispute was private property, and he had never dedicated or offered to dedicate it to the public use as a street; that he had it fenced at both ends, until the fences were torn down by the order of the city authorities; that there was never any user by the public in the slightest degree authorized by the defendant; that the attempted opening of the so-called "Laurel Street" by the city authorities, and its improvement by the contractors, was protested against by the defendant, who in every way seems to have endeavored not to offer to dedicate, and not to allow a user by the public. The fact that a public map had the land in dispute laid down as a street was not of itself evidence of dedication or user, and there is nothing else in the record which, in our judgment, even tends to show any offer of dedication. Under the rule laid down in People v. Reed, supra, the findings assailed are totally unsupported by the evidence, and the judgment and order should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. WALLACE. (No. 20,884.)

COMMITMENT—ORDER OF MAGISTRATE—VARIANCE BETWEEN COMPLAINT AND INFORMATION—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 872, providing that, when a person is committed for trial for an offense, "the magistrate must make or indorse on the deposition an order" to that effect, signed by him, it is sufficient if such order be entered on the magistrate's docket, in which, by section 1428, all proceedings must be entered.

2. Where the complaint filed before the magistrate charges defendant with the larceny of three steers, the property of W. and J., while the information in the superior court charges him with the larceny of two steers, the property of W., defendant's motion to set aside the information should for that reason have been granted.

3. A document referred to in a bill of exceptions, and set out in another part of the record, may be deemed part of such bill, when sufficiently identified as the one so referred to.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

One Wallace was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

Graves & Graves and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. W. H. Layson, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from a judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Upon his arraignment the defendant moved to set aside the information, upon the ground that he was not legally committed before its filing. The motion was denied, and the exception to this ruling is made a part of the record by a bill of exceptions, from which it appears that defendant was in fact examined before a justice of the peace upon a charge of grand larceny, and, as a result of such examination, an order was made by the justice holding him to answer said charge before the superior court. This order was entered in the docket of the justice, but was not indorsed upon the complaint, nor was there any written commitment of any kind on file in the superior court, and it did not appear that the testimony of any of the witnesses upon the preliminary examination was reduced to writing. Section 872 of the Penal Code provides that, when a defendant is held to answer, "the magistrate must make or indorse on the deposition an order signed by him" to that effect, and it is claimed by appellant that this section prescribes the only evidence of the fact of the making of such order, and that the order is not made, in contemplation of law, until it is indorsed upon the complaint or upon the depositions referred to in that section. We cannot agree with appellant in this contention. It is doubtless true that the order holding to an answer must be in writing, (Ex parte Branigan, 19 Cal. 133; People v. Wilson (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 1061;) but when, as a result of an examination, such an order has in fact been made and entered upon the docket of the justice, it would seem that no further action upon his part is necessary in order to authorize the district attorney to file an information against a defendant for the offense named in the order, (People v. Wilson, supra.) The law requires the justice to keep a docket in which must be entered each action, and all proceedings therein, (Pen. Code, § 1428;) and we are of opinion that an order holding a defendant to answer is in fact and in law made when it is entered upon the docket of the justice, and the failure to indorse such order upon the complaint or the depositions taken, in no manner deprives the order of its validity, or affects any substantial right of a defendant. The case of People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 598, 24 Pac. Rep. 384, is not in conflict with what is here decided. It was there held that the court properly set aside an information because the indorsement upon the depositions returned was not in accordance with the statute; and that, having done so, there was no error in directing that such depositions be returned to the justice for proper indorsement, and that such indorsement could be made without a re-examination of the case. This case was rightly decided, but the general reasoning found in the opinion must be construed with reference to the particular point before the court.

2. The defendant further claims that he was not legally committed for the offense charged in the information, because it is not the same as charged in the complaint upon which he was examined and held to answer, and we think his motion to set aside the information should have been granted for this reason. It is shown by the record that in the complaint filed before the magistrate the defendant was charged with the larceny of "three certain steers, the personal property then and there of one Joseph Wright and E. G. Jones," while in the information he is charged with stealing "the personal property of one Joseph Wright, to wit, two certain steers." It is manifest that there is such a variance between the offense described in the complaint and that charged in the information that the one cannot be deemed the same as the other. The only attempt made in either the complaint or information to describe the stolen property, and thus to identify the offense, was by an averment as to the ownership of the property; and, this averment not being the same in both, the information describes a different offense from that contained in the complaint, and proof which would sustain one would not support the other. 2 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 723. There can be no doubt that in an indictment or information for larceny, where the stolen property is not otherwise described so as to identify the offense, the allegation of ownership is a material part of the description of the offense charged. People v. Hughes, 41 Cal. 234. There were no depositions returned to the superior court, and the district attorney, in the information filed, should have confined himself to charging the offense named in the complaint, and for which the defendant was held to answer. That officer was certainly not authorized to go outside of the complaint, and the order holding the defendant to answer, and, upon what he may have learned from other sources, charge a different larceny in the information. People v. Parker, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 537.

It is claimed by the attorney general that this objection to the information was not made upon the hearing of the motion to set it aside, but only after verdict upon a motion to arrest the judgment. We do not so understand the record. It is true that, in the bill of exceptions settled by the court upon its ruling on the motion to set aside the information, the complaint upon which defendant was examined and held to answer is not set out in substance or in terms, but it does appear therefrom that such complaint was introduced in evidence upon the hearing of the motion, and, as it is set out in another part of the record before us, we can look at it for the purpose of ascertaining its contents. A bill of exceptions is to be read in connection with the record of which it forms a part, and a document set out in another part of the record, which is sufficiently identified as the one referred to in such bill of exceptions, may be deemed a part of it, and considered in passing upon the merits of an exception reserved by such bill. As the record shows that the complaint upon which defendant was examined and held to answer was introduced upon the hearing of the motion to set aside the information, and the point here discussed was involved in the motion made, we are bound to presume that the court considered the same in passing upon that motion, and in effect decided that the variance between the complaint and information above noticed was not sufficient to justify it in granting the motion to set aside. It is not necessary that the bill of exceptions should show that this particular objection was urged in the argument of that motion before the superior court, but it is sufficient that it arises upon the motion as made and the evidence given upon the hearing. Judgment and order reversed.

BROWN v. PREWETT, Judge. (No. 14,772.)

MANDAMUS—REFUSAL TO SIGN BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT—DISCRETION.

1. A judge who refuses to settle a bill of exceptions because not presented in proper time, and because the delay was inexcusable, cannot be compelled to do so by mandamus, unless the refusal involve an abuse of discretion.

2. An attorney on whom a bill of exceptions was served inadvertently accepted service without reserving any objection as to time. Within an hour, however, and while the paper was still in the possession of the petitioner, he took it, and, without the consent of the petitioner, qualified his acceptance by reserving such an objection. An attorney, who was present and who was assisting him in the case, then stated that they would not insist upon the objection. Held not to constitute a waiver of the objection, even if such a waiver would have been binding upon the court.

3. Where a party, instead of presenting a bill of exceptions within the 10 days limited by section 1171 of the Penal Code, allowed 60 days to elapse, during which he had 13 days clear of sickness and other imperative engagements, and then, instead of presenting the bill at once upon the completion of 2 days' notice to the other party, left it for 12 days in the hands of such party, after which he gave 7 days' notice of an application for settlement, and even then, on the day noticed, was wholly unprepared to excuse his delay, but was obliged to take 10 days longer for that purpose, the refusal of the court to settle it was not an abuse of discretion.

In bank. Petition by Esther Brown for mandamus to J. E. Prewett, judge of the superior court. Dismissed.

John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, A. K. Robinson, Dist. Atty., and F. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an original proceeding by mandamus to compel the respondent to settle a bill of exceptions in a criminal case. The cause has been submitted upon a general demurrer to the petition. The facts alleged in the petition and admitted by the demurrer are that on the 19th of January, 1891, the petitioner was accused by information of the crime of grand larceny, and was thereupon tried and convicted. After some delays, granted for the purpose of enabling the official reporter to transcribe his shorthand notes of the testimony, a motion for a new trial was submitted and overruled, and sentence pronounced on May 16, 1891. The petitioner at once appealed from the judgment and order, obtained the certificate of respondent that there was probable cause for the appeal, and an order admitting her to bail, and fixing the amount thereof pending the appeal. Up to this point the petitioner had been represented in all stages of the prosecution by one of two members of a firm of attorneys. Both were nominally her counsel, but actually the case had been conducted by one of them exclusively, and the other was entirely unfamiliar with it. The evidence was voluminous, covering some 800 typewritten pages. From the date of the judgment—May 16th—to June 3d, a period of 18 days, the attorney who had represented petitioner as her counsel was sick, and, although able on two or three occasions to appear in court, was too infirm to undergo the labor of reducing the reporter's notes of the trial to the form of a bill of exceptions, and his partner, also nominally of counsel, made no effort to do so, apparently because he was not familiar with the case. On June 3d another attorney was substituted as counsel for petitioner. He, on July 15th, prepared and served a draft of a bill of exceptions on the district attorney, who, inadvertently, as he claims, accepted service without reserving any objection that it had not been made in time. Within an hour afterwards, however, and while the paper was still in the possession of counsel for petitioner, he took it, and, without the consent of said counsel, qualified his acceptance of service by adding the words: "Without waiving objection that time has expired." An attorney, acting as special counsel for the people, and aiding the district attorney in the prosecution, was present at this interview, and then and there stated to counsel for petitioner that he would not insist upon the point that the bill had not been filed or presented in time. On July 27th, the district attorney having proposed no amendments, counsel for petitioner gave him notice that on August 3d he would present the bill to respondent for settlement, which he accordingly did, but the respondent refused to settle it, on the ground that the delay in presenting it was without excuse. Thereupon counsel for petitioner asked and obtained leave to file affidavits excusing the delay. On August 13th he filed his affidavits, and thereafter the district attorney filed counter affidavits on the part of the people, all of which are set out in the petition. By these affidavits the facts above stated were shown, and it was also shown that the substituted counsel for petitioner, during the 42 days that elapsed between his appointment and the service of his proposed bill of exceptions, had been sick for 6 or 7 days; that he had been kept at the bedside of his wife for 12 other days by her serious illness; and had been busily engaged upon other cases in court for 10 other days, leaving him only 13 clear days, including Sundays, to devote to the examination of the voluminous proceedings in a case with which he was entirely unfamiliar, and the preparation therefrom of a condensed statement of his exceptions, and the evidence pertinent thereto. The bill so proposed, or a copy of it, is filed as an exhibit with the petition, and covers 35 typewritten pages. There was never any application to the respondent, or agreement on the part of the people, to extend the statutory time for presenting the bill of exceptions.

The respondent having decided upon this showing that the delay in presenting the bill was not excused, and having, therefore, refused to settle and certify it, the question is whether he can now be compelled by mandamus to do so. The practice in preparing and presenting bills of exceptions in criminal cases is regulated by section 1171 of the Penal Code, as follows: "When a party desires to have the exceptions taken at the trial settled in a bill of exceptions, the draft of a bill must be prepared by him, and presented, upon notice of at least two days to the district attorney, to the judge for settlement within 10 days after judgment has been rendered against him, unless further time is granted by the judge, or by a justice of the supreme court, or within that period the draft must be delivered to the clerk of the court for the judge. When received by the clerk, he must deliver it to the judge, or transmit it to him at the earliest period practicable. When settled, the bill must be signed by the judge, and filed with the clerk of the court." When the course here indicated is pursued, a plain statutory duty is cast upon the judge to settle the bill, and the party appealing has an absolute right to demand its settlement, which can be enforced by mandamus. But when, as in this case, the statute is wholly disregarded by the party seeking to avail himself of its privileges, his right to demand a settlement of the bill becomes conditional, and dependent upon his ability to prove that his negligence is excusable. Whether it is or not is a question to be determined by the judge acting judicially upon the evidence submitted pro and con, and his decision cannot be controlled by mandamus, unless his refusal to act involves an abuse of discretion. It is conceded that the rule of the statute is directory merely; that the judge of the superior court has the power to settle a bill of exceptions in a criminal case presented after the 10 days prescribed by the statute, and after such additional time as may have been granted by him or by a justice of this court, and even in a case like this, where it is presented long after the lapse of the statutory time, and no effort has been made to procure an extension. It is also conceded that he not only has the power to settle a bill so presented, but that it is his duty to settle it, if the failure to comply with the statute is shown to have been unavoidable or excusable. But, on the other hand, the rule, though directory, was intended to be enforced in proper cases, and it is the duty of the courts to uphold it. It was meant to avoid unnecessary delays, and to enable the judges to settle bills of exceptions while the facts are fresh in their memory. It is, moreover, wholly inconsistent with the notion that a defendant in a criminal action, after appealing and giving bail pending the appeal, can take his own time in bringing the appeal to a hearing. Obviously there must, in such cases, be some limit of time within which the defendant should present his bill of exceptions. The statute has prescribed such a limit, which may for good cause be extended by the judge of the superior court, or by a justice of this court. If not presented within such time, the bill may still be settled if the court, in the exercise of its discretion, finds that the delay is excused. But if the delay is not excused, the court not only may, but ought to, deny the application. Therefore, we repeat, the respondent cannot be compelled by mandamus to settle the bill of exceptions in this case unless his decision that the delay in presenting it was without sufficient excuse is so clearly wrong as to amount to an abuse of discretion. Sprague v. Fawcett, 53 Cal. 408.

We do not think the case discloses any abuse of discretion. The circumstances connected with the service of the bill on the district attorney, and the remarks of the special counsel for the people, did not constitute a waiver of the delay, even if they had the power to bind the court by such waiver, which we very seriously doubt. Before the petitioner or her counsel had taken or omitted any step in consequence of his first and unqualified acceptance of service, the district attorney had qualified such acceptance with a distinct statement that he did not waive the objection that the bill was not in time; and this, we think, was a sufficient warning, aside from the statute, that the petitioner must be prepared to excuse her delay when the bill was presented. The fact that the petitioner was herself blameless was one which certainly should have had great weight with the judge in determining his action, but it was not conclusive. For failure or neglect in matters of procedure in criminal cases the blame scarcely ever attaches to the defendant, who necessarily depends upon his counsel in the management of his case, but the consequences of such failure must in most instances be borne by the defendant himself.

As to the question whether there was in fact an unnecessary and unreasonable delay in presenting the bill for settlement, we do not think the decision of respondent is without substantial evidence to support it. Even conceding that out of the 60 days elapsing between the judgment and the service of the draft on the district attorney counsel for petitioner had but 13 days clear of sickness and other imperative engagements, respondent may well be justified in holding that 13 days was far more than requisite for the preparation of the bill. But this was not all. Instead of following the practice prescribed in the Code, and presenting the bill to the judge at once upon its completion on 2 days' notice to the district attorney, counsel for petitioner left it in the hands of the district attorney for 12 days, and then gave 7 days' notice of their application for settlement. And even on the day noticed they were wholly unprepared to excuse their delay, but had to take 10 days longer to prepare and serve affidavits for that purpose. The result of all this was that instead of the 10 days allowed by law petitioner took nearly 90 days to submit her application, and this without ever having obtained or asked an extension of time. If, under such circumstances, we should hold that the superior judge abused his discretion in deciding that there had been unreasonable delay in presenting the bill, we do not see where we could draw the line, or what rule could be left for the guidance of the superior courts. The result would be to substitute for their discretion our discretion. The statute would no longer serve as a guide. Neglect of its provisions would become common, and the time of the superior judges and of this court would be consumed in the trial of questions which ought rarely to arise. The writ of mandamus is denied, and petition dismissed.

PEOPLE v. McNAMARA. (No. 20,877.)

ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS INTIMATING BIAS—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE—RE-EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

1. Leave to re-examine a witness as to matters upon which he has already been examined having been left by Code Civil Proc. § 2050, to the sound discretion of the court, cannot be assigned as error, although the examination is an unnecessary repetition, and tends only to emphasize a particular subject.

2. An instruction asked by defendant in a criminal case, but which is argumentative in form, and so emphatic that, if given, it would have indicated a strong bias, is properly refused.

3. An instruction that a person accused of crime is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, and that this presumption goes with him all through the case "until it is submitted" to the jury, is erroneous in intimating that the presumption ceases at that time, whereas in fact it continues until a verdict is reached.

4. Evidence that a person who had been robbed described the robber to a police officer, and that the latter arrested the defendant on the description and on information received from the defendant's brother-in-law, is inadmissible on an indictment for robbery. People v. Johnson, 27 Pac. Rep. 663, 91 Cal. 265, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Indictment of McNamara for robbery. There was a conviction, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Dunne & McPike, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and W. S. Barnes, for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was convicted of robbery, and sentenced to serve a term of 15 years in the state prison. It is urged with much earnestness that the judgment should be reversed, because the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. We find, however, from an inspection of the testimony that this contention cannot be sustained without a judicial invasion of the province of the jury, and a violation of the well-established rule applicable to cases in which there is a substantial conflict of evidence. Runyon, the prosecuting witness, testified that on the night of December 31, 1890, he met McNamara and another man, and stopped and conversed with them; that they walked along together about a block, when a man came out from an alley, and, approaching him from behind, grabbed him around the throat, pulled him back, and strangled him; that while he was being thus held the other persons—McNamara and his companion—went through his pockets, and took his valuables,—a diamond pin, a watch, and $27 in gold and silver. During the redirect examination of the prosecuting witness he gave testimony of the same character, and upon the same topic, as in his direct and cross examinations. The objection of the defendant ought to have been sustained, because the testimony was an unnecessary repetition, and the re-examination indicated a disposition on the part of the prosecution to emphasize the testimony of the witness upon a particular subject. Error, however, cannot be predicated upon the ruling. The matter is left to the discretion of the court. Code Crim. Proc. § 2050.[1]

The statements made by the witness Rogers on his cross-examination, as to

This section declares that a witness once examined cannot be re-examined as to the same matter without leave of court, and that such leave is to be granted or withheld, in the exercise of sound discretion.

the reason why he had the defendant arrested, were directly responsive to the questions asked by defendant's counsel. The court did not err, therefore, in refusing to strike them out. All of the answers to the objectionable questions put to the defendant were stricken out, and the court in its instructions to the jury directed them not to consider such questions or answers in arriving at a verdict. The question put to the defendant on cross-examination, calling upon him to state the purpose for which he went to the saloon, was proper cross-examination.

The court did not err in refusing to give the first four instructions asked by the defendant. They were given in substance in the charge of the court. The other instructions asked by the defendant were properly refused, because argumentative in form, and couched in language so emphatic that, if given by the court, would have indicated a strong bias on the part of the court in favor of the defendant. An instruction should contain a principle of law applicable to the case, expressed in plain language, indicating no opinion of the court as to any fact in issue. It appears to be a common practice to select certain material facts, or those which are deemed to be material, and endeavor to force the court to indicate an opinion favorable to the defendant as to the effect of such facts by incorporating them into instructions containing a correct principle of law. The vice referred to is well illustrated in the following instruction asked by the defendant in this case: "In this case you are confronted with conflicting evidence as to the identity of the person by whom the offense charged is alleged to have been committed, and in determining whether or not the complaining witness was or was not mistaken as to the identity of the person who assaulted him you have the right, and it is your duty, to take into consideration, and weigh carefully, the condition and situation of the complaining witness himself. You have a right to consider that he is the only person who swears to the identity of the defendant; you have the right to consider that he was a stranger in San Francisco, coming from his country home to this large city; you have the right to consider his condition of sobriety or insobriety. * * * I charge you that it is your duty, in passing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of this defendant, to take into consideration his conduct after his arrest. You should consider whether, after the sale of this pin to Jordan was completed, this defendant is shown to have fled the city, or to have indulged in any other conduct suggestive of a consciousness of guilt. * * * You should consider the circumstance that the defendant expressed his willingness and his readiness to do all in his power to assist the complaining witness to recover his property and capture the thieves; and, finally, you should consider the extent to which the case for the defendant has been contradicted, whether it has been contradicted at all, whether it has been contradicted as to the defendant's alibi, or as to his possession of the pin, or as to his conduct after the arrest; and should you, upon the whole case, or indeed upon any material part of it, feel any reasonable doubt as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, or should you fail to be satisfied to an absolute moral certainty of the guilt of this defendant, it would be your duty to find a verdict of not guilty, and acquit him."

The instructions given by the court of its own motion, while not as full as they might have been, are correct, except the first, which concludes as follows: "This defendant, like all persons accused of crime, is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt, and this presumption of innocence goes with him all through the case until it is submitted to you." The presumption of innocence does not cease upon the submission of the cause to the jury, but operates in favor of the defendant, not only during the taking of the testimony, but during the deliberations of the jury, until they have arrived at a verdict. The prosecuting witness was permitted to testify that he gave a description of the robbers when he reported the matter to the police officers, and one of the policemen testified that he arrested the defendant on information he received from the defendant's brother-in-law, and also on the description given by Runyon. The admission of this evidence was error. In People v. Johnson, 91 Cal. 265, 27 Pac. Rep. 663, we held that the court erred in admitting testimony of the witness Briggs as to the description of the defendant given him by the prosecuting witness before the arrest; and in Com. v. Fagan, 108 Mass. 471,—a case similar to this,—the court held that evidence that the person robbed described the robber to the officer, and that the latter by means of such description recognized the defendant as the assailant, was inadmissible. The ruling of the court allowing the witness Rogers to state the conversations he had with the chief of police of San Jose was also erroneous. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

NEALE et al. v. DEPOT RY. CO. (No. 14,496.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION—COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 1, provides that a party intending to move for a new trial must, within 10 days after verdict, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, serve a notice of his intention, designating the grounds on which the motion will be made, and whether it will be made on the minutes of the court or otherwise. Subdivision 4 provides that when the motion is to be made on the minutes of the court, and the ground thereof is the insufficiency of the evidence, or errors of law, the motion must be denied, unless the notice specifies the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient or the rulings of the court were erroneous. Held, that the notice of motion required by subdivision 1 must specify the particulars referred to in subdivision 4, and a notice that the motion will be brought on for hearing at a certain time, served after the 10 days have elapsed, and giving the particulars as to the insufficiency of the evidence and the errors of law, will not supply the omission in the notice of motion.

2. The right to recover damages for personal injury is a chose in action, and, if acquired by the wife during marriage, it comes within Civil Code, § 164, whereby "all other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife or both is community property." McFadden v. Railway Co., 25 Pac. Rep. 681, 87 Cal. 467, followed.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Annie Neale and William A. Neale against the Depot Railway Company (a corporation) to recover damages for personal injuries to wife. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Haynes, for appellant. Willis & Appel, C. C. Stephens, and J. A. Donnell, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries to the wife, through the negligence of the defendant. The verdict and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs for damages in the sum of $250. In due time defendant served notice of intention to move for a new trial on the grounds (1) of accident and surprise, etc.; (2) of newly-discovered evidence, etc.; (3) of insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that it is against law; and (4) error in law occurring at the trial, etc.; and that the motion would be made upon the minutes of the court, and upon affidavits of newly-discovered evidence; but this notice did not state any particular in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient, nor any particular error in law. Thirty-five days after the rendition of the verdict of the jury, to wit, on December 20, 1890, the defendant's attorney notified the attorneys for plaintiffs in writing that he would "bring on for hearing his motion for a new trial, * * * a copy of which is hereto attached and herewith served," on the 26th day of December, 1890. Attached to this notice was a formal motion for new trial, together with specifications of particulars in which the evidence was insufficient, and in which the verdict was against law, and concluding as follows: "This motion is made pursuant to a notice heretofore duly given, of the defendant's intention to move for a new trial upon the minutes of the court in said cause." No affidavits were filed in support of the motion. The court denied the motion on the express ground "that defendant's notice of intention to move for a new trial, filed and served on November 24, 1890, does not specify any particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, nor any error of law on which defendant proposed to rely, there being no statement of the case proposed, nor any affidavits." The appeal is from this order and the judgment upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions showing the facts above stated.

I think the order is clearly right, as it appears to be in strict obedience to the fourth subdivision of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows: "When the motion is to be made upon the minutes of the court, and the ground of the motion is the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the notice of motion must specify the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient; and, if the ground of the motion be errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the moving party, the notice must specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely. If the notice do not contain the specifications here indicated, when the motion is made on the minutes of the court the motion must be denied." Where a motion for new trial is made upon the minutes of the court, a failure to make the required specifications in the notice of intention to move for new trial is subject to the same consequences as a failure to make like specifications in a statement on motion for new trial when the motion is made upon such statement, viz., that "the motion must be denied." Weyl v. Railroad Co., 69 Cal. 203, 10 Pac. Rep. 510. In the latter class of cases this penalty has been enforced by this court in cases too numerous to require citation. The Code mandate is the same in both classes. Counsel for appellant, however, claims a distinction, on the ground that the words "notice of motion," in the fourth subdivision of section 659, do not mean "notice of intention to move for a new trial," in the sense of the first paragraph of that section;[1] and claims that the specifications annexed to his notice that he would "bring on for hearing his motion for a new trial," given long after the expiration of the time for giving notice of his intention to make the motion, constituted a sufficient compliance with the fourth subdivision of the section above quoted. This construction needs no other refutation than the reading of the whole section.

The objection that the judgment was improperly given in favor of the husband and wife jointly is answered by the case of McFadden v. Railway Co., 87 Cal. 467, 25 Pac. Rep. 681, where it is said: "The right to recover damages for a personal injury, as well as the money recovered as damages, is property, and may be regarded as a chose in action, (Railroad Co. v. Dunn, 52 Ill. 260; And. Law Dict.;) and if this right to damages is acquired by the wife during marriage, it, like the damages when recovered in money, is, in this state, community property of the husband and wife, (Civil Code, §§ 162–164,[2] 169,) of which the husband has the management, control, and absolute power of disposition other than testamentary." I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 1: "The party intending to move for a new trial must, within ten days after the verdict of the jury, if the action were tried by a jury, or after notice of the decision of the court or referee, if the action were tried without a jury, file with the clerk and serve upon the adverse party a notice of his intention, designating the grounds upon which the motion will be made, and whether the same will be made upon affidavits or the minutes of the court or a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case."

Pennie v. Roach. (No. 14,838.)

Appeal—Review—Question not Raised Below—Superior Court—Jurisdiction.

1. The want of proofs to sustain a finding will not be considered on appeal where the question was not raised below.

2. Since the superior court has jurisdiction, both in equity and in probate, having jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, it may administer relief in equity, and also in accordance with the law relating to matters in probate.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action for an accounting by James C. Pennie, administrator, against John Roach, executor. From the judgment entered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for appellant. Smith, Wright & Pomeroy and John A. Wright, (Wm. F. Herrin and H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for respondent.

Foote, C. This is an action by Pennie, the administrator of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, for an accounting, against John Roach, as the executor of the last will and testament of Philip A. Roach, deceased, who had preceded Pennie as the administrator of Blythe's estate. Judgment was given and made in the premises, from which the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The first contention of the plaintiff is that the judgment is void, because it is in favor of Mr. John A. Wright, an attorney at law, not a party to the action. Conceding, without deciding, that under the decision in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 39, 16 Pac. Rep. 345, so much of the judgment as orders the payment to John A. Wright, Esq., of a certain sum of money is void, yet that part of the judgment may be disregarded, and still the judgment can stand and be enforced, so far as it directs the payment to the defendant Roach, executor, of that sum of money for the use and benefit of said Wright. It is certainly competent for this court, if it were necessary, to modify the judgment, by striking out the words "or to the said Wright in person." But we do not perceive how the plaintiff can be injured by the judgment remaining as it is. All that he can ask is such a judgment as will be a proper voucher to him in his settlement of his decedent's estate. He can pay the executor, defendant, and refuse to pay Wright in person if he desires, as the judgment now stands, and there is no compulsion to pay Wright anything. If it is error, therefore, it is harmless.

So far as the evidence of the value of Wright's services is concerned, the preponderance is in favor of the correctness of the decision made by the trial court. The defendant introduced the testimony of six prominent members of the bar of San Francisco, who stated that the services of Mr. Wright were reasonably worth $150,000. Another prominent attorney estimated his services to be worth $136,600. It is true, three witnesses for the plaintiff, equally eminent in the profession, testified that his services were worth only $75,000, but it was for the court to decide the conflict, and in such cases its ruling will not be interfered with by the appellate court, unless there is a clear abuse of discretion. Stuart v. Boulware, 133 U. S. 78, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242. It appears that the affairs of the estate, which was valued at nearly $3,000,000, were in great disorder, and a successful administration thereof depended upon diligent, intelligent, and systematic labor. Claims amounting to nearly half a million dollars were presented against the estate, but through successful litigation and arbitration, conducted chiefly by Mr. Wright, such claims were reduced over a quarter of a million of dollars. His labors covered nearly six years of time, ten months of which were spent in Mexico and Europe.

The point is made that there is no allegation in the answer that the claim of Wright was ever presented for allowance to the executor of Philip A. Roach, or proof made of its presentation. The point as to the want of proof is made here now for the first time, and cannot be considered. Drake v. Foster, 52 Cal. 227. It is said by the appellant that the answer does not allege that Mr. Wright had any valid claim against the estate of Philip A. Roach, and hence the executor of Roach could claim nothing from the estate represented by the plaintiff, Pennie. In this behalf it is urged that the pleading in question does not aver, as it should, that the claim of Mr. Wright for legal services had been presented to the executor of Roach within the time required by law for such presentation for allowance. As the answer avers the liability of Roach to Wright for the services he performed at Roach's request, it sufficiently states a cause of action.

It is urged also for a reversal of the judgment that the court below had no jurisdiction, as a court sitting in equity, to determine the amount of Mr. Wright's fee, or to withhold for further consideration and determination the amount of commissions due P. A. Roach for administering upon the Blythe estate. But under the present state constitution the superior court has jurisdiction both in equity and matters of probate. It is the same superior court for all purposes where it has jurisdiction. If it has jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, and it is admitted that as to matters of accounting between the estate of a deceased administrator and his successor it can assume such jurisdiction, then it can administer full and entire relief according to the principles of equity, and also in accordance with the statutes which exist with reference to matters of probate, or any others within the court's jurisdiction. This, we think, disposes of the objection made on this head, and what we have said is in accordance with the views of this court in Estate of Burton, (No. 14,450,) 29 Pac. Rep. 36.

As to the point made that the claim of Wright must have been first paid by Philip A. Roach, deceased, in his lifetime, before it could be allowed, it is disposed of against the contention of appellant in Estate of Couts, 87 Cal. 480, 25 Pac. Rep. 685. We perceive no error in the record, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HARRISON, J., deeming himself disqualified, did not participate in the decision of the above cause.

JACKSON v. JACKSON. (No. 14,582.)

MARRIAGE — VALIDITY — FORMER WIFE LIVING — CONVEYANCE BY HUSBAND TO WIFE—FRAUD OF WIFE—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

1. A wife, who was married to and lived with her husband in Australia, afterwards left him, and went to live with her parents, who also resided in Australia. The husband then removed to California, where he married again, eight years afterwards. Held, that the first wife was "absent" from her husband, within Civil Code, § 61, which provides that a second marriage during the life of a former spouse is valid until legally annulled, where the former spouse was absent, "and not known to such person to be living, for the space of five successive years immediately preceding such subsequent marriage."

2. By Civil Code, § 158, transactions between husband and wife are declared to be confidential, as defined by the title on "Trusts;" and, by section 2235, all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary, by which the trustee obtains advantage, are, as regards the beneficiary, presumed to be without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence. Held, that a wife who, by solicitation, induced her husband to convey to her his property, so that, in the event of annulment of marriage, she might hold it in her own right, violates section 2231, which declares that "a trustee may not use the influence which his position gives him to obtain advantage from his beneficiary," and is thereby guilty of fraud, under section 2234, declaring such violation to be a fraud.

3. To allow amendments after the trial has commenced is in the discretion of the trial court, and error cannot be predicated on the allowance of such an amendment, whereby issues were raised which were not raised by the original pleadings, unless the adverse party asked to have the case reopened for the purpose of trying the new issue.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Dolores C. Jackson against John Eugene Jackson for annulment of marriage upon ground of his then having another lawful wife living, and cross complaint by defendant to have annulled and vacated certain deeds fraudulently obtained from him by plaintiff. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Finlayson & Finlayson, for appellant. John D. Bicknell and D. P. Hatch, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. In July, 1873, the plaintiff and defendant intermarried at the city of Los Angeles, in this state. In May, 1890, the plaintiff commenced this action to have her marriage with defendant annulled, upon the ground that, at the time it was contracted, he had another wife living, and that such former marriage had never been dissolved by a decree of divorce or otherwise. The defendant, by his answer, admitted a prior marriage, but alleged that for five successive years immediately preceding his marriage with the plaintiff his former wife had been absent from him, and was not known by him to be living, and that he believed she was dead. Defendant also filed a cross complaint, in which he alleged that in the month of February, 1864, he was married to one Elizabeth Wharton, in Australia, and that they lived together as husband and wife for the period of one year, when they separated by mutual consent, and he, in 1865, removed thence to the state of California, where he had ever since resided; that for more than seven years prior to July, 1873, when he married the plaintiff, he had not heard from his former wife, although he made diligent inquiry and wrote to her several times to know of her whereabouts, and also wrote to several others, her relatives, friends, and acquaintances, inquiring as to her whereabouts, and, receiving no answers to any of his letters, he believed her to be dead. He further alleged that in January, 1884, in consideration of love and affection, and to secure to the plaintiff and to their children a competency, and to save the making of a will and the expense of probate in case of his death, and believing at the time that the plaintiff was his lawful wife, and would continue their marital relations in the future as she had in the past, he, at her earnest and frequent solicitation, made, executed, and delivered to her a deed of certain real property, situate in the city of Los Angeles, a copy of which deed is set out; that again, in April, 1888, for the same consideration, and reposing implicit confidence in the plaintiff as his lawful wife, and merely for the purpose of correcting the former deed, he, at plaintiff's repeated request and solicitation, executed and delivered to her another deed of the same property, a copy of which last deed is also set out; that the property described in the deeds was of the value of $125,000, and was all the property owned by defendant at the time of the execution of the first deed, except a piece of property in the county of San Diego, which was afterwards sold, and the proceeds applied towards the payment of a balance due on the property conveyed, and for improvements thereon; that at the time of the execution and delivery of the said deeds to plaintiff she had been fully informed of defendant's former marriage to Elizabeth Wharton, and that they had separated by mutual consent, and that defendant had not heard from his former wife for more than seven years prior to his marriage with the plaintiff, and believed her to be dead, and that plaintiff, with full knowledge of all these facts, solicited and requested the conveyance of the property from defendant, "with intent on her part to deceive this defendant, and did deceive this defendant, in this: that she did intend to hold and retain said property as her own, and for her separate use and benefit, and to procure as soon as she was able a nullity of her marriage with this defendant, if the fact should be that said former wife was living, and thereby to defraud this defendant out of all of said property so conveyed;" that plaintiff's conduct towards defendant prior to the execution of said conveyances was that of a dutiful, faithful, and devoted wife, and he had implicit confidence in her that she would continue such relation to him during their lives; that said conveyances were executed and delivered by defendant to plaintiff "under a mistake of the facts as they existed at that time, and had it not been for said mistake of facts, and that this defendant believed his former wife to have been dead, and the plaintiff in this action was his lawful and legal wife, and having implicit confidence and faith in her, and that she would continue their marital relations as heretofore, he would not have made, executed, or delivered said deeds of conveyance, or either of them, as hereinbefore set forth;" that defendant requested plaintiff, before the commencement of this action, to reconvey to him the property he had so conveyed to her, and that she refused to reconvey the same, or any part thereof; that defendant did not know that his former wife was living until December, 1890, when he ascertained that fact from her deposition taken in this case, although he had what purported to be a declaration or statement made by her in September, 1889, under the name of Ann Walker, and received by him in November, 1889; that, upon receiving such declaration or affidavit, he delivered it to the plaintiff, who in May following commenced this action to have their marriage annulled. It is then alleged that there were two children, one a boy 16 years of age, and the other a girl 10 years of age, the issue of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant, and that plaintiff was not a fit or suitable person to have the care and custody of said children, and that defendant was a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of them. And the prayer is that the said deeds be set aside and vacated, and that the property described therein be adjudged to be the property of defendant, and that plaintiff be required to execute a deed thereof to defendant, and also that defendant have the care, custody, control, and education of the said children. The plaintiff, by her answer to the cross complaint, denied, among others, all of its averments to the effect that defendant was induced to execute and deliver the said deeds by fraud and deceit on her part, or by mistake on his part.

When the case was called for trial the parties stipulated, as to the children, that the custody of the son should be given to the defendant, and that of the daughter to the plaintiff. It was also stipulated that each party might introduce all of his or her testimony, subject to the right of the other party, after all the testimony should be put in, to object to or move to strike out any part of it. Counsel for defendant then stated that, if they were so advised, they would, after all the evidence should be introduced, file an amended cross complaint to fit the evidence put in, and counsel for plaintiff stated: "We have no objection to your filing an amendment to the cross complaint at any time to-day, and that it may be considered as answered."

In support of her side of the case, the plaintiff testified that she was married to the defendant on the 10th day of July, 1873, at the city of Los Angeles; and she read in evidence the deposition of his former wife, in which deponent stated that she was born and had always lived in Australia; that she first met defendant at Forbes, in the colony of New South Wales, where her parents were living, and near which place he was working as a miner; that she was married to defendant at Orange, in that colony, 192 miles west of Sydney, on the 11th day of February, 1864; that she and defendant lived together and cohabited as husband and wife until December, 1865; that in January or February, 1866, she received a letter from him, dated at Sydney, in which he said he was about to go to America, and that she had never heard from him since; that a female child, the issue of her marriage with defendant, was born to her in March, 1865, and that in 1866 she, with her child, left her then place of residence, and returned to her parents' house at Forbes, and that in June, 1873, she was again married, to one James Walker, and had, as the issue of that marriage, six children. The defendant then testified as a witness in his own behalf, and in rebuttal the plaintiff and two other witnesses were called and testified. The case was submitted for decision, on the day the trial commenced, on briefs to be thereafter filed by the respective parties. Twelve days later the defendant, after due notice, asked permission, and was allowed by the court against the objections of plaintiff, to file an amended cross complaint. To this cross complaint the plaintiff, reserving her objection and exception to the order allowing the same to be filed, demurred and answered at the same time. Subsequently the court found all the facts of the case to be substantially as they are stated in the amended cross complaint, and entered its decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between the parties, and awarding to them the custody of the children in accordance with their stipulation, and adjudging that the deeds executed by the defendant to the plaintiff be vacated and set aside, and that the property described therein be allotted to them in equal shares; that is to say, that an undivided one half interest in and to all of the lands and premises described in the deeds be awarded and allotted to the plaintiff, and a like interest to the defendant, and requiring the plaintiff to execute to the defendant a deed to an undivided one half interest in the property within 10 days after the entry of the decision. From this judgment and an order refusing a new trial the plaintiff has appealed.

1. The appellant contends that her marriage with defendant was invalid and void from the beginning, and that no relations of trust and confidence, such as ordinarily arise between husband and wife, ever existed between them. This position is rested upon the rule of the common law that a marriage was void when one of the spouses had contracted a prior marriage which had never been dissolved by death, divorce, or otherwise. But this rule of the common law has been changed in certain respects in this state by the Codes. Section 61 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "A subsequent marriage contracted by any person during the life of a former husband or wife of such person, with any person other than such former husband or wife, is illegal and void from the beginning: * * * (2) Unless such former husband or wife was absent, and not known to such person to be living for the space of five successive years immediately preceding such subsequent marriage, or was generally reputed and was believed by such person to be dead at the time such subsequent marriage was contracted; in either of which cases the subsequent marriage is valid until its nullity is adjudged by a competent tribunal." The appellant, however, contends that this change in the law does not affect the case or make valid her marriage, for the reason that defendant's former wife remained at her home in Australia, and was not absent from him, within the meaning of the statute, but he, having left her and come to California, was himself the absentee. And it is said: "The 'absent' spouse is the spouse who has left his or her residence, home, or domicile." The court found that "the said Elizabeth Wharton, then the wife of the said defendant, John Eugene Jackson, left the said defendant, Jackson, and went to live with her parents in Australia," and that afterwards the defendant came to this state. This finding is supported by the testimony of the defendant, and must be accepted as stating the fact truly. This being so, we think it must be held that the former wife was, in a legal sense, as really and truly absent from defendant as she would have been if he had remained in Australia, but had continued to live separate and apart from her. But, conceding this view to be correct, it is earnestly insisted that there was no sufficient evidence to show that defendant did not know his former wife to be living for the space of five years before he married the plaintiff, or that he believed her to be dead. The defendant testified: "I never heard from my former wife prior to November, 1889. I made efforts to hear from her from the time I separated from her until the time of my marriage with my present wife. These efforts were made as follows: It might have been a year or so after I arrived at San Francisco I wrote to her, and wrote to some friends of mine, making inquiries about her. I know it was within two years of the time that I arrived in San Francisco that I met an old miner who used to work with me on these mines, and he was familiar with the circumstances, and he informed me that she was dead. After writing and talking with him I made no other effort to hear from her other than by writing. I wrote to several parties that I knew; got no answer from them at all. I got no answer from her. I believed her to be dead." The court found that all the facts testified to by the defendant in this regard were true, and the finding cannot be disturbed here, for want of evidence to justify it.

2. Appellant also contends that the findings as to the alleged fraud and mistake, under which the deeds were executed to the plaintiff, were not justified by the evidence, and that, if justified, they did not warrant the conclusions of law that the deeds should be vacated and set aside, and the property allotted to the parties in equal shares. We do not think this contention can be sustained. The testimony on the part of defendant tended to show that the deeds were executed at the earnest and repeated request and solicitation of the plaintiff, and that she intended thereby to get all the property in her own name, so that, if it should turn out that the former wife was living, she could have her marriage annulled, and yet claim and hold the property in her own right; and that defendant, honestly believing his former wife to be dead, and having full confidence in the plaintiff, as a true, dutiful, and affectionate wife, and expecting their marital relations to continue so long as both should live, yielded to her wishes and solicitations in every respect. The Civil Code contains the following provisions: "Sec. 158. Either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried; subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on 'Trusts.'" "Sec. 2235. All transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration, and under undue influence." By these sections the relations between husband and wife are declared to be confidential, and all transactions between them respecting property are made subject to the same rules that control transactions between a trustee and his cestui que trust. One of these rules is that a trustee must not use the influence which his position gives him to obtain any advantage of his beneficiary, (section 2231, Civil Code;) and, if he does, it is a fraud against the beneficiary, (section 2234, Id.,) for which equity will grant appropriate relief, (Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. Rep. 689.) In our opinion, therefore, there was evidence to justify the findings complained of, and they must be upheld.

3. It is objected that the court erred in permitting the amended cross complaint to be filed after the case had been submitted for decision, because it raised new issues as to fraud, no such issues having been tendered by the original cross complaint; and also in denying the plaintiff's motion, made after the amended cross complaint was filed, to strike out all those parts of defendant's testimony tending to show fraud, upon the ground that when the testimony was given there was no issue as to fraud, and hence it was irrelevant and immaterial. Whether a party to a suit should be permitted to amend his pleading after trial commenced or not is a matter which is ordinarily addressed to the discretion of the court, and the action of the court in granting or refusing permission is never disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears that it abused its discretion. In this case we see no abuse of discretion. The testimony was all in, and it was proper that the pleadings be amendedd so as to conform to it. But it is said that the plaintiff did not, in giving her testimony, deny defendant's charges of fraud, because they were not based on any issue in the case, and that by permitting the amendment, and refusing to strike out the portions of defendant's testimony objected to, the court prevented her having that fair and impartial trial to which she was entitled. If it be true that the plaintiff could and would have denied any of the defendant's charges, which she did not deny, provided the amended cross complaint had been on file at the time, then she might, and we think should, have asked to have the case reopened for that purpose. If she had done so, doubtless her request would have been granted. In the absence of such a request, we see no reversible error in the rulings of the court.

4. It is further objected that, in dividing the property equally between the parties, the court should have ascertained whether there was any other community property at the date of the decree, and, if so, should have divided all of it, and not that only which was described in the deeds. Conceding this to be so, still we cannot say that there was any error. It does not clearly appear that there was any other community property, and, if there was, the attention of the court should have been directly called to it.

5. It is suggested that the decree is not in proper form to effect the ends probably intended by the court, for the reason that it first vacates and sets aside the deeds, then allots an undivided one half of the property to the plaintiff and the other undivided half thereof to the defendant, and then requires the plaintiff to execute a deed to an undivided one half of the property to the defendant. It is said that the deed to be executed by the plaintiff may be claimed to be a deed to the undivided half allotted to her, thus giving the defendant the whole property, and leaving nothing to her. The decree was not happily drawn, but its obvious meaning is to divide the property equally between the parties, and to vest in each of them the title to an undivided half of it. The deed required of the plaintiff was not to convey her half, and does not affect it. What has been said above disposes of all the material points in the case. We have carefully read the very elaborate and able briefs presented by counsel on both sides, but have not deemed it necessary to follow them at length, or to cite and comment upon the numerous authorities referred to. Looking at the whole record, we find no good ground for reversal, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) In my opinion the finding of the court that the former wife of the defendant "left" him is not sustained by the evidence. The defendant alleged in his answer that they "separated by mutual consent, and this defendant, in the year 1865, removed to the state of California." Upon the trial he testified to the same effect, saying: "I left in 1865. She left and went home to her father and mother. I came on to Sydney, and after a while came to San Francisco." His testimony that she "left," not that she left him, and that he "came on to San Francisco," accords with the allegation in the answer that they separated by mutual consent. There is no other testimony in reference to this subject, except that of the former wife, which is to the effect that he left her. If they did separate by mutual consent, she was not "absent" from him, in the sense in which that term is used in subdivision 2, § 61, Civil Code. I do not, however, think that this finding of the court, or the construction given by the commissioner to the word "absent," is material to the determination of the action. It may be conceded that the parties to this action entered into the contract of marriage with each other under such circumstances that it was valid to all intents and purposes until annulled by decree of the court; but the fact that the defendant had at that date a former wife living, from whom he had not been divorced, gave to the plaintiff the right to have the marriage annulled upon the discovery of such fact. Civil Code, § 82, subd. 2.[1] Upon its dissolution there would arise the same equitable grounds for an equal division of the property that had been acquired by the parties during the existence of the relation of husband and wife as would exist upon the dissolution of any valid contract of marriage for a cause other than adultery or extreme cruelty. I therefore concur in affirming the judgment and order denying a new trial.

I concur: PATERSON, J.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES—VALIDITY—MORTGAGOR'S POSSESSION.

Civil Code, § 2955, authorizes a mortgage, among other chattels, on "printing presses and material," without any change in the possession of the property. Section 3440 provides that every transfer of or lien on personal property, other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time possession, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continuous change of possession, to be fraudulent against creditors. Held, that a mortgage to secure a just indebtedness was not void as to the printing presses and material because it also covered other articles, as to which it was void without a change of possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Petition of F. L. Fischer, an insolvent debtor, that certain of his assets be sold to pay a mortgage. From a judgment granting the petition as to a portion of the property William P. Lawlor, assignee, appeals. Affirmed.

William Rix, for appellant. Metcalf & Metcalf, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 16th day of April, 1889, F. L. Fischer executed and delivered to Hermann Meese his promissory note for $4,400, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and to secure the payment of the note he at the same time executed and delivered to Meese a chattel mortgage upon "all the printing presses and material situated at Nos. 310 and 312 Battery street, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, belonging to said mortgagor, and more particularly described as follows, to wit." Then followed a long list or schedule of the articles intended to be covered by the mortgage, including, among others, "four tables, shelving, partition, desk, office furniture, one stove, lamps, signs, glass show case, clock, and one iron safe." The mortgage was properly signed, acknowledged, certified, and recorded, and was accompanied by the affidavit required by the statute in such cases. On the 24th of July, 1889, Fischer was adjudged by the superior court of Alameda county to be an insolvent debtor, and at a meeting of his creditors held on the 26th of August following, William P. Lawlor was duly elected assignee of his estate. Thereupon Lawlor duly qualified as such assignee, and the clerk of the court assigned and conveyed to him all the estate, real and personal, of the insolvent. On the 26th of November, 1889, Meese, under section 44 of the insolvent act, filed in court a petition which was in all respects sufficient, praying that the property mentioned in his mortgage be sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of his said promissory note. To this petition Lawlor, as assignee of the estate, filed an answer, contesting the validity of the mortgage as against the creditors of the insolvent. Upon the issue thus raised the case was tried, and judgment given and entered that all the property described in the mortgage, except the "four tables," etc., above mentioned, be sold by the assignee, and that the money realized from the sale, after deducting therefrom certain costs and disbursements, be turned over to Meese, to be applied on the debt secured by his mortgage. From this judgment and an order refusing a new trial the assignee appeals; and, as stated by his counsel, the only question presented for decision is: "Is the chattel mortgage given by Fischer void as against creditors as to all the property included in it, or is it valid as to the printing presses and material, and void only as to the rest of the property?"

Section 2955 of the Civil Code provides that mortgages may be made, among other things, upon "printing presses and material," and when the subsequent sections are complied with such mortgages are valid without any change of possession of the mortgaged property; and section 3440 of the same Code provides that every transfer of or lien upon personal property other than a mortgage, when allowed by law, is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continuous change of possession, to be fraudulent, and therefore void against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors, and against any persons on whom his estate devolves in trust for the benefit of others than himself. The contention is that the schedule included a few articles which do not belong to any of the classes of property mentioned in section 2955, supra, and that the mortgage of these articles was not allowed by law, and hence was void, not only as to them, but in toto. We do not think this contention should be sustained. It is admitted that Fischer was justly indebted to Meese in the sum named in the note, and it is not pretended that the mortgage was made with any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or other person in the collection of his demands. This being so, we know of no statute or rule of law declaring the mortgage wholly void for the reason urged. As well might it be said, if one should by a single instrument transfer several articles of personal property, and the transfer should be accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of a part only of the things transferred, that the whole transaction would be fraudulent and void, as against the creditors of the transferrer, and they could claim and take from the transferee the property of which possession was taken as well as that of which it was not taken. But this, in our opinion, would be an unreasonable construction of the statute, and cannot be the law. None of the cases cited by appellant are directly in point, and they need not be specially noticed. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re ROGERS' ESTATE. (No. 14,537.)

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—NATURE OF ESTATE.

A will gave to the testator's grandson $10,000, the income to be paid to him "from the time he be fifteen years old till he be twenty-one years," when he was to be paid one half of the bequest, and the other half at the age of 25 years. If the grandson should die before arriving at the ages mentioned, then the unpaid amounts, "together with the income thereon," were to be distributed among others mentioned in the will. Held, that the bequest was not present and absolute, but was contingent on his reaching the ages mentioned, and, he having died before reaching the age of 15 years, the bequest was properly distributed among the others.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Stephen Rogers. From the decree of distribution, Ella Rogers appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, for appellant. Wright & Hazen, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. Stephen Rogers died testate on the 21st day of March, 1888, leaving, surviving him, his widow, Caroline Rogers, and his grandson, Stephen Roy Rogers. The will of decedent was admitted to probate, and the widow was appointed and duly qualified as executrix thereof. During the administration of the estate, on May 15, 1889, Stephen Roy died, being then between six and seven years of age. When the estate was ready for distribution, all the residue thereof was, on petition of the executrix, distributed to her and another legatee named in the will From this order or decree the present appeal is prosecuted by the mother of Stephen Roy, and the only question presented for decision is as to the construction to be given to the third clause of the will. That clause reads as follows: "Third. I give and bequeath to my grandson, Stephen Roy Rogers, son of S. P. Rogers and Ella Rogers, the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, to be paid to him as hereinafter directed, and only after the death of my said wife, Caroline, if she survive me. The income from the said ten thousand dollars is to be paid to said Stephen Roy Rogers personally, for his own private use, from the time he be fifteen years old till he be twenty-one years old, and then, when he be twenty-one years old, I direct that he be paid five thousand dollars, being half of the above-named bequest; and that, from the time he be twenty-one till he be twenty-five (25) years old, I direct that the income from the remaining five thousand dollars be paid him annually for his private use, and then when he, the said Stephen Roy Rogers, be twenty-five years old, I direct the remaining five thousand dollars paid to him personally, for his own and exclusive and private use. If my said grandson die before arriving at the ages herein named, then the remaining or unpaid amounts of said bequest, together with the income thereon, I direct shall be distributed as the other portion of my estate shall be or shall have been distributed, namely, to the brothers and sisters of myself and wife, Caroline, share and share alike." By the fourth clause of the will the testator gives to his wife, Caroline, if she survives him, all the residue of his estate, both real and personal, and wheresoever situated; and by the fifth clause he gives, if he survives his wife, to his said grandson, if he be then living, and to the brothers and sisters of himself and wife, all the residue of his estate, share and share alike.

It was claimed by the appellant when the order of distribution was made, and is claimed here, that by the will a valid bequest of $10,000 was made to Stephen Roy; that the bequest took effect and vested in the legatee immediately on the death of the testator; and that she, (the appellant,) as the sole heir of Stephen Roy,—his father having died in October, 1886,—was entitled to receive his distributive share of the estate, to wit, the said sum of $10,000, to be paid to her as in the will provided. And it is said by counsel that the rule is "that a bequest 'payable' or 'to be paid' to a person 'at' or 'when' he shall attain a certain age, etc., vests the estate immediately, and his interest is transmissible to his representatives." In support of this position, counsel cite, among other authorities: Reed's Appeal, 118 Pa. St. 215, 11 Atl. Rep. 787; 6 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 3208; and notes to Goebel v. Wolf, 10 Amer. St. Rep. 470, 113 N. Y. 405, 21 N. E. Rep. 388. In Reed's Appeal, it is said: "The general rule, undoubtedly, is that when a legacy is given to a person, to be paid at a future time, it vests immediately; but, where it is not given until a certain future time, it does not vest until that time, and, if the legatee dies before, it is lost." In the section cited from Lawson's work, and in the notes to Goebel v. Wolf, the law is stated as follows: "The leading inquiry, upon which the question of vesting or not vesting turns, is whether the gift is immediate, and the time of payment or of enjoyment only postponed, or is future and contingent, depending upon the beneficiary arriving of age or surviving some other person, or the like. * * * According to the prevailing doctrine, a postponement of the time of payment will not, of itself, make a legacy contingent, unless it be annexed to the substance of the gift, or, as it is sometimes said, unless it be upon an event of such a nature that it is to be presumed that the testator meant to make no gift unless that event happened. Thus where the legacy is given, payable or to be paid when the legatee attains the age of twenty-one years, the legacy vests immediately upon the death of the testator. It is a present gift, the time of payment only being postponed; but when the time is annexed, not to the payment only, but to the gift itself,—as when the legacy is given to the legatee at twenty-one, or 'if' or 'when' he attains the age of twenty-one,—the legacy does not vest until the legatee attains that age. His attaining the age specified is a condition precedent, and if the condition be not fulfilled the legacy never vests." The above are undoubtedly well-settled rules of law, and, so far as applicable, are controlling in the construction of wills. There are, however, other rules equally well settled, which cannot be overlooked. One of these is that wills are to be liberally construed, so as to effectuate the intention of the testator, (Welch v. Huse, 49 Cal. 506;) and another: "The first great rule in the exposition of wills, to which all other rules must bend, is that the intention of the testator, expressed in his will, shall prevail, provided it be consistent with the rules of law," (Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68.) In the case last cited the will under review contained the following clause: "Also, I give to my wife, Elizabeth Goodwin, all my personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature, kind, and quality soever, after payment of my debts, legacies, and funeral expenses, which personal estate I give and bequeath unto my said wife, Elizabeth Goodwin, to and for her own use and benefit and disposal, absolutely; the remainder of the said estate, after her decease, to be for the use of the said Jesse Goodwin," the testator's son. On the death of the testator, his wife took possession of the property bequeathed to her, and held it till she died; and the question was whether, under the will, she acquired a title absolute or only for life. It was held (Chief Justice MARSHALL delivering the opinion of the court) that she took only a life estate in the property, and that Jesse Goodwin had a vested remainder in the property that would come into his possession on the death of the said Elizabeth.

The question, then, is, what was the intention of the testator when he made the will, the construction of which is involved in this case? Did he intend to give to Stephen Roy the $10,000 absolutely, or only on condition that he should reach the ages named for its payment? It will be observed (1) that no part of the bequest was to be paid to the legatee until after the death of the testator's wife; (2) that the legatee was to receive nothing until he reached the age of 15 years; (3) that, between the ages of 15 and 21, he was to receive the income of the bequest, only; (4) that, on arriving at the age of 21, he was to be paid one half of the bequest, and thereafter the income from the other half till he reached the age of 25, when the balance was to be paid; (5) that, if he should die before arriving at the successive ages above named, then such portion of the bequest as had not theretofore been paid, "together with the income thereon," was to be distributed as the other portion of the estate "shall be or shall have been distributed, namely, to the brothers and sisters of myself and my wife, Caroline, share and share alike." If the last clause had been omitted, it might, no doubt, be successfully claimed that there was a present and absolute bequest, the times of payment only being deferred, and that it vested in the legatee on the death of the testator. That clause, however, makes it clear, we think, that the intention was not to make an absolute bequest, but a conditional one, to take effect only if the legatee should reach the ages named for its payment. It is argued for appellant that this construction is not in harmony with the subsequent clauses of the will, because the bequest to the wife was of the "residue" of the estate, meaning the residue or what remained after the $10,000 bequest to Stephen Roy, and that the bequest to the brothers and sisters was only to take effect in case the testator survived his wife. We see no force in this argument. If Stephen Roy had lived, the property of the estate would all have been distributed to the surviving wife, subject to a trust in his favor. He could have claimed nothing till he reached the ages when he was to be paid. As he died before he arrived at the age of 15, and before distribution, it was proper that the decree be made as it was. We advise that the order and decree appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order and decree appealed from are affirmed.

HUDEPOHL v. LIBERTY HILL CONSOLIDATED MINING & WATER CO. et al. (No. 14,318.)

EXECUTION—SALE EN MASSE—SETTING ASIDE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

1. A judgment creditor sought to set aside a sale on execution under a prior judgment, on the ground that the land, consisting of separate parcels, was sold together. The complaint showed that the land had been redeemed by a prior judgment creditor, and by him sold. Held that, as the complaint failed to allege that the purchaser had notice of the irregularity, a demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

2. The complaint is also subject to demurrer where it does not show that the proceeds of the sale were less than they would have been, had the land been sold in parcels.

3. Since an execution sale en masse of separate parcels of land is not void, but only voidable, one who seeks to set it aside must show that none of the conditions which would authorize a sale of all the parcels together existed at the time of the sale.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action by one Hudepohl against the Liberty Hill Consolidated Mining & Water Company et al. to set aside a sheriff's sale. Defendants had judgment on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gaylord & Searles and C. A. & F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. Byrne & Cross, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to set aside an execution sale on the ground that the property, consisting of several disconnected parcels of land, was sold en masse. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and we think its action was right. The plaintiff's right to maintain the action rests upon his claim to be a redemptioner by virtue of a judgment rendered in his favor against the defendant corporation in the superior court of San Francisco, of which a transcript of the docket was filed in the county recorder's office in Nevada county on March 28, 1887. The property had, however, been sold by the sheriff of Nevada county, October 9, 1886, upon a judgment against the same defendant in favor of one Todd; and the defendant Marshall, who also held a judgment lien against the same property, had redeemed the property from the sale on the 13th of October, 1886.

1. The complaint shows that Marshall, the redemptioner who redeemed the property from the purchaser, sold and conveyed all his rights, including the right to a deed from the sheriff, to defendant Anna E. Smith, before plaintiff's judgment became a lien on the property, and it is not alleged that she (Smith) had notice of any irregularity in the sale. "Innocent vendees of the original purchaser will always be protected, whether proceeded against by bill or motion." Freem. Ex'ns, (2d Ed.) § 226; Miexe v. Sibley, 53 Ill. 61; Nelson v. Bronnenburg, 81 Ind. 199. The doctrine of the Indiana case cited by appellant (Piel v. Brager, 30 Ind. 332) has been expressly repudiated in that state. Jones v. Association, 77 Ind. 344.

2. It is not alleged that the proceeds of the sale were less than they would have been if the land had been sold in separate parcels. Unless it is made apparent to the court that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale if the property had been sold in parcels, or that the sale of less than the whole tract would have brought sufficient to satisfy the writ, the sale will not be set aside. The question is not what would the property bring if sold now or in the future, but whether the proceeds would have been materially increased or the execution satisfied by a sale of less than the whole, if the land had been offered and sold in parcels.

3. It is not sufficient to allege merely that several separate tracts were sold in the lump by the sheriff. Riddell v. Harrell, 71 Cal. 262, 12 Pac. Rep. 67. Such sales are voidable, not void; and one who seeks to have a sale en masse set aside should show that none of the conditions which would authorize the sale of all the parcels together existed at the time of the sale. There was no lien on the property, except that of the judgment creditor, at the time of the sale. The sale may have been made in solido by express direction of the judgment debtor, or it may have been offered in parcels, and no bids received. The judgment debtor may by parol waive a sale of the land in parcels, and give authority to sell in mass. Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 52; San Francisco v. Pixley, 21 Cal. 59; Smith v. Meldren, 107 Pa. St. 348. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BARRY. (No. 20,865.)

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE.

1. Pen. Code, § 459, provides that every person who enters any house, room, or store with intent to commit larceny is guilty of burglary. Held, that the offense is complete when the entry is made with intent to commit larceny, even though such entry was made into a store through the public entrance, while open for business. DE HAVEN, MCFARLAND, and HARRISON, JJ., dissenting.

2. Defendant's attempted larceny while in the store did not constitute a prima facie case of burglary, so as to cast on him the burden of proving himself innocent.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Michael Barry was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Reversed.

John G. Pressley, Thos. Rutledge, and J. C. Sims, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant was convicted of the crime of burglary, and appeals to this court from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The most important assignment of error relied upon to reverse the judgment may be reviewed by a consideration of a certain instruction which was requested to be given to the jury by appellant, and which request was refused by the court. The proposed instruction was based upon the evidence, which disclosed that the offense of burglary was committed, if committed at all, by appellant entering a grocery store during business hours, and attempting to commit larceny therein. The instruction is as follows: "The defendant cannot be convicted of the crime if he had a right to enter the store of Murry & Seegelkin at the time alleged in the information, even if you believe from the evidence that, at the time he entered, he intended to commit larceny." Viewed in the light of section 459 of the Penal Code, which says, "every person who enters any house, room, store, * * * with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary," the ruling of the court is correct. This section of the Code is clear and concise, and its meaning obvious. By its express terms the offense is perfect and complete when the entry is made with the intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony. At common law, burglary was defined to be "a breaking and entering of the mansion house of another in the night, with the intent to commit some felony within the same, whether such felonious intent be executed or not." Russ. Crimes, 785. It will thus be seen that common-law burglary and the statutory burglary of this state have but few elements in common, and consequently English cases give us but little light upon the question under examination. Even under the present section of the Penal Code, many acts constitute burglary which but a few years ago were a different offense, or no offense whatever. As to the acts which shall constitute the crime of burglary, that is a matter left entirely to the policy of the legislature, within its constitutional powers; and, when that body has said that every person who enters a store with the intent to commit larceny is guilty of a burglary, the language is so plain and simple that rules of statutory construction are not required to be consulted. The meaning is patent upon the face of the statute. No words are found in the statute, qualifying the character, kind, time, or manner of the entry, save that such entry must be accompanied with a certain intent; and it would be judicial legislation for this court to interpolate other conditions into the section of the Code.

Appellant contends that a grocery store, during business hours, is a public place, and the defendant, as one of the public, had a legal right to be there, or rather to enter there; that the proprietors were doing business with the general public; the public were invited to enter; that therefore the defendant entered under an invitation of the owners; and that, consequently, his entry was lawful, and there can be no burgiary when there is a lawful entry. To this reasoning, we can only say a party who enters with the intention to commit a felony enters without an invitation. He is not one of the public invited, nor is he entitled, to enter. Such a party could be refused admission at the threshold, or ejected from the premises after the entry was accomplished. If the presence of such a party in the store is lawful the fact that he gained ingress openly and publicly, through the front door, rather than clandestinely, by way of the skylight or the cellar, is not material, and the result would be that no burglary could be committed in a store during business hours, regardless of the nature of the entry. As supporting contrary views, appellant relies upon State v. Newbegin, 25 Me. 502, and State v. Moore, 12 N. H. 42. The Maine case is not authority here; for the statute of that state, as at common law, requires that, in order to constitute burglary, there must not only be an entry, but also a breaking. The facts of the case were quite similar to those of the present case, and the court held that, while the evidence disclosed an entry with intent to commit a larceny, (exactly what is required by our statute,) there was no evidence of a breaking, and necessarily ordered a new trial. Quite a similar state of facts were present in Clarke v. Com., 25 Grat. 908, and the court held that there was no breaking, either actual or constructive, but said.: "While the legislature might make such a change, we think it would be judicial legislation in us to do so." In State v. Moore, the primary question involved was as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show a criminal intent in entering the building, and does not reach the matter as to the character of the entry. The common-law element, to wit, the use of the force by breaking, in order to constitute burglary, was originally a part of our statute; but it has long since ceased to exist, by express enactment of the lawmaking power. As the law now reads the instruction was properly refused. Any other construction of the statute would interpolate words therein, and this we have no power to do. That the entry is made in the daytime, when the store is open for business, may render it more difficult to prove the criminal intent present in the mind of the defendant when he enters; but that is a matter of evidence, and not a question of law.

The court refused to give to the jury the following instruction, asked by the defendant: "The fact that a person attempts to steal while in a building is not sufficient, without other circumstances proved, to cast on him the burden of proving himself not guilty of burglary." It is only in cases of homicide, where certain conditions exist, that the burden of proof ever shifts to the defendant, and to that extent the instruction may be somewhat misleading; but its plain intent is that the single fact of a defendant being apprehended in a building while in the act of stealing does not of itself establish a prima facie case of burglary. The instruction states a correct proposition of law, and should not have been refused, especially, in view of the peculiar facts of this case, where the entry was made during business hours, and by way of the public entrance. The instructions given upon the question of intent do not cure the error; and it may be said they are somewhat confusing in respect as to whether they refer to the intent with which the entry was made, or the intent of the defendant in manipulating the money drawer.

Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. I find no error in the record.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment, but dissent from so much of the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE as seems to hold that one who enters the store of another with intent to commit larceny therein is guilty of burglary, although the entry was open, and with the actual and free consent of the owner. I do not think that this is a correct interpretation of our statute defining the offense of burglary. I think, in order to constitute a burglarious entry, the act of entering must be itself a trespass,—an intrusion against or without the consent of the owner of the building alleged to have been entered. State v. Moore, 12 N. H. 42. The evidence was wholly insufficient to justify the verdict in this case, and the jury should have been advised to acquit the defendant.

PEOPLE v. PERINI et al. (No. 20,883.)

LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES—BURDEN OF PROOF—PUNISHMENT—CONSTITUTIONALITY.

1. Pen. Code, § 496, prescribing the punishment for receiving stolen goods at imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, or in the county jail not exceeding six months, or both, is not unconstitutional, in authorizing a double punishment.

2. An assistant foreman of a warehouse, who has no authority to sell any of the property stored therein, but only to deliver it upon proper orders, is guilty of larceny, rather than embezzlement, in attempting to sell it.

3. An instruction that, when the doing of an act is proven which, if done with guilty intent, would be a violation of law, the burden of proving the act to have been without such intent is, to the extent of creating a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, thrown in most cases upon the accused, is erroneous.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. HEBBARD, Judge.

Perini and others were convicted of receiving stolen goods, and appeal. Reversed.

Lawler & Gray, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PATERSON, J. The defendants were convicted of the crime of receiving stolen goods knowing the same to have been stolen, and were sentenced to serve a term of 60 days in the county jail. It is claimed that section 496 of the Penal Code, under which the defendants were prosecuted and convicted, is unconstitutional, because it provides for punishment "by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by both." We are unable to appreciate the force of the argument that this section authorizes a double punishment, and know of no provision of the constitution which it violates. The power to define offenses and affix penalties therefor rests entirely with the legislature. Whether a person convicted of this offense has committed a felony or a misdemeanor can be ascertained by the nature of the judgment. If the defendant is sentenced to serve a term in the state prison, the crime is a felony; otherwise, a misdemeanor. Sections 16, 17, Pen. Code. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict. The evidence introduced by the prosecution shows that Gelston stole the property and sold it to the defendants. Gelston was an assistant foreman of the warehouse where the property was stored, but had no authority to sell any of the property. His offense was therefore larceny. 2 Russ. Crimes, (8th Amer. Ed.) pp. 178-180; Steph. Dig. Crim. Law, pp. 247, 248; Reg. v. Norval, 1 Cox, Crim. Cas. 95. He had authority to deliver property stored in the warehouse upon proper orders presented to him, but the legal possession of the property remained in the owner of the warehouse. If it be assumed, however, that the acts of Gelston constituted technical embezzlement, the result must be the same; the goods were stolen. "Embezzlement is a species of larceny. * * * It is distinguished from larceny, properly so called, as being committed in respect of property which is not at the time in the actual possession of the owner." People v. Burr, 41 How. Pr. 293, 294. It is frequently termed "larceny by bailee." And. Law Dict. "Embezzlement." Statutes defining embezzlement are intended to punish certain kinds of theft which were not criminal offenses at common law. The offense in this state is punishable "in the manner prescribed for feloniously stealing property of the value of that embezzled." Pen. Code, § 514. The court gave to the jury the following instruction: "The effect of the statutory rules of evidence is that when the doing of an act which, if coupled with a guilty intent, would be a violation of the law, is proven, the burden of proving the act to have been done without intent, to the extent of creating a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt upon the whole case, is, in most cases, thrown upon the accused." This was error. People v. Ribolsi, 89 Cal. 498, 26 Pac. Rep. 1082. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Constitutional Law—Delegation of Legislative Powers—Compensation of County Officer.

Laws 1887, p. 207, providing that whenever, in the opinion of the board of supervisors, the salary of any county officer in certain classes of counties is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation, the board should allow such officer a deputy at a certain salary, to be paid for by the county, is invalid as an attempt to delegate the power to change a law exclusively confided to the legislature by Const. art. 11, § 5, which provides that it shall provide for the election or appointment of county officers, and regulate their compensation. McFarland and Paterson, JJ., dissenting. State v. Field, 17 Mo. 529, followed. 28 Pac. Rep. 834, affirmed.

In bank. On rehearing.

De Haven, J. In the former decision of this case (28 Pac. Rep. 834) the court, in its opinion, held that the order of the board of supervisors of Marin county, upon which the respondent bases his right to the relief which he asks, was, in effect, an increase of the compensation of the county clerk of Marin county, made after his election to such office, and was for this reason void, as being in conflict with section 9 of article 11 of the constitution of this state; and, secondly, that section 211 of the county government act, as amended in 1887, (St. 1887, p. 207,) under which the board of supervisors acted in making such order, was invalid, as it made the county government act, of which it formed a part, lacking in that uniformity of operation which is required by section 11 of article 1 of the constitution of this state. It being supposed that the decision thus made would affect officers in other counties who had not been heard, and that the question presented for decision was of sufficient importance to justify it, it was deemed proper by a majority of the members of the court to grant a rehearing, in order to give an opportunity for further argument. The case has been reargued, and upon a reconsideration of the questions involved we adhere to the conclusions announced in the former opinion of Mr. Justice Garoutte, and the reasoning by which those conclusions were reached.

There is, however, an additional ground which is equally fatal to the right of respondent to maintain this action, which will be briefly referred to. The constitution of the state declares: "The legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks. * * * It shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties, and for that purpose may classify the counties by population." Article 11, § 5. Under this section it is made the imperative duty of the legislature to regulate—that is, to fix or adjust—the compensation of all county officers in proportion to their duties. In the exercise of the authority thus conferred upon it by the constitution, the legislature, in the county government act of 1883, (St. 1883, p. 299,) and the act amendatory thereof, passed in 1885, (St. 1885, p. 178,) fixed the salary of the county clerk in the class of counties to which Marin belonged at $2,500 per annum, with the special provision that this sum should be in full compensation for that officer, and that all deputies employed by him and deemed necessary to properly discharge the duties of such office should be paid by him out of the salary thus fixed by the act. But in 1887 section 211 of the county government act was again amended, and by such amendment the legislature undertook to confer upon the supervisors of Marin—and certain other counties—the power to change that provision of the law which required their county officers to pay their own deputies. This amended section, so far as it is necessary to be here set out, is as follows: "That whenever, in the opinion of the board of supervisors, the salary of any county officer in the third, fourth, * * * twentieth, * * * classes, as fixed and provided in this act, is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, the said board shall allow such officer a deputy, or such number of deputies as in their judgment may be required to do the business of such office in connection with the principal, at a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars per month, to be paid, etc.: * * * provided, that an affidavit shall be filed by such officer with the said board, showing that such deputy or deputies are required by him in the proper discharge of his duties as such officer." It was under this section, as thus amended, that the board of supervisors of Marin county acted in making the order by virtue of which plaintiff claims the right to be paid his salary as deputy county clerk from the treasury of the county.

The question is thus squarely presented whether it was competent for the legislature thus to delegate to the board of supervisors of that county the power to change or suspend that part of the general law fixing the salaries of county officers, which provided that the county clerk of Marin county should himself pay the deputy or deputies employed by him. There can be, under well-settled principles of constitutional law, but one answer to this question, and that is one which denies to the legislature any right to thus delegate to any other body or tribunal what is most clearly a legislative power, the exercise of which the constitution has confided to that department of the state alone. This principle is one so universally accepted as true, that Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, states it as a maxim of constitutional law. He says: "One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws cannot be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the state has located the authority, there it must remain; and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the constitution is changed. The power to whose judgment, wisdom, and patriotism this high prerogative has been intrusted cannot relieve itself of the responsibility by choosing other agencies upon which the power shall be devolved, nor can it substitute the judgment, wisdom, and patriotism of any other body for those to which alone the people have seen fit to confide this sovereign trust." Page *117. A general statute of the state of Missouri concerning roads and highways contained a provision that, "if the county court of any county should be of opinion that the provisions of the act should not be enforced, they might, in their discretion, suspend the operation of the same for any specified length of time, and thereupon the act should become inoperative in such county for the period specified in such order," and in that event roads in such county should be opened and kept in repair under previous statutes. The supreme court of that state, in State v. Field, 17 Mo. 529, held such act unconstitutional, as an attempt to delegate to the county court of the county a power vested exclusively in the legislature. There is no difference whatever, in principle, between the statute held invalid in the case just referred to and section 211 of the county government act as amended in 1887, and under which the board of supervisors acted in making the order upon which the plaintiff relies. By this section, as thus amended, an attempt is made to delegate to the board of supervisors of Marin county the authority to change the law fixing the salary of the county clerk of that county whenever it shall appear to such board that the salary as thus fixed is insufficient to pay him a reasonable compensation for his services. The salary of this officer was fixed by the legislature, with direct reference to the fact that out of it he was to pay his own deputies, and the purpose of this amended section is to authorize the board of supervisors of that county to suspend the operation of this law, in so far as he is thereby required to pay such deputies, and to place that burden upon the county. The power thus to change a law of the state is necessarily legislative in character, and is vested exclusively in the legislature, and cannot be delegated by it to the board of supervisors of the county. It follows from this that the order of the board of supervisors of Marin county, allowing the plaintiff a salary of $50 per month as deputy county clerk of that county, and payable out of the treasury, is void, and plaintiff is not entitled to the judgment which he demands. As already stated, the constitution of this state has made it the imperative duty of the legislature to fix the salaries of county officers in proportion to their duties. Whether, if that body should wholly fail to discharge this obligation in respect to any county, the board of supervisors of such county would, by virtue of its general authority in relation to the government of such county, have power to provide for the payment of its officers, is a question not involved in this case, and upon which we express no opinion. Judgment reversed, with directions to dismiss the proceeding.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J., (concurring.) At the first presentation of this case I was impressed with the conviction that very serious consequences must flow from any conclusion the court might reach, and have therefore given it the most careful and anxious consideration. It was apparent that so important a provision of the county government act as that which is in question here could not be held unconstitutional without producing disorder and confusion in the public business of a number of the most populous counties of the state, besides injuriously affecting the pecuniary interests of the deputy county officers whose compensation it was intended to secure. It was therefore with great reluctance that I yielded to the conviction that, upon any construction of the proviso under which the respondent claims, it could not be upheld without disregarding the manifest intention of the constitution. Actuated by the same feeling, I willingly united in the order for a rehearing, hoping that a fuller discussion of the case by additional counsel representing the state and the several counties affected by the decision might lead to the discovery of some happier solution of the difficulty. I regret to say, however, that, after carefully weighing and considering every argument that has been advanced from the beginning to the end of the discussion, the conflict between the act of the legislature and the constitution still seems to me plain and irreconcilable. Unless by express words declared to be otherwise, every provision of our constitution is mandatory and prohibitory. Article 1, § 22. Among these mandatory and prohibitory provisions are found the following: Article 11, § 5: "The legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment, in the several counties, of the boards of supervisors, sheriffs, county clerks, district attorneys, and such other county, township, and municipal officers as public convenience may require, and shall prescribe their duties, and fix their terms of office. It shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties, and for this purpose may classify the counties by population; and it shall provide for the strict accountability of county and township officers for all fees which may be collected by them, and for all public and municipal moneys which may be paid to them, or officially come into their possession." Article 11, § 9: "The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office; nor shall the term of any such officer be extended beyond the period for which he is elected or appointed." It is not denied, and it cannot be, that by section 5 of this article the legislature is commanded to regulate the compensation of all county officers in proportion to duties. A comparison of sections 5 and 9 makes it equally plain that such regulation must be made to take effect before the election of the officers whose compensation it controls, and that it cannot be subsequently changed so as to increase the compensation of any officer during the term for which he has been elected. It may be conceded that to regulate the compensation of an officer does not necessarily mean to ascertain or fix the exact amount which he is to receive for discharging all the duties of his office. Indeed, it seems plain to me that the legislature might have satisfied this requirement of our organic law, without any classification of counties according to population, by the simple expedient of adopting a uniform fee bill, and allowing each county officer to retain for his compensation all the fees by him collected, not exceeding a certain amount, and a percentage computed according to a sliding scale, such as that used in determining the compensation of executors and administrators, upon all higher amounts collected. This is one example of a regulation by which a just correspondence between the duties and compensation of county officers might be maintained without trenching upon the apparent design of the last clause of section 5, requiring provision to be made for the strict accountability of county and township officers for all fees by them collected, and without the necessity of dividing the counties into classes. No doubt other, and perhaps better, examples might be suggested of regulation by other means than the fixing of a definite sum to be paid to each officer for discharging all the duties of his office, and requiring him to provide all necessary deputies.

But the legislature has not seen fit to adopt a regulation of the character suggested. On the contrary, by the first county government act, (St. 1883, p. 299,) the duties of all county and township officers were prescribed by general provisions, and every county and township officer, except supervisors and judicial officers, was authorized to appoint as many deputies as might be necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of the duties of his office. Section 61, p. 316. The act then proceeded to classify the counties of the state by population for the express purpose of regulating the compensation of the officers therein provided for. Section 162, p. 332. By the next section (section 163) the compensation of each officer in every class of counties except the first (the city and county of San Francisco alone constituted the first class, and was left subject to the provisions of its old charter) was fixed at a certain sum of money, (or sometimes certain fees,) which, by a subsequent and general provision, (section 164, p. 361,) was declared to be "in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers named in the act, their deputies and assistants." To leave no doubt of the meaning of this clause the act proceeds: "and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided." As an example of the provisions of section 163 we quote those relating to counties of the second class: "Sec. 163. In counties of the second class the county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries, to wit: (1) The county clerk, thirteen thousand dollars per annum; (2) the sheriff, fifteen thousand dollars per annum; (3) the recorder, fifteen thousand dollars per annum; (4) the auditor, two thousand dollars per annum; (5) the treasurer, four thousand five hundred dollars per annum; (6) the tax collector, eight thousand dollars per annum; (7) the assessor, fourteen thousand dollars per annum; (8) the district attorney, six thousand five hundred dollars per annum; (9) the coroner, such fees as are now or hereafter may be allowed by law; (10) the public administrator, such fees as are now or hereafter may be allowed by law; (11) the superintendent of schools, twenty-four hundred dollars per annum; (12) the surveyor, such fees as are now or hereafter may be allowed by law; (13) justices of the peace, such fees as are now or hereafter may be allowed by law; (14) constables, such fees as are now or hereafter may be allowed by law; (15) supervisors, one thousand dollars each per annum." Now, conceding again that to regulate the compensation of officers does not necessarily mean to fix the exact amounts to be paid them for discharging all the duties of their offices, including the services of deputies, it cannot be denied that this is one method of regulation by which the requirement of the constitution is satisfied, without denying that the county government act of 1883, and all subsequent acts on the same subject, were and are in this respect unconstitutional and void. But the contrary has been decided in Longan v. Solano Co., 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. Rep. 463, and no one here—least of all the respondent—is disputing the correctness of that decision. Assuming, then, what is conceded on all sides,—that the act of 1883 did regulate the compensation of county officers according to duties,—let us consider for a moment the nature of that regulation and its effect in limiting the compensation proper of the officers themselves. The sum allowed to any given officer being a lump sum, out of which he must pay for the services of all deputies and assistants necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of all the duties of the office, it is evident that his own compensation consists of the residue remaining after payment of such deputies and assistants; and it is equally evident that, just so far as the county assumes the payment of such deputies and assistants, such residue is enlarged and the compensation increased.

The cases reviewed by the supreme court of Illinois in deciding Daggett v. Ford Co., 99 Ill. 334, cover this point very completely. By the constitution of Illinois the duty of "fixing the compensation of all county officers, with the amount of their necessary clerk hire, stationery, fuel, and other expenses," is imposed upon the respective county boards, with the proviso that the compensation of no officer shall be increased or diminished during his term of office. It was shown in the opinion delivered in the case cited that this clause of the Illinois constitution had been construed in a series of decisions, by which it had been held, among other things, that the county boards might either allow a lump sum to cover the compensation of the officer and his expenses for clerk hire, etc., or that they could allow a certain amount for his proper compensation, and a separate amount for his expenses; that, if the latter method was pursued, he could retain out of the fees collected by him the amount of his fixed compensation, and also the actual amount of his expenses, and no more, provided they did not exceed the amount allowed; that, if the board, after allowing a separate amount for expenses, found that it was insufficient, they could from time to time during the term increase such allowance, though they could not increase or diminish the certain sum fixed as the compensation of the officer. In other words, the supreme court recognized this distinction between the allowance for compensation and for clerk hire, etc., when separately fixed: that the latter could, but the former could not, be increased or diminished during the officer's term. But when the board allowed a lump sum to cover compensation and expenses, so that the compensation proper consisted of the residue remaining over after payment of expenses, it was held that they could not, during the term of the officer, make any increased allowance, though convinced that their original estimate of expenses had been too low; nor could they require the officer to refund any part of the gross amount allowed upon the ground that his actual expenses had fallen below the estimate upon which the gross allowance was based; and this for the reason that any increase or decrease of the gross allowance necessarily increased or diminished the compensation of the officer. Here, then, is most respectable authority—if authority were needed—for the proposition that our legislature could not, either by direct enactment or by authorizing the boards of supervisors to so order, impose upon a county treasury the payment of the salary of any deputy of a county officer elected while the act of 1883 remained in force and unamended as to the provisions under discussion.

This being so, it remains to consider what changes have been made by amendments or additions to the original act. By the amendments of 1885 the sections of the act were renumbered, and salaries in some counties reduced, but no change was made that need be considered here. In 1887, however, the act was revised and reenacted. In the revision, section 164 of the original act became section 211, and among other changes therein were the following: Instead of the words above quoted from section 164, section 211 was made to read as follows: "Sec. 211. The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers herein named either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided, unless in this act otherwise provided. * * * And provided, further, that whenever, in the opin- ion of the board of supervisors, the salary of any county officer in the third, fourth, fifth, twelfth, thirteenth, fifteenth, twentieth, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-sixth, twenty-ninth, thirty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-sixth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, and forty first classes, as fixed and provided in this act, is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, the said board shall allow such officer a deputy, or such number of deputies as in their judgment may be required to do the business of such office, in connection with the principal, at a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars per month, to be paid at such times and in the manner that said principal is paid: provided, that an affidavit shall be filed by such officer with the said board showing that such deputy or deputies are required by him in the proper discharge of his duties as such officer." By their terms these amendments (which I have put in italics) were applicable to the county officers then in office, and who had been elected while the system of compensation established by the act of 1883 was in force, and (if so construed) were, for the reasons above given, clearly unconstitutional. But the respondent's case does not require such a construction, and he does not contend that said amendments went into operation until after the expiration of the term of the county officers in office at the date of their enactment. His principal, Bonneau, was clerk of Marin county—a county of the twentieth class—when the act of 1887 was passed, and respondent was his deputy. But Bonneau was re-elected for a new term in November, 1888, and entered thereon January 7, 1889. On January 10th he filed the affidavit prescribed by the statute, showing that he required a deputy in his office, and on the same day the board of supervisors made an order allowing him such deputy at a salary of $50 per month, to take effect from January 7th. In pursuance of this order respondent was appointed, and, having obtained a warrant for the amount of his salary for the month of January, presented it to the appellant, the county treasurer, who refused to pay it on the ground that the proviso above quoted from the act of 1887 was unconstitutional, and the order of the board of supervisors therefore void. Thereupon this proceeding by mandamus was commenced for the purpose of enforcing payment. The learned judge of the superior court, in awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus, held (if he is correctly quoted in the respondent's brief) that Bonneau, having been elected subsequent to the passage of the act of 1887, went into office with "a right to the amount of salary named in the statute, and a contingent right, dependent on the facts, to have additional clerical assistance."

This being a fair statement of the proposition for which the respondent contends, it becomes necessary to consider whether it will bear the test of a critical examination. It is to be observed, in the first place, that it assumes a construction of the proviso which is more restricted than its terms, and more restricted than its application in this case, viz., that it was intended to apply only when, from change of conditions, an officer might require additional clerical assistance, meaning, as I understand the expression, clerical assistance in addition to that which was required at the date of the passage of the act. If this is the construction placed upon the proviso by the superior court, it must be admitted that it is not very fully borne out by the terms of the statute. The act says nothing about change of conditions through increase of population, or from any other cause. No facts are enumerated upon which the action of the board is made to depend. The only condition is that the officer shall file an affidavit showing that for the proper discharge of his duties he requires the assistance of a deputy or deputies, which it is apparent might be the case in a county in which the conditions were unchanged, or where the change of conditions had resulted in lightening the duties of the office. Nor does the statute require the board of supervisors to find that the duties of the office have become more onerous since the passage of the act. All they have to do is to reach the conclusion in the exercise of their own discretion that the salary as fixed and provided in the act is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, and, if they are of that opinion, they shall allow such officer not "additional clerical assistance," but "a deputy, or such number of deputies as in their judgment may be required to do the business of such office, in connection with the principal," with salaries payable out of the county treasury. Giving to this language its literal and obvious construction, the working of the law may be fairly illustrated by applying it to counties of the second class, which, by the amendments of 1889, were brought within its operation. Referring to a clause of the statute above quoted, it will be seen that the compensation allowed to the different officers of this class of counties is fixed upon a scale which clearly indicates that it was intended to cover the salaries of a number of deputies in each of the principal offices. The clerk, for instance, has $13,000, the sheriff $15,-000, and so on. Now, let it be supposed that the legislature intended the clerk to have for his proper compensation the sum of $3,000, (which is equal to the maximum allowed by the constitution to the state treasurer, secretary of state, comptroller, and other state officers,) and that the remaining $10,000 was allowed for his necessary deputies, say six in number. This is the condition of things when the law is passed, and when the clerk is elected. On assuming the office, he can truthfully swear, although the conditions are entirely unchanged, that he requires the assistance of six deputies for the proper discharge of the duties of his office, and he files an affidavit to that effect. Thereupon it becomes the duty of the board of supervisors to consider whether his salary, as fixed and provided in the act, is sufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services of the clerk and six deputies; and, if they happen to be of the opinion that $3,000 is not a reasonable compensation for the clerk, or that $10,000 is not sufficient for the compensation of the six deputies, they must make an order allowing the clerk to appoint, not additional deputies, but as many deputies as he requires in connection with himself to perform the duties of the office, and order their salaries paid out of the county treasury. This result of a literal construction of the law is so flagrantly absurd, when applied to counties of the second class, that it must be rejected in favor of one more reasonable, though certainly less consonant with the terms of the statute. And it may be conceded that the most reasonable construction that can be given to this proviso is that indicated in the foregoing extract from the opinion of the judge of the superior court. It seems to me, however, that, although the law may have been construed by him according to the actual intention of the legislature, it was applied in this case in its literal sense, for the respondent was Bonneau's sole deputy when the law was passed, and when he was last elected. It was not shown that an additional deputy was required, and in fact none was required. Respondent continued after the order of the board, and his new appointment, to be as he had been before, the sole deputy in the office, and what was in fact done in Marin county by its clerk and supervisors was precisely what I have supposed done in attempting to illustrate the working of the law according to its express terms in a county of the second class. If, therefore, the order under which the respondent claims can be upheld, all the proceedings above supposed to have taken place in a county of the second class would be entirely legitimate and proper.

In making this statement I have not overlooked the fact which appears in the evidence, though not in the findings or decision of the court, that the business of the clerk of Marin county did increase, after the passage of the act of 1887, so much that the respondent, who had before given but a part of his time to his duties as deputy clerk at a small salary, was subsequently compelled to devote his whole time to the duties of the office, and necessarily earned and received a larger salary. If this fact—testified to but not found—is to be considered as bringing the respondent's case within his construction of the law, it will be necessary to bring the law so construed to the test of the constitution. According to this construction, the legislature, after dividing the counties of the state into 48 classes for the express purpose of regulating the compensation of the county officers, and having regulated such compensation by the system of allowing to each officer a certain fixed sum, or certain fees out of which he must pay the salaries of all necessary deputies and assistants, has proceeded to ingraft upon this system a proviso applicable to 20 classes, to the effect that the supervisors may, after the election of any officer, if they think the compensation allowed him by the act in force at the date of his election is insufficient, pay out of the county treasury the expense of employing any deputies he may require in addition to those required at the date of the passage of the act. Assuming this to be the true meaning of the proviso, it either is or is not a mode of regulating the compensation of the officers of the selected classes of counties. If it is a mode of regulation, how does it regulate, and through whose agency? Clearly, it seems to me, through the agency and subject to the discretion of the board of supervisors. If, under the law in force at the date of his election, an officer is to receive for his proper compensation one sum, (viz., what is left of his fixed salary after paying his necessary deputies,) and under the order of the board made after his election a larger sum, (viz., what is left of his fixed salary after paying at most only a part of his necessary deputies,) it is the discretion of the board, and not that of the legislature, which fixes the amount, and such amount, instead of being fixed in advance of his election, can only be fixed after his election, for by the terms of the proviso the affidavit of the officer is a necessary preliminary to the order of the board. Passing over this last objection, which, in view of the evident purpose of sections 5 and 9 of article 11, is serious enough, let us consider only the first. For myself, I am far from believing that the plan of regulating the salaries of local officers by local boards is a bad one. On the contrary, I think the best plan would be to leave such matters to the control of those who are most directly interested and most capable of deciding for the best. But it is very certain that the framers of our constitution distinctly intended to give this power to the legislature, to the exclusion of the boards of supervisors. This is not only evident from the language of section 5 of article 11, but is shown by the debates of the convention. When this article was reported to the convention, Mr. Webster, of Alameda, offered an amendment to section 5, providing in effect that the respective boards of supervisors should regulate the compensation of other county officers. After a short debate, in which the only argument against the amendment consisted of a statement of the supposed mischiefs involved in conferring such a power upon local boards, the amendment was voted down, and the section adopted substantially as reported. Deb. Const. pp. 1048, 1049. The framers of the constitution having thus deliberately rejected the proposition to invest the board of supervisors with discretionary authority in this particular, and having committed the whole matter to the discretion of the legislature, under a mandatory injunction to exercise the power by regulating in advance the compensation of all officers according to their duties, it is clear that the legislature cannot delegate such power to the supervisors, to be exercised according to their discretion. But counsel for respondent seek to avoid the force of this argument, by insisting that the proviso in question, according to their construction of it, does not in any way regulate or affect the compensation of the county officers. They make a distinction between the compensation of the officer and the expenses of his office, and contend that the county government act itself fixes the compensation of the officers beyond the power of the board of supervisors to change or alter it, and that the proviso merely gives the board power to allow and pay the expenses of the office occasioned by changed conditions and unforeseen contingencies. I understand this to be the position to which the respondent commits himself, and upon which he feels most confident of sustaining the judgment in his favor.

In view of the foregoing discussion it would seem rather difficult to maintain that the proviso in question does not affect, and was not intended to regulate, the compensation of county officers; but, conceding for the moment that the respondent is right in his construction of it, what is the result? The result is that we have an act in direct conflict with various provisions of the constitution prohibitory of local and special legislation. If there is any one feature of the constitution more marked, any characteristic more pervasive, than all others, it is this oft-reiterated, this general and specific, inhibition of local and special laws. I cite the following clauses as bearing more directly upon the matter under discussion: Article 1, § 11: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Article 4, § 25: "The legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Ninth. Regulating county and township business, or the election of county and township officers. * * * Thirty-Third. In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable." Now this law, which for the present we assume has nothing to do with the compensation of county officers, but merely empowers the boards of supervisors to allow and pay the expenses caused by changed conditions and unforeseen contingencies, is certainly a law of a general nature, relating, as it does, to a matter of equal interest to every part of the state. It ought, therefore, to have a uniform operation throughout the state, instead of being confined to less than half of the counties. But, passing over this objection to the law as one founded upon a disputed, and perhaps doubtful, construction of section 11, art. 1, it seems clear that this proviso is in direct conflict with the ninth and thirty-third subdivisions of section 25, art. 4, for certainly it is a regulation of county business, and the case not only admits, it demands, the application of a general law. But this law is local and special. It selects certain classes of counties, apparently at random, some large, some small, some of intermediate size, omitting others of every grade of population, above, below, and intermediate, and confers upon the classes so arbitrarily selected a power and a privilege in the transaction of the county business which is denied to others standing in precisely the same relation to the subject of the enactment. The fact that it is made applicable to classes of counties created in pursuance of authority expressly conferred by the constitution itself, viz., the authority to classify counties by population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers, does not make it a general law; for, on the construction which is here assumed, it is not a regulation of the compensation of officers, but a provision for contingent expenses; and a classification permitted for one kind of legislation cannot be made the basis of a different kind of legislation to which it is manifestly inappropriate. It is this consideration which distinguishes this case from Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. Rep. 1081, and People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 444, 18 Pac. Rep. 413. In the first-mentioned case an act was upheld, although it applied to but one class of counties; but it was an act to regulate the compensation of the county officers. In the Henshaw Case the act upheld affected only one class of cities; but it was an act relating to municipal organization, for which purpose the constitution expressly authorizes the classification of cities and towns in proportion to population. Article 11, § 6.

The case of Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, on the other hand, holds that the classification of counties established by the act of 1883, for a legitimate purpose, cannot be made the basis of discriminating legislation, even when it relates to the compensation of county officers. The case of Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, is also directly in point on the proposition that a law is not general merely because it applies equally to all of a class arbitrarily defined. As Mr. Justice McKinstry says in that case: "A general law must be as broad as its object." Therefore a law, the object of which is to provide for the payment of county expenses arising from unforeseen contingencies, must be as broad as the state, for it is absurd to say that unforeseen contingencies will happen in some counties, but not in others. In the case of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. Rep. 604, a law applying to two classes of municipal corporations was held unconstitutional, because it related to a subject foreign to the purpose for which the classification of such corporations is authorized, and the discussion on this point was summed up in the following words: "The conclusion is that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." Pages 251, 252, 91 Cal., and page 607, 27 Pac. Rep. In view of these decisions, the conclusion cannot be avoided that the proviso, construed as something distinct from a regulation of the compensation of county officers, is local and special legislation, and therefore void. And this vice of the statute in question distinguishes it broadly from the law which was sustained in Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal. 394, 25 Pac. Rep. 488, upon which the respondent so confidently relies. That was a general law, allowing superintendents of schools in every county in the state certain necessary official expenses, and was in this respect similar to many general provisions of the Codes allowing for extraordinary expenses of county offices; such, for instance, as the preparation of a new great register, (Pol. Code, § 1113,) to which I see no constitutional objection. If I am correct in the views above expressed, the proviso in question is void as special legislation, even if construed according to respondent's contention,—that it does not affect the compensation of county officers. But, although I have for the moment conceded the correctness of his position as to this point, I do not think it can be maintained. The proviso, in my opinion, is an attempt to regulate such compensation by committing to the discretion of the supervisors a duty which the constitution had confided to the legislature exclusively,—a duty which, under the terms of the act, the supervisors cannot perform until after the election of the officers to be affected, whereas the constitution requires it to be performed by the legislature in advance of their election. For these reasons I concur in the judgment of reversal.

McFARLAND, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. I have not the time, and there is no necessity, to state my views at large on the questions here involved. I will state some of them, however, briefly.

1. The undisputed general rule is that all presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of statutes; that before an act of a co-ordinate branch of the government can be declared invalid by the judiciary for the reason that it is in conflict with the constitution, such conflict must be clear, positive, abrupt, and unquestionable; and that, in case of fair, reasonable doubt of its constitutionality, the statute should be upheld. I state this old rule here because I think it particularly applicable to the case at bar; for, at best, the unconstitutionality of the statute here in question is certainly not so clear as to be seen without a good deal of microscopic aid.

2. The amendment of 1887 was not, in my opinion, in violation of section 9 of article 11 of the constitution, which provides against increase of compensation "after election." Bonneau, the county clerk, whose deputy Dougherty, the plaintiff, is, was elected after the passage of said amendment; and he did not "contract," as contended by appellant, that he would do all the work of his office, or pay a deputy, if necessary to employ one. The law which gave the contingent right to have a deputy paid by the county was in force at the time of his election. Moreover, the employment of a deputy paid by the county did not "increase the compensation" of the county clerk. His compensation was the same after the employment of the deputy as before. It is contended that his compensation was increased because his work was lessened. Now, in the first place, there is no such presumption; the presumption is that the board allowed the deputy because there was additional work for him to do. But, in the second place, suppose his work was lessened, shall a solemn act of the legislature be declared void by the circuitous reasoning which brings us to the conclusion that a decrease of duties is an "actual increase of compensation" within the meaning of the constitution? Suppose that the legislature had created a new county office, and transferred to the incumbent of such new office a part of the business formerly required to be done by the county clerk, would that have been an "increase of compensation" of the county clerk?

3. Neither do I think that the amendment is "special legislation" inhibited by section 25 of article 4, or that it has not a "uniform operation" within the meaning of section 11 of article 1. The legislature has the power to "establish a system of county governments," (section 4, art. 11,) and to "regulate" the compensation of county officers, "and for this purpose may classify the counties by population," (section 5, art. 11.) Under these provisions the legislature may create as many classes as its judgment dictates, and such classification is not special legislation. Longan v. Solano Co., 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. Rep. 463. And, of course, if such legislation is not "special," it has a "uniform operation," because it operates alike on each of the classes upon which it operates at all.

4. And I see nothing in the point that the board of supervisors could not be given the power to allow the deputy and provide for his salary. The constitution merely declares that the legislature shall by general laws provide for the election "or appointment" of certain named county officers, and regulate their compensation. Section 5, art. 11. The deputy involved in the case at bar can hardly be considered as one of the county officers mentioned in the section just referred to; but, if he were, it is difficult to see why the legislature could not "provide" for his appointment in the way mentioned in the statute under consideration. And the legislature is only to regulate the compensation. I confess that I can find no authority in either common or law literature for giving to the word "regulate" the meaning of "fix,"—that is, to name definitely, exactly, and mathematically the very sum in dollars and cents of the compensation. I find no general or law dictionary which uses the word "fix" at all in defining the word "regulate," or gives one as the synonym of the other. Indeed, the words seem to have quite different significations. Some of the definitions of "fix" are to make "firm, staple, or fast;" "to set or place permanently;" "to fasten immovably." Webst. The common definitions of "regulate" are "to adjust by rule, method, or established mode;" "to direct by rule or restriction;" "to subject to governing principles of law." Id. These same definitions of "regulate" are to be found in law dictionaries. The latter word, therefore, has much greater latitude of meaning than "fix," which includes the notion of inflexibility and rigidity. To fix is to fasten a thing immovably,—as with nail and hammer; while to regulate includes the idea of marking the boundaries and prescribing the methods within and by which the thing may be done by others. I know that words are uncertain things, and must be construed with reference to the context and relations in which they are found; but certainly a word should not be strained from its usual to a restricted sense when the result of such construction is to upset a statute. Therefore, giving to "regulate" what, it seems to me, is clearly its usual meaning, I see no question in the case about unwarranted "delegation of authority" by the legislature. The constitution expressly provided that "the legislature shall provide a system of county governments," which shall have, to a large extent, legislative powers; and I cannot see how the power to employ and pay deputies in county offices, within restricted limits, is different from the numerous other powers which boards of supervisors are exercising every day without question. The Code formerly provided that the board of supervisors shall have the power "to fix the compensation of all county officers not otherwise in this Code, or by general or special law, fixed, and provide for the payment of the same." Section 4046, Pol. Code, (Newmark, 1889.) And this court held in Kinsey v. Kellogg, 65 Cal. 115, 3 Pac. Rep. 405, that such power was properly granted. This was practically holding that the county governments might be given the power to fix the salaries of all county officers. I do not think that the position of appellant is made any stronger by putting it in the form of the proposition that the amendment of 1887 undertook to give the board of supervisors the power "to change or suspend the law." The amendment is in the very section 211 which contains all the law on the subject; and the change was made by the legislature itself. In my opinion, the judgment should be affirmed.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the views expressed by McFARLAND, J.

BURR v. JOHNSON, County Treasurer, et al. (No. 14,574.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Application of one Burr for a writ of mandate, to one Johnson, treasurer of the county of San Francisco, and others, to compel the payment of a certain warrant. Writ refused, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Clinton L. White, for appellant. A. J. & Elwood Bruner, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This case presents the same general questions which were involved in Dougherty v. Austin, (No. 13,323,) 29 Pac. Rep. 1092, the decision in which has just been rendered, and upon the authority of that case the judgment appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

CULVERHOUSE v. CROSON et al. (No. 14,435.)

AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—TERMS—PAYMENT OF EXPENSES.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 473, authorizing the court to allow amendments to pleadings on such terms as may be proper, there is no abuse of discretion in requiring, as terms of an amendment to an amended answer at time of trial, that defendant should at once pay plaintiff $65 actual expenses of coming to the trial, which would be of no avail if the amendment was allowed necessitating a continuance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Jerry Culverhouse against E. T. Croson and Emma A. Croson for foreclosure. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order imposing terms as a condition to amendment of the answer, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for appellants. Clay W. Taylor, (Chauncey H. Dunn, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This appeal is from a judgment of foreclosure and sale of certain mortgaged premises, and from an order denying a new trial. The main question in the case is whether or not the trial court abused its discretion in refusing the defendants leave to file an amendment to their amended answer. It appears that when the case was called for trial the defendants, evidently supposing that it was necessary to their defense that it should be pleaded and proved that they had within a reasonable time offered to rescind the contract, which they claimed to be without consideration, and tainted with fraudulent representations of the original holder of the note secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, asked leave to file an amendment to the amended answer. This the court refused to allow, under the circumstances surrounding the matter, unless the defendants would pay $65, "as terms," to the plaintiff. It appears that this was to cover certain expenditures of the plaintiff in coming to the place of trial with counsel, which would be of no avail if the amendment was allowed, because a continuance of the cause would become necessary. In this connection it appears further that the cause had been upon the calendar for two years; that the plaintiff and his attorney had come from Redding, in Shasta county,—a considerable distance from Alturas, Modoc county, (the place of trial,) and that what was asked was to reimburse plaintiff for actual expenditures, not including the use of a private team of horses. The defendants did not seem to be decidedly averse to paying this money as a consideration to file the amendment, but wanted it included in the general bill of costs. But this the plaintiff objected to, as not likely to result in his ever getting the money, as the mortgaged property he claimed not to be sufficient to pay the debt then due. The court seemed to think that, as the defendants had so long delayed their proposed amendment, and had compelled the plaintiff to come with counsel from a distant place, putting him to this expense, and that an amendment would necessitate a continuance, justice required that the defendants should reimburse plaintiff then and there for the money thus expended, which otherwise he would not perhaps obtain from defendants. We cannot say that this action of the court was in violation of the terms of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There are various other points raised by the appellants for a reversal of the judgment and order, but a careful examination of the record leads us to the belief that no prejudicial error has resulted from the action of the trial court, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

CARPENTER et al. v. BAILEY et al. (No. 14,744.)

WILLS—FRAUD—UNDUE INFLUENCE—DELUSIONS—NONEXPERT WITNESS—COMPETENCY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action to set aside a will by which testator left his estate to his partner's children, evidence that the partner circulated a report that testator had visited his relatives, had been badly treated by them, and would not leave them any portion of his property, and thus suggested it to testator's disordered fancy, was insufficient to sustain a finding that the will had been procured by the fraud of the partner, where there was no evidence that testator ever heard of his partner's statement, and it appeared that testator had previously made a similar statement.

2. The fact that the partner had a family, which was supported by the partnership, could have no tendency to induce the testator to make his will in favor of his partner's children.

3. Evidence that testator wrote to his relatives several times; that his relatives wrote him, sometimes addressing to his partner; and that the letters were neither received nor returned from the dead-letter office,—was insufficient to show that the partner suppressed the correspondence, in the absence of evidence that the partner received the letters, or that he alone was in the habit of going to the post office for letters.

4. Evidence that the partner had great influence over testator during the latter years of his life; that he frequently visited him during his last illness; that, as he was going over accounts with testator one time, both ceased talking when the landlady entered the room; that the attending physician importuned testator to make a will; and that he delayed for some time before doing so,—is insufficient to show undue influence exercised by the partner, or some one at his request.

5. A person who appreciates the varying moods of another, and who is able to judge of his acts with full knowledge of his peculiarities, would be an "intimate acquaintance," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, making competent "the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason of the opinion being given."

6. The objection to allowing witnesses who were not intimate acquaintances of testator to state their opinion of his sanity cannot be avoided by varying the form of the question, and asking how he appeared mentally.

7. The trial court erred in permitting an hypothetical question to be put to a medical expert, in which it was assumed that when the testator said he had a sister, and if he knew where she lived he would visit her, he referred to a sister whom he knew to have been dead for 30 years, rather than to his living sister, where no mention of the dead sister was made in the evidence on which the question was based.

8. An instruction that if testator firmly believed that his relatives had mistreated him, and such belief was not based on fact, evidence, or probability, and was such as a rational man under like circumstances would not have had, he was in the eyes of the law suffering from an insane delusion, is an instruction as to the weight and value of evidence.

9. It was error to charge, in effect, that as a matter of law testator was of unsound mind, if he was mistaken in his belief that his relatives had mistreated him, and therefore made no provision for them in his will.

10. It was error to charge that, if the jury found that testator's feelings had undergone a radical change, they should inquire whether there was good reason for such change, as the only inquiry should have been whether such chage was caused by an insane delusion.

11. Plaintiff cannot be said to have suppressed evidence which he might have offered, where he objected to it when offered by defendant, and the court excluded it as inadmissible; and in such case plaintiff would be injured by instructions that "it is a presumption of law that evidence willfully supressed would be adverse if produced," and that "it is a presumption of law that higher evidence would be adverse, from lower evidence being produced."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; ANSEL SMITH, Judge.

Proceeding by Abel F. Carpenter and others against C. K. Bailey and others to revoke the probate of the will of Charles W. Carpenter, deceased. Judgment for contestants. Proponents appeal. Reversed.

For decision on former appeal, see 79 Cal. 382, 21 Pac. Rep. 835.

Carter & Smith and S. D. Woods, for appellants. L. W. Elliott, A. H. Carpenter, and Sawyer & Burnett, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is a contest in regard to a will, inaugurated after the will had been probated, and is the second appeal taken by proponents. 79 Cal. 382, 21 Pac. Rep. 835. It is from an order revoking the probate of the will and from an order refusing a new trial. There have been two trials, each before a jury, and twice the verdict has been to the effect that the decedent was of unsound mind, and that the will was the product of an insane delusion. On the last trial special issues were submitted, and the jury not only found that the decedent was of unsound mind and under an insane delusion which caused him to make the will in question, but also that the will was procured by the fraud and undue influence of C. K. Bailey.

The contestants are three brothers of the deceased, a sister, and the minor children of a deceased brother, all residents of the state of Vermont. The beneficiaries in the will, who by its terms receive the bulk of the estate, are the children of C. K. Bailey. No relative is given anything by the terms of the will. Carpenter was a native of Vermont, born about 1829. He left home when about 20 years of age, and is shown by the evidence to have been in California as early as 1853, where he had since continuously resided. He had never been back to visit his relatives, and none of them had ever visited him in this state. Some correspondence was kept up, however, as late as 1877. The record discloses that in 1856 Carpenter was mining at Mokelumne Hill, and that C. K. Bailey was his partner; also that in 1863 he was ranching with Bailey as his partner. This partnership continued until Carpenter's death, January 2, 1884. Carpenter never married, but Bailey was a married man, with a family of children, some of whom are the beneficiaries of the proposed will. I do not find their ages stated in the evidence, but it does appear that they grew up during the copartnership, and that the relation between them and Carpenter was intimate and friendly. There is abundant evidence of his attachment for them, and some expressions were those of his intention, long before his last sickness, to make some of them the objects of his testamentary bounty. Correspondence was put in evidence between Carpenter and some of his relatives, mostly, however, of very old date, and with his father and mother, both of whom died before him, which seem to show a relation quite intimate and friendly.

Omitting formal parts, and condensing, the charges of fraud in the complaint are: (1) Bailey falsely represented to Carpenter that his relatives were all dead; (2) that upon the death of either the property would be greatly depreciated unless kept together; (3) Bailey promised to make his will in favor of Carpenter, if Carpenter would make the will in question; and (4) Carpenter's sickness was not fatal, and Carpenter would probably survive Bailey, and his estate get the benefit of the proposed wills.

There is no evidence to support any of these specific charges, nor, so far as I can find, is there in the record any evidence tending to show fraud of any kind on the part of Bailey or any one else. In response to a challenge from appellants, respondents state several matters which they claim constitute fraud.

1. Bailey circulated a report that Carpenter had been back east, and had been badly treated by his relatives. It is, to say the least, doubtful if there is any evidence tending to show that Bailey circulated such a report. The proof is that a certain witness asked if Carpenter had got back. Bailey said, "Yes;" and also stated, according to the witness, that he complained of the treatment he had received, and that he would not give his relatives any portion of his property. Some of the contestants' witnesses also state that they heard Carpenter make similar assertions. The claim is that Bailey started the report, thus suggesting it to Carpenter's disordered fancy. There is no evidence that the alleged statement of Bailey was communicated to Carpenter, and the alleged assertions of Carpenter antedate this supposed interview with Bailey.

2. Bailey had a family which were supported by the partnership. There is no evidence of this, but, if true, it would not constitute fraud; for Carpenter must have known it, and consented to the arrangement; and if by it Carpenter were defrauded, that would have no tendency to induce him to make a will in favor of Bailey's children.

3. Bailey suppressed Carpenter's correspondence. The only evidence of this is that one of Carpenter's brothers said he had written to him, and that some letters had been addressed to Bailey, but since 1877 had received no reply, nor had any of his letters been returned to him from the dead-letter office. No letters since 1877 were found among Carpenter's effects, and Carpenter is reported to have said on sundry occasions that he had written and had got no replies. There is no proof that Bailey received any of the letters, or that he was in the habit of going to the post-office for letters exclusively. Sometimes Bailey went to town to transact their business, and sometimes Carpenter did. Whether either or who was in the habit of going for their mail does not appear. Such evidence, at the most, could do no more than raise a suspicion. Certainly it cannot be called proof. This is not one of the charges specifically averred.

The jury found that the will was procured to be made through fraud exercised by C. K. Bailey, or some one at his instance and request. This finding is wholly unsupported by the evidence. The allegations of undue influence may be regarded as sufficient. The special issue submitted to the jury was in two forms, in which, however, I see very little difference. Was the will procured to be made through undue influence exercised by C. K. Bailey, or any one at his instance and request, and was it procured to be made in the form in which it was made by such influence? The jury found both issues in the affirmative. Was there any evidence tending to support either of these findings? I think not, or, at least, not more than "slight evidence." Section 1835, Code Civil Proc. This court held in Goodwin v. Goodwin, 59 Cal. 560, following Jarman on Wills, that the influence must amount to force and coercion, destroying free agency, as to the very act, and that the exertion of undue influence upon the very act must be proved. There is no evidence tending to show that Bailey, or any member of his family, ever spoke to Carpenter about making a will, or about the disposition of his property, or in regard to his relatives, or that any one else, authorized or not, ever tried to influence Carpenter in regard to the disposition of his property, much less in favor of Bailey or his children. Carpenter died from consumption. His last illness was not at Bailey's house, and neither Bailey nor any member of his family attended him during his illness. On the contrary, Mrs. White, at whose house he was and by whom he was nursed, shows herself a warm partisan of the contestants. She was one of the witnesses to the will, and says she thought at the time that it ought to be "bursted" because he gave nothing to his relatives. Challenged to find some evidence to support these special issues, respondents specify: (1) Bailey's great influence over Carpenter during the latter years of his life; (2) his frequent visits to Carpenter during his last illness; (3) the importunities of Dr. Stockton, the attending physician, to make a will; (4) the reluctance of Carpenter to make a will, shown by the fact that he did not make it at once when it was suggested; and (5) when Bailey was there at one time going over the accounts with Carpenter they ceased talking when Mrs. White entered the room. It is evident at once that there is nothing here that comes up to the rule laid down in Goodwin v. Goodwin. Conceding that it was proven that Bailey had more influence in the management of the partnership business, that would not tend to prove that he influenced the testamentary disposition. It is not shown that Dr. Stockton made any effort to influence Carpenter as to the character of his will, or ever mentioned Bailey or his children, or Carpenter's relations; in fact, all that is shown is that Dr. Stockton made the very proper suggestion that he ought to make a will, and through him Carpenter sent for the attorney who drew it up. It does not appear that Bailey was acquainted with the attorney. The attorney testified that no one spoke to him about the contents of the will except Carpenter, who told him that he (Carpenter) had sent for him to prepare it. The other specifications do not require refutation. There was really no proof to sustain the verdict in this respect.

The special verdict in regard to mental unsoundness, though stated in different ways, is really only that the deceased at the time of making the will was of unsound mind, and therefore incompetent to make a will, and, if it may be classed under this head, that he failed to make provision for the contestants by reason of an insane delusion. It was admitted that there was some evidence tending to support each of these findings, and the verdict upon these issues is sufficient to sustain the order vacating the probate of the will. The question, therefore, is, does the record show such errors of law in the trial of these issues as will necessitate a new trial? The allegation of mental incompetency was supported, in a large degree, by the opinions of witnesses claimed to be intimate, as to his mental condition. Objection was made in the case of each witness on the ground that the witness was not shown to be an intimate acquaintance, within the meaning of subdivision 10, § 1870, Code Civil Proc., which makes competent "the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental sanity of a person, the reason for the opinion being given." What is an "intimate acquaintance" has not been very clearly settled. The requirement that such an acquaintance shall be an intimate acquaintance does not seem to exist elsewhere. In State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, Mr. Justice Doe, in a dissenting opinion, which has since been followed in that state, considers the question as to whether persons not experts can be allowed to testify in regard to mental sanity. He seems to assert that in England the rule has always been to receive such testimony, and he shows by numerous citations that such, too, has been the rule in most of the states. The witnesses are only required to have had sufficient opportunity to observe the person whose sanity is in question. Different rulings have been made as to what shall be considered a sufficient showing of opportunity of observation to enable a witness to form an opinion which can be received as evidence; or, expressed in the language of our Code, what degree of intimacy there must be. In general, the idea seems to be that no rule can be prescribed on this subject, and therefore, as in regard to handwriting, if it appear that there has been some opportunity, and the witness has an opinion, he may state it. The value of it will depend upon circumstances. In some states such evidence is not received at all from nonexperts. Our Code provides that intimate acquaintances may give their opinions, and, of course, the converse will follow that no others can. The phrase "intimate acquaintance" cannot include all aquaintances. Worcester, under the word "acquaintance," has the following: "Acquaintance expresses less than familiarity, familiarity less than intimacy. Acquaintance springs from occasional intercourse; familiarity from daily intercourse; intimacy from unreserved intercourse. Acquaintance, having some knowledge; familiarity, from long habit; intimacy, by close connection." In People v. Levy, 71 Cal. 618, 12 Pac. Rep. 791, it is said: "It is often a difficult question to determine whether the witness is sufficiently acquainted with the party to entitle him to speak. That the witness should be familiar with the temperament and habits of mind of the person whose soundness is in question there is no doubt." Sir John Nicholl, in Kinleside v. Harrison, 2 Phillim. Ecc. 449, says: "Persons who see a testator only occasionally will form different opinions from those who have better opportunities of judging. We know that little appearances occurring in this way are extremely fallacious, yet we often find occasional observers depose with great confidence. It often happens that the most ignorant are the most confident. * * * This kind of opinion is still more various where the testator's capacity is fluctuating, where he is sometimes better and sometimes worse, and this is generally the case with old age or other infirmities." An intimate acquaintance would appreciate these varying moods and temperaments, and be able to judge the acts of a testator with full knowledge of his peculiarities. A mere acquaintance who only casually meets one who has some infirmities, and perhaps also some striking idiosyncrasies, although quite often, and yet without special interest in him, might think strangely of conduct which to one better acquainted would seem rational and natural. No two persons are exactly alike, and many, in fact nearly every one, has some weakness, which, perhaps like physical infirmities, they endeavor to favor or hide. Our thoughts run in different channels; our mental processes follow different methods. An intimate acquaintance, who is familiar with all these, can better judge of mental conditions.

Now, when we take into consideration the rule, as it exists in most jurisdictions where the common law prevails, we must conclude that our Code has attempted what has been said to be impracticable, to establish a rule as to what opportunities of observation shall entitle a witness to speak. A nonexpert may testify, but only if he has had these advantages which I have attempted briefly to specify, notwithstanding the statutory attempt. Since it requires the drawing of a definite line between things which are separated only by degrees of difference, the rule is and must remain more or less indefinite. A very large discretion must be conceded to the trial court. If the conclusion reached is one which can be reasonably entertained, consistently with the above idea of intimacy, this court cannot review the ruling.

Some of the witnesses who were allowed to give their opinions as to the sanity of the deceased evidently were not intimate acquaintances, within this rule, and the objection is not avoided by varying the form of the question,—asking the witness how he appeared mentally. If anything, this adds to the objection, for it fails to require the witness to give the reason for his belief. There are, of course, some things whch are not so much matter of opinion as descriptive of appearances. If one is a raving maniac, or dead drunk, or utterly unconscious, these are sometimes, at least, hardly matters which require judgment, but only ordinary powers of observation. As to such obvious appearances, I presume it was not intended that the rule should apply. Evidence of this character is received even in those jurisdictions which do not permit one not an expert to give an opinion as to mental sanity. This was not the character of the evidence received in this case. As I think the case must be retried for other reasons, it will not be necessary to review exceptions of this character in detail.

The objection to the hypothetical question put to the medical expert, in which it is assumed that when deceased said he had a sister, and if he knew where she lived he would visit her, he referred to a sister whom he knew to have been dead for nearly 30 years, rather than to his living sister, should have been sustained. It is based upon the testimony of Drais, who simply testified: "He said if he knew where his sister was he would go and see her and visit her." There had been no mention of the dead sister, and nothing said by the witness indicates that she was thought of. The other rulings as to the admission of evidence do not seem very material, and may not be repeated at the trial.

The instructions are quite voluminous, and many of them have reference to supposed proof in regard to fraud and undue influence, upon which subject there was no evidence. They are also many of them as to the weight and value of evidence. An instruction which, commencing with an obvious fact, prefaced with the remark, "If you find," says, "you must then inquire whether so or so, and why, and, if you find thus, you must or are at liberty to conclude thus," is an instruction as to the value of evidence. Take, for instance, the fourth instruction here given at the request of the respondents. In effect, it tells the jury that if Carpenter firmly and persistently believed that his relatives had mistreated him, and such belief was firm and immovable, and not based on fact, evidence, or probability, and was such as a rational man under like circumstances would not have had, he was, in the eyes of the law, suffering from an insane delusion. Now, it is quite common for people to be offended at imaginary injuries, to take offense when none was meant, to have a firm belief that they have been mistreated, not based on fact, and when the offending party would believe—for generally the baselessness of the belief could only be proven by him—that there was not even rational ground for such belief. But the chief objection to this is that, even if the logic be sound, it is not a conclusion of law, but of the judging mind, from the evidence. The court has no right to dictate or suggest the process of reasoning by which the evidence shall be judged. Perhaps instructions of this character, though vicious and violative of the constitutional inhibition, have been often passed without condemnation; but, if a party will ask the court to argue his case upon the evidence, he should be held responsible for the soundness of the logic. In this case the appellants are as guilty in this regard as the respondents.

The second instruction given at the instance of contestants, and to which objection is made, is as follows: "If Chas. W. Carpenter, deceased, at the time of the execution of the alleged will,—if he did execute it,—was under a delusion that his relatives in the east had maltreated or abused him, and that under the influence of such delusion he made no provision in his alleged will for them, then, in the eyes of the law, he was of unsound mind, no matter how well he might transact his other business, or converse, nor how sane he was on matters in general, and you must so find." Among other definitions of "delusion" given by Webster is: "(2) The state of being deluded or misled. (3) That whch is falsely or delusively believed or propagated; false belief; error." The jury then are told that if Carpenter was mistaken in his belief, and therefore made no provision for his relatives, as matter of law he was of unsound mind. This cannot be so. There is evidence tending to show that Carpenter had for years, before any one thought him insane, said that he had been ill used. Whether he was mistaken or not, the mere fact here recited did not, as matter of law, amount to an insane delusion. There was evidence tending to show that Carpenter thought he had been east from California, and had then been ill used, while admittedly he had not left California. This instruction does not necessarily allude to that alleged delusion. That is covered by other instructions.

The ninth instruction given at the instance of contestants was, I think, erroneous, not for the alleged blunder which respondents think could do no harm, but, among other reasons, because it tells the jury that, if they find that Carpenter's feelings had undergone a radical change, they should inquire whether there was good reason for the change. The only inquiry, as there was no evidence found, should have been whether it was caused by an insane delusion. Otherwise it did not concern this inquiry. People may hate their relatives for bad reasons, and yet not be deprived of testamentary power.

The court also instructed the jury, at the instance of the plaintiffs, that "it is a presumption of law that evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse if produced." I have examined the voluminous record in vain to find any evidence that there has been any suppression of evidence. Respondents in their brief here on this point say that Dr. Stockton's testimony would naturally be considered the best evidence upon Carpenter's condition of mind, and that there was evidence that proponents would not use it, that they suppressed it by objecting to it when offered by contestants. Of course, this, if it occurred, was not a suppression of evidence, and it would be strange that the court, having decided that the evidence was not admissible, should nevertheless instruct the jury that the party offering it should have the benefit of a presumption that it was favorable, and that the other party, because he made a legal and proper objection, should thereby lay his case under the suspicion that he had been guilty of suppressing testimony. The instruction would naturally have an injurious effect. The same thing is true of the instruction: "It is a presumption of law that higher evidence would be adverse, from inferior evidence being produced." This was also evidently aimed at the objections to the testimony of Dr. Stockton, although the record does not show that any such evidence was offered. I think the order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

SALFIELD et al. v. SUTTER COUNTY LAND IMPROVEMENT & RECLAMATION CO. (No. 13,813.)

CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT—WANT OF AUTHORITY IN AGENT—RATIFICATION—PLEADING.

In an action against a corporation for the cancellation of a contract to purchase land from it on the ground that the same was made through one who represented himself to be its agent, but who in fact had no such authority, the complaint is good on demurrer, although it alleges that a portion of the price has been paid, and that the corporation refuses to return it, and has instituted an action to recover the balance, as the contract was not thereby ratified, since Civil Code, § 2309, provides that the authority of an agent to sell land shall be in writing, and section 2310 that, where the adoption of a particular mode is necessary to confer authority, ratification can only be made in the same manner; and, even if the contract could be ratified by part performance, it is immaterial that the contract, set out in hæc verba, authorizes plaintiffs to take immediate possession, and that it is not alleged that they have not done so, since it is a matter of defense that they have taken possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by David Salfield and Herman Kohlberg against the Sutter County Land Improvement & Reclamation Company.

Otto Tum Suden, for appellants. Gordon & Young, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiffs appeal from judgment entered on demurrer to their complaint. The action is to have declared void a certain writing purporting to be an agreement for the sale of land. The complaint avers that Gaman & Lyon pretended that they had authority from the corporation defendant to contract for the sale of its lands. That, relying upon such representations, the plaintiffs did on the 3d day of April, 1888, agree with said Gaman & Lyon, as agents, to purchase certain lots owned by defendant, and entered into a contract in writing to that effect, which purported to be executed by the defendant, through the said pretended agents, and which was signed as follows: "In witness whereof the said party of the first part hath by a resolution of its board of directors, duly passed, authorized its agents, Gaman and Lyon, of 330 Kearny street, San Francisco, and Sutter City, California, to affix its name hereto, and they and the said parties of the second part have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written. SUTTER CO. LAND IMPROVEMENT AND RECLAMATION COMPANY. By GAMAN & LYON, Agents. (G. & L.) DAVID SALFIELD. (D. S.) HERMAN KOHLBERG. (H. K.)" Nevertheless the corporation never authorized Gaman & Lyon, either personally or as copartners, to execute the agreement or any agreement for the sale of said lands; but plaintiffs did not discover such want of authority until June 7, 1889, and had in the mean time paid to the defendant $470 on account of principal and interest due on the contract. June 7, 1889, after discovering that Gaman & Lyon had no authority in the premises, plaintiffs demanded from the corporation the return of the said $470, which the defendant refused to do, but, on the contrary, claims that the contract is valid and binding on the plaintiffs, and has commenced suit against the plaintiffs in the justice court to recover $112.13 for interest which has accrued on the contract. The contract, which is set out in the complaint in hæc verba, authorized the plaintiffs to take immediate possession, and provided, in case one or more lots were sold by the vendees, and the pro rata portion of the purchase price were paid to the corporation, it would execute deeds for such lots to the purchasers. There is no averment as to whether possession was taken, or lots were sold, and, of course, no offer to redeliver or place the alleged vendor in statu quo. The demurrer was simply that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The contract does not purport to have attached to it the corporate seal, and it does not appear that Gaman & Lyon, or either of them, held such official position in the corporation as would raise a presumption that they were authorized to contract for the corporation in regard to anything. The complaint plainly avers that they had no authority to sell the land or to execute the contract. Under such circumstances, the laboring oar must be with the respondent. Its real claim is that the contract has been ratified by the corporation, according to the allegations of the complaint: First, by the receipt on the part of the corporation of $470, paid under the terms of the agreement, which plaintiffs seek to have declared void; and, second, by commencing suit to recover money due by the terms of the agreement. This being a contract for the sale of land, it was necessary that the authority of the agent should be in writing. Section 2309, Civil Code. The defendant, being a corporation, could only act in this matter through its board of directors, when duly assembled, by resolution duly passed and recorded. Sections 305, 308, 377, Civil Code; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 10; Harding v. Vandewater, 40 Cal. 78; Association v. Bustamente, 52 Cal. 192; Alta Silver Min. Co. v. Alta Placer Min. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 Pac. Rep. 373. Section 2310 of the Civil Code provides that, when the adoption of a particular form or mode is necessary to confer authority, ratification can only be made in the same manner, "or, where an oral authorization would suffice, by accepting or retaining the benefit of the act, with notice thereof." The supposed acts of ratification do not conform to the requirements of the Code. It is said, however, that the plaintiffs show that they have partly performed the contract, by making payment of a part of the purchase money, and, therefore, since they may insist upon it, the respondent can. But in Forrester v. Flores, 64 Cal. 24,[1] this court approved the following statement: "By an unbroken current of authorities running through many years it is settled too firmly for question that payment, even to the whole amount of the purchase money, is not to be deemed part performance so as to justify a court of equity in enforcing the contract." It is also contended that the contract authorizes the plaintiffs to take immediate possession, and it is not shown that they have not done so; therefore there may be other acts in part performance. As the assumed contract was no contract, plaintiffs were not authorized to take possession; but, if the contract could be validated by part performance, it is incumbent upon the party claiming the benefit of such acts to aver them. Plaintiffs were not required to negative a possible defense. The question is not, however, as to whether an oral contract for the sale of land can be enforced, but whether what purports to be a written contract of a corporation is so in fact. No doubt the corporation might have ratified it before the plaintiffs signified their intention not to be bound thereby, but, so far as the averments of the complaint show, they did not do so. As the corporation could have elected not to be bound, the same privilege must be accorded the plaintiffs. The judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to overrule the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. MITCHELL. (No. 20,900.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—EXPERT—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

1. A train register is not competent, on a criminal prosecution, to prove the time of the arrival and departure of a train at a certain station on the night of the crime, where the conductor who made the register is not called as a witness, and the agents of the railroad, who are called, have no actual knowledge of the time, but are only able to testify that the rules of the company required the conductor to register.

2. On a murder trial, where a witness for the defense has testified that a certain person, who had been tried for the same offense and acquitted, had admitted the shooting of the deceased, and that he got the pistol from a third person, it is not competent for the latter to testify in rebuttal that the pistol was not procured from him, as this does not tend to show whether the one party or the other did the killing, or to contradict the witness in testifying merely as to what was told him. DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

3. Expert testimony is not admissible, on a murder trial, as to whether a certain cartridge had marks upon it which would indicate that it had once been in the chamber of a pistol, or whether a ball taken from a certain pistol was similar to one which had been fired at the deceased, as such matters are matters of common knowledge.

4. Statements made by a defendant, while testifying as a witness on the trial of one charged with the same offense as that for which he is being tried, are admissible against him, where it does not appear that he objected to being sworn or to testifying on that occasion.

5. A witness, who fails merely to testify as expected, cannot be impeached by the party calling him by proving that he had elsewhere made the desired statements, but this can only be done when he has given damaging testimony.

Conviction of Rube Mitchell for murder. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. P. Johnson and G. H. Chase, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and A. M. McCoy, Dist. Atty., for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant, having been convicted of murder in the second degree, appeals from the judgment and a refusal of a new trial. It appears that Oscar Crandall was fatally shot, about midnight, April 23, 1891, near Rathja's saloon, in the town of Red Bluff. Crandall, who had been in the saloon, went out upon the back porch, where he was engaged for a time imitating Chinese talk. Two or three minutes after he went out, Rathja heard the report of a pistol, and went upon the back porch, but saw no one. The back yard was surrounded by a high fence. The saloon was at the corner of Main and Hickory streets, facing on Main. It was bright moonlight, and, except as obstructed by the fence, Rathja could see both streets. Two witnesses claim to have been eyewitnesses of the affray. Peterson, who testified for the prosecution, was 224 feet away westerly on Hickory street. He was positive that he recognized defendant's voice, but he could distinguish no one by sight. He saw the flash of the pistol, and the person who fired ran off south along the alley back of the yard which incloses Rathja's back porch. This is all the direct testimony against defendant, but there was considerable circumstantial evidence. Defendant claimed and testified, as did several other witnesses in his behalf, that he was at home, about a half block from Rathja's saloon, administering what he calls a "shot" of morphine to one Boyden, when he heard the report, and was told that some one was shot, and then ran across the street with Boyden, found the wounded man, and he and Boyden took up the body, and carried it to the front of the saloon. While they were so carrying the wounded man the people gathered. Hughes and Boyden both corroborate defendant's story. Hughes says he was across the street from Rathja's back yard at the corner of Hickory and High streets. He heard the altercation, saw the flash of the pistol, and the assassin run off, he thought down Main street, and, being but a few steps from defendant's house, informed a woman there that some one was shot; that Mitchell and Boyden ran past him to the saloon, and the body was carried as defendant stated. To make out the case for the prosecution by the circumstantial evidence, it became important to fix the precise time of the homicide. It was contended on the part of the people that defendant did not go to his house, as he claims he did, to administer the hypodermic injection of morpnine to Boyden; that he came up from the depot on the Tremont hotel bus after the arrival of the train, which was due at 11:50 P. M.; that the homicide was committed before the departure of the train, the schedule time of which was 12:05. They had experiments made as to the time it would require to walk where he said he walked after he left the bus, and claimed that he did not have time to go home and do what he said he did before the report of the pistol. There was much evidence directed to this point on both sides. Among other things, the defense introduced evidence showing that the train did not leave on that night until after 12:10. The prosecution, against the objections of the defendant, were permitted to show by the local agent of the railroad and the night operator that by the rules and regulations of the company the trains must not arrive before their schedule time, and that the conductor must register the exact time of arrival and departure. That such register was in fact kept at this station. The register was then introduced, defendant objecting, from which it appears that the train arrived and left on the night in question on schedule time. Neither of the witnesses had any actual knowledge of the times, nor was the conductor who made the record called as a witness. The evidence was clearly incompetent, and was material in the highest degree. If we can presume, as suggested, that the conductor was absent or dead, that fact would make no difference. It was hearsay evidence, and should have been excluded.

[1] 28 Pac. Rep. 107.

It seems that one H. K. Long had been tried for this same offense, and had been acquitted. Nevertheless the defense attempted to prove that Long committed the homicide. C. A. Boyden, a witness for the defense, testified, without objection, that Long told him that he had killed Crandall, and that he got the gun from Morin. In rebuttal, the prosecution asked Morin if he loaned Long a pistol, and he was allowed, against the objection of the defendant, to answer that he did not. This was not competent. It did not tend to show that Long did not kill Crandall, or that Mitchell did, and it did not tend to contradict the witness Boyden, who did not say that Long procured a pistol from Morin. He only testified as to what Long had said, and this evidence did not tend to disprove that fact. See People v. Hurtado, 63 Cal. 289.

Vance, a carpenter and gunsmith, was called as an expert, and allowed, against objection, to state his opinion that a certain cartridge had never been in a pistol, because he saw no mark on it. He was then allowed to compare a ball shown him, and assumed to have been from a pistol claimed by the defense to have been used by Long, with the ball taken from the head of deceased, and to state that they were not similar. The balls were there in court and shown to the jury. This was not a proper subject for expert testimony. It did not require special skill to determine whether a cartridge had marks upon it which would indicate that it had been once in the chamber of a pistol, nor that it was covered with verdigris, nor that the end of one bullet was feather-edged, and another not so, or was flat or concave at the end. These are all matters of common knowledge, and the jury was as competent to pass upon them as the witness.

The prosecution, in rebuttal, put in evidence statements made by the defendant while testifying as a witness in the case of People v. Long. Though charged with the same offense for which Long was tried, it is not by the same information. It does not appear that defendant objected to being sworn on that trial, and it seems to be conceded that he did not object to answering the particular questions, the answers to which were given in evidence against him. It is contended simply that the statements are not voluntary, because the defendant was duly sworn to answer questions, and was compelled to answer or to admit that his answers might criminate himself. Bish. Crim. Proc. §§ 1255–1257, cites numerous authorities, and concludes that the testimony voluntarily given as a witness are admissions or confessions competent against him in a criminal cause to which they are pertinent. Unless he objected to answering the particular matter complained of, and was forced nevertheless to testify, it is considered voluntary. Some few cases there are which seem to sustain the appellant, but nearly all the authorities are the other way. See, also, Whart. Crim. Law, §§ 664, 669, 1120. We cannot see that our Code, which allows the defendant to testify or not as he may choose, and to limit his testimony to such matters as he pleases, can make any difference.

The prosecution called a witness, Hopper, to impeach and contradict defendant's witness C. D. Boyden, whose brother was accused jointly with defendant. Boyden had said that he did not attempt to get money from Hopper for Long to get away with, in order to save his brother. Hopper testified that Boyden tried to get money for Long to get away with, but did not say that it was to save his brother. The district attorney was then allowed, defendant objecting, to impeach him by asking if he had not testified differently on the Long trial, and proceeded to read for that purpose what purported to be his evidence given at the Long trial. This was error. A witness, whichever party calls him, cannot be impeached unless he has given testimony against the impeaching party. This witness had not testified against the prosecution. He simply failed to testify to a fact which the district attorney thought he could prove by him. The defense had not proven or attempted to prove any statements made by Boyden to Hopper. Boyden's testimony on the subject was brought out on cross-examination. The impeaching statements were evidently desired as evidence. If such testimony were admissible, it would be easy to manufacture evidence of that kind. If a witness merely fails to testify as expected, that does not authorize the party calling him to prove that the witness had elsewhere made the desired statements. It is only when he has given damaging testimony that he can be impeached. People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 384. Many other points are made by appellant, some of which are at least debatable. They are mostly in regard to attempts at impeachment, or comparatively unimportant matters, decision of which would not be of importance on a retrial of the cause. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a retrial had.

We concur: Foote, C.; Fitzgerald, C.

De Haven, J. I concur in the judgment, and in the foregoing opinion of Commissioner Temple, except that part which holds that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to certain evidence given by the witness Morin. The defendant was permitted to introduce in evidence, without objection, the confession of Long to the effect that he (Long) was the person who committed the murder for which defendant was being tried, and that he obtained from Morin the pistol with which the killing was done. This admission or confession of Long was not competent evidence in favor of defendant. It was only hearsay. Smith v. State, 9 Ala. 994; Sharp v. State, 6 Tex. App. 650; Rhea v. State, 10 Yerg. 258; Daniel v. State, 65 Ga. 199; Kelly v. State, 82 Ga. 444, 9 S. E. Rep. 171. But the confession being in evidence, and the defendant insisting upon its truth, there was no error of which defendant can complain in admitting the testimony of Morin to the effect that he did not loan or give Long a pistol, as it tended in some slight degree to disprove the truth of the alleged confession.

In re Wood's Estate. (No. 18,051.)

Order Appointing Administrator—Stay on Appeal—Exigencies of Estate.

On appeal from an order appointing an administrator the undertaking provided for by Code Civil Proc. § 941, stays all further proceedings upon the "order appealed from or the matters embraced therein," such appeal not being within the exceptions mentioned in sections 942–945, 949, where appellants are required to perform the directions of the order appealed from; and hence the administrator will be restrained from performing any acts as such, loss to the estate in consequence thereof being avoidable by the appointment of a special administrator under section 1411. Pennie v. Superior Court, 26 Pac. Rep. 617, 89 Cal. 31, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

In the matter of the appointment of administrator of the estate of James A. Wood, deceased. From an order issuing letters of administration to George Bronner, C. M. West appeals, and moves for a stay of proceedings pending appeal. Motion granted.

Holl & Dunn, for appellant. Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for respondent.

McFarland, J. There was a contest in the court below between C. M. West and George Bronner, as public administrator, for letters of administration of this estate, which was decided in favor of the latter. West appealed from the order appointing Bronner administrator, giving an undertaking on appeal in the sum of $300, as provided for in section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but Bronner is proceeding to administer the estate, and the matter now before us is an application by West for an order staying all proceedings until the determination of the appeal. The undertaking provided for by section 941 "stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein," except in those cases specified in sections 942–945, and a few special matters mentioned in section 949, not material here. See sections 946–949. But appellant here is not within the said sections from 942 to 945, which "apply to appellants who are required to perform the directions of the judgment or order appealed from." Estate of Schedel, 69 Cal.

241, 10 Pac. Rep. 334. The case at bar cannot be distinguished in principle from Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. Rep. 617, in which we held that on an appeal by one claiming to be the heir from an order directing the administrator to pay family allowance to another person, a $300 undertaking stayed all proceedings on the order. And it is quite clear that every act which the respondent might undertake to do as administrator of this estate would be "upon the order appealed from and upon the matters embraced therein." If, as suggested by respondent, there be any danger of loss to the estate from a stay of proceedings, such danger can be avoided by the appointment of a special administrator under section 1411. The motion for a stay of proceedings is granted, and the respondent, Bronner, is restrained from doing any act as administrator of said estate during the pendency of the appeal.

In re BARRY. (No. 14,865.)

CONTEMPT—JUDGMENT—ENTRY OF SECOND JUDGMENT—ISSUE OF EXECUTION.

A judgment that defendant be imprisoned for contempt five days, and pay a fine of $500, with the alternative of imprisonment at $2 per day, is final; and the court cannot, at the expiration of the five days, enter another judgment for the fine, and issue execution thereon.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

James H. Barry was convicted of contempt, and sentenced to imprisonment and fine, with alternative of further imprisonment. From an order refusing to quash an execution issued on a second judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant. William S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The appellant was found guilty of contempt, and sentenced to serve a term of five days in the county jail, and at the end of said term to pay a fine of $500, with the usual alternative of imprisonment at the rate of $2 per day. Thereafter, it appearing to the court that the term of imprisonment had expired, and that no part of the fine had been paid, a judgment was entered against Barry for $500 and costs, and directing that execution issue therefor. A motion was made in the court below to quash the writ; the motion was denied, and this is an appeal from the order. The second judgment referred to was annulled here in an original proceeding by certiorari. Barry v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 486, 27 Pac. Rep. 763. In the opinion therein filed we said: "The first judgment was final, and the only authority of the court thereafter, in the matter concluded thereby, was the power to enforce the judgment according to its terms, so far as it was capable of enforcement." The only portion of the judgment capable of enforcement, according to its terms, was the term of imprisonment. Whether an execution could be issued on the first judgment we are not called upon to determine. It is clear that the execution issued upon the second judgment fell with the judgment itself. Order reversed.

NORTON v. WALSH et al. (No. 12,824.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1892.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—PARTIES IN INTEREST.

In an action to quiet title by J., in her own right, against herself as administratrix of F., and against his heirs, J. having died, N., as her successor in interest, was substituted as plaintiff, and then, having purchased the interest of the heirs, he was substituted as defendant in their place, and a judgment was rendered against a substituted administratrix. Held, that one claiming a transfer from one of the heirs of some rents and profits accruing from the land could not be a proper party to the action, and therefore his appeal, and that of the heirs who had no interest, should be dismissed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; OLIVER P. EVANS, Judge.

Action by John Norton against Alice Walsh and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain of defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

R. Percy Wright and Theodore Bradley, for appellants. E. F. Preston, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was instituted originally by Jane Fitzpatrick, in her own right, against herself as administratrix of the estate of her husband, John Fitzpatrick, deceased, and his heirs at law, two daughters by a former marriage, and their husbands. To say the least, this effort to contend on one side for individual rights, and upon the other for those of a trustee, by the same person, inconsistent and opposed to each other as they are, is irregular, and not to be upheld. The action is to quiet the title of the plaintiff to a certain piece of land, which she claimed as her own separate property, and which, on the other side, was claimed to be community property. The court below made findings which sustained the contention of the plaintiff. Before the judgment was entered, Jane Fitzpatrick died, and the present plaintiff, as her successor in interest, was substituted as plaintiff. The next thing done, upon motion, was an order substituting this same Norton as defendant, in the place of the two daughters of John Fitzpatrick and their husbands; he, Norton, as it appears from a bill of exceptions filed herein, having bought out the heirs of John Fitzpatrick in this land, and taken their conveyances. Thus it would seem that their interest became his, and he had no cause of action against them upon which he could demand judgment. Properly they were dropped from the case, and had no further concern with it, so far as affected Norton. But it also appears in this bill of exceptions that one R. Percy Wright, the attorney for one of the heirs at law, claimed to have a transfer of some rents and profits accruing from the land in controversy from Kate Kelly, one of the defendants. It also appears that whatever claim Wright had was entirely unknown to Norton, when he took a conveyance to the land from the heirs at law, and he was therefore an innocent purchaser for value. The evidence is very meager as to whether Wright had any claim at all, but, even if he had as to the rents and profits, it is not perceived how he could become a proper party to this action. The judgment which was afterwards rendered in the case is not against any of the appellants here; it is against Kate Kelly Hiland, substituted administratrix for Jane Fitzpatrick, the former administratrix of John Fitzpatrick, and the estate of John Fitzpatrick, and those claiming under Kate Kelly Hiland in her representative capacity and "through the said estate." The appeal from the judgment is taken by R. Percy Wright, (who, as we have seen, is not a proper party to the cause,) and by the heirs at law and their husbands, none of whom are aggrieved or affected by the judgment. The other appeal is from an order denying a new trial, and is taken by the heirs at law and their husbands above mentioned. They have no interest in the controversy, and R. Percy Wright has no right to appeal through them. The only party against whom the judgment is given and made—the administratrix of the estate of John Fitzpatrick—prosecutes no appeal. It follows that these appeals have no place here, and should be dismissed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeals are dismissed.

McCOY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,091.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1892.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES — STOCK KILLING CASES — MAINTAINING FENCES.

1. One who has a license from the lessee of land to pasture his sheep thereon cannot recover of a railroad company for sheep which pass onto the track, through an opening made by the lessee for his accommodation in the fence, which had been erected by the company under the provision of Civil Code, § 485, requiring railroad companies to fence their track.

2. If the lessee made the opening in the fence with the consent of the company, and on its agreement to put in a gate, it would be liable for loss occurring after it had failed to do so within a reasonable time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; C. P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Action by one McCoy against the Southern Pacific Company for sheep killed on defendant's track. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chipman & Garter, (S. C. Denson, of counsel,) for appellant. John F. Ellison and A. M. McCoy, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint alleges that plaintiff's sheep were lawfully grazing in a certain field through which the road of defendant runs, and that, by reason of the failure of defendant to construct and maintain a good and sufficient fence along the line of its road at that point, the sheep strayed upon defendant's road, and were killed by the passing cars. This action is to recover damages for the loss of such sheep. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court, and the defendant appeals. The evidence upon the trial tended to show that the land from which the sheep strayed was at the time in the possession of Boyd Bros., as lessees for a term of years, and that plaintiff's sheep were being pastured there, under an agreement with the Boyd Bros. by which the plaintiff bought the stubble and feed standing in the field, with the privilege of herding or keeping his sheep on the stubble until it should be "fed off" by the sheep. In substance, the contract was for pasturage, the plaintiff undertaking to herd and look out for his sheep while they were on the land. The defendant constructed a sufficient fence along that portion of its road passing through the field in question, but prior to the time plaintiff obtained the right to thus pasture his sheep in the field, the Boyd Bros., for their own convenience in driving in and out of the field, made and left an opening in the fence by removing a panel therefrom, and the fence was in this condition when plaintiff's sheep were put in the field, and the Boyd Bros. continued thereafter to drive through this open gap with their teams as they had done before, and it was through the breach thus made in the fence by the Boyds that plaintiff's sheep strayed upon the track of defendant. Upon the trial it was claimed by plaintiff that the Boyd Bros. took the panel out with the consent of defendant, and that defendant agreed to replace the same with a gate, while, upon the other hand, the defendant insists that it gave no such consent, and made no such agreement.

1. Section 485 of the Civil Code provides: "Railroad corporations must make and maintain a good and sufficient fence on either or both sides of their track and property. In case they do not make and maintain such fence, if their engine or cars shall kill or maim any cattle or other domestic animals upon their line of road which passes through or along the property of the owner thereof, they must pay the owner of such cattle or other domestic animals a fair market price for the same, unless it occurred through the neglect or fault of the owners of the animal so killed or maimed." The defendant complied with this statutory duty, so far as concerns the Boyd Bros., when it constructed the fence along the line of the road passing through the land occupied by them, and if, thereafter, they removed a panel from such fence for their own convenience, they would not be heard to complain if their own stock had strayed through the opening thus made onto the track of defendant and been injured. In such a case the loss would be attributed to their own fault, and the defendant would be exonerated from liability therefor by the very terms of the statute just quoted. We do not think that plaintiff occupies any more favorable position. The right which he had to pasture his sheep in the field from which they strayed was nothing more than a license, and its license did not confer upon him any rights as against the defendant which his licensors themselves did not possess. The question whether a subsequent grantee or lessee of this land could recover from defendant, if by reason of its failure to repair this fence the stock of such grantee or lessee should be injured by the cars of defendant, does not arise in this case. The Boyd Bros. were at all times in the possession, occupation, and rightful control of the field from which plaintiff's sheep escaped, as lessees, and as such continued to use the opening which they had made in this fence, and they could not, by giving plaintiff permission to turn his sheep into such field, impose upon defendant any new duty with respect to this fence, or expose it to liability for damages, such as here claimed, by one who is in privity with them. As the plaintiff here was there with his sheep only by their license, he must be deemed to stand in the place of the Boyds, and possessed only of such rights as they could have enforced against defendant if they, instead of plaintiff, had owned the sheep killed on defendant's track.

2. The court did not err in refusing the instructions requested by defendant. The sixth instruction, as requested, was indefinite, and, if given, would have laid down no rule for the jury to observe, and the third does not correctly state the law which would be applicable to the case if it were shown that the Boyd Bros. removed the panel with the consent of the defendant, and upon its agreement to replace it with a gate. In such a case it would be the duty of the defendant to put up the gate within a reasonable time, and if it failed do do so it would be liable for any loss of stock occasioned by such neglect, precisely as if it had left the opening without the consent of the adjoining owner when it constructed the fence. As the case is to be remanded for a new trial, it is proper to say that, in order to prove that defendant agreed to put in a gate, it must be shown that the person assuming to act for it had authority, either actual or ostensible, to act for it in the matter, or that his agreement was subsequently ratified by defendant. The third instruction given by the court, at the request of plaintiff, when read, as it must be, with reference to the evidence in the case, is in conflict with the law as declared in this opinion, and in giving it the court committed error. The other points made do not require special mention.

Judgment and order reversed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal and in the opinion of DE HAVEN, J., with this exception: I think that the sixth instruction asked by defendant should have been given. It told the jury, substantially, that plaintiff had no greater rights than the Boyds would have had if their sheep had escaped through the opening in the fence and been killed. Of course, the jury should have been further instructed what, in the event supposed, the Boyds' rights would have been; but the instruction, as far as it went, was, in my opinion, correct. Whether or not the statute was intended for the protection of the public generally is a question which does not arise in this case. If a passenger were suing for damages from an accident caused by animals on the track, then such question would be presented. "Through or along the property of the owner thereof" certainly does not include a person who has a mere temporary license to have his stock eat stubble when his licensor maintains the opening. If so, then it would include the horses of a guest turned out for a day or two to graze. The Boyds were the owners of the property within the meaning of the statute. If the doctrine of the judgment of the lower court were to prevail, then a railroad company could never with safety give to any adjoining landowner the accommodation that was given to the Boyds.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of DE HAVEN, J. The superior court did not err in refusing to give the instructions asked by the defendant in the form in which they were put, for they did not state clearly or accurately the proposition of law upon which the defense rests, but certainly it was error to give the third instruction requested by plaintiff unqualified by any statement of the proposition that the plaintiff, if a mere licensee of Boyd Bros., could not recover for his loss if they made and maintained the opening in the fence for their own convenience. The evidence in the case very clearly shows that the defendant had fully performed its duty by the erection of a sufficient fence, and that Boyd Bros. subsequently removed a panel for their own convenience. To counteract the effect of this proof, an attempt was made to show that defendant had agreed to close the gap by putting in a gate. But, in my opinion, there was no evidence to justify a finding that the defendant ever made any such agreement. There was evidence that Daly, a section boss, promised to put in a gate, but no evidence that he had any authority to make such agreement in behalf of the defendant. No actual authority was shown, nor any circumstance from which an actual authority can be inferred, and his ostensible authority to bind the defendant did not extend to a matter as to which the obligation rested exclusively upon Boyd Bros., and in no degree upon the defendant.

YANCY v. MORTON. (No. 14,604.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 24, 1892.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — FORECLOSURE — PLEADING — BUILDING CONTRACTS — VALIDITY — PAYMENTS — DESCRIPTION OF LOT — RECORDING — ESTOPPEL.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1183, 1184, providing that, when a contract for the construction of a building is void for any of the reasons therein enumerated, materials shall be deemed to have been furnished at the special request of the owner, and the building shall be subject to a lien for the same, a material man suing to foreclose a lien need not plead the construction contract and its invalidity, but may plead that the goods were sold at the special request of the owner of the building, the contract and its invalidity being matters of evidence.

2. Where a partnership furnishes the material, the owner of the building is estopped from defending on the ground that the partnership is illegal.

3. Under section 1184, requiring inter alia that at least 25 per cent. of the contract price for the construction of a building shall be made payable at least 35 days after completion of contract, and declaring that the contract shall be void if it does not conform substantially with the provisions of the section, it does not affect the validity of the contract that, after providing for such retention, payment before the expiration of the 35 days is allowed if the contractor shows receipts and give bonds that all bills be paid, and that no claims exist against the premises.

4. There being no requirement that the contract contain a description of the land, omission to do so does not invalidate it.

5. Under the provision of section 1183, that the contract be filed in the recorder's office, omission to file the drawings and specifications, which the contract recites are thereunto annexed, and which it provides are intended to cooperate with and supplement the contract, will render the contract void.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by T. G. Yancy against Peter Morton to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Terry and G. B. Graham, for appellant. Church & Cory, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. Action by material men to foreclose a lien for material furnished in the erection of a building. This appeal is by defendant from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. Poore and Anton, as original contractors, agreed to erect a building for defendant for the sum of $2,700. Prior to the completion of the contract they abandoned the work, and plaintiff now brings this action against the owner of the building for the value of the material furnished, claiming that the contract was absolutely void, because (1) 25 per cent. of the contract price was not to be retained 35 days after the completion of the building; (2) because the contract contained no description of the property; (3) because the drawings were made a part of the contract, and were not attached to and filed with it in the recorder's office. Appellant also complains that the contractors were not joined as codefendants. While they were proper parties to the action, it does not appear that they were necessary parties, and, if the defendant desired to have them joined as codefendants, he should have made application to the court for such an order. In Lumber Co. v. Garrettson, 87 Cal. 596, 25 Pac. Rep. 747, this court declared: "Lastly, it is said that there is no judgment against the parties personally liable, and that such judgment is necessary to support the lien. We know of no law or decision supporting this position." See, also, Green v. Clifford, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 331. The complaint in this case is upon a contract for the value of goods sold at the special instance and request of defendant. Sections 1183, 1184, of the Code of Civil Procedure provide that, when the contract between the parties for any of the reasons therein enumerated is void, materials shall be deemed to have been furnished at the special instance and request of the owner, and the building is subject to a lien for the same. In support of his complaint plaintiff introduced the contract in evidence, for the purpose of showing that it was void. The court found such to be the fact, and the evidence and findings were justified under the complaint. No substantial reason is suggested to us why the necessity existed for plaintiff to set out the contract and then allege its invalidity. Such matters were matters of evidence, and the completeness of the pleading did not demand it.

It is alleged that the San Joaquin Lumber Company, the assignor of the plaintiff, is a copartnership formed from the Hanford Lumber Company and the Puget Sound Lumber Company, (corporations.) The legality of the formation of the partnership is attacked by defendant, but under the principles of Irrigation Co. v. Warner, 72 Cal. 383, 14 Pac. Rep. 37, and cases there cited, the defendant is estopped from making such defense. It is there decided that "when one has contracted with an alleged corporation, and is sued for failure to perform his contract, he cannot be heard to say that the corporation had no existence, and for that reason no contract was made." Was the contract in this case between the owner and the contractors void? It provided that 35 days after the completion of the building the balance (25 per cent.) of the contract price should be paid, "provided that payment may be made at any time between the date of completion and the said thirty five days in case said contractors show receipts and give special bonds that all bills will be paid, and that no liens or other claims exist against said premises; such payment to be optional with the owner." It would seem that the foregoing provision of the contract is in substantial conformity with the requirement of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the section in terms only requires a substantial compliance in this regard. The proviso found in this contract was undoubtedly inserted for the benefit of the contractor; yet, at the same time, it was in no way detrimental to the interests of any prospective lien claimant, for the section expressly so provides. See Lumber Co. v. Wooldredge, 90 Cal. 579, 27 Pac. Rep. 431. Neither was the contract void by reason of its not containing a description of the property upon which the building was to be erected. The statute does not require it. Lumber Co. v. Wooldredge, supra.

We think the remaining objection to the validity of the contract well taken. It is mandatory that the contract should be filed in the recorder's office. This contract provides for the erection of a building "conformable to the drawings and specifications made by James Seadler, architect, and signed by the parties, and hereunto annexed, within the time aforesaid." And again it is provided therein "the specfications and drawings are intended to co-operate, so that any works exhibited in the drawings and not mentioned in the specifications, or vice versa, are to be executed the same as if they were mentioned in the specifications set forth in the drawing to be the true meaning and intention of said drawing and specifications." It is thus apparent that the drawings were made a part of the contract, and an essential part of it. It is recited in the contract that they are signed and attached thereto, but such seems not to be the fact. It follows that the contract in its entirety was never recorded, and it is therefore void. Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412, directly supports these views. See, also, Worden v. Hammond, 37 Cal. 61. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

BEAN v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO. (No. 14,682.)

ACTION ON ACCIDENT POLICY—PLEADING—DAMAGES.

1. Where plaintiff, in an action on an accident insurance policy, alleged that he gave affirmative proof of injury and disablement, as required by the policy, an answer admitting the giving of "what purported to be his affirmative proof," but denying that it was "affirmative proof," without specifying the defect, is an objection to form merely, and operates as a waiver of the defect.

2. Insurance, "under classification preferred, (being a capitalist by occupation,)" from "bodily injuries" causing total "disablement from transacting every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated," covers total disablement from transacting any business.

3. Where the insurance under an accident policy is a sum certain, provided the assured "recover no more than the money value of his time," the indemnity covers all loss by injury insured against, including the value of his time outside of his regular employment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by C. F. Bean against the Travelers' Insurance Company, to recover on an accident insurance policy. To a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing defendant's motion for new trial, defendant excepts, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Howard, for appellant. Johnston & Borden and Shelden & Borden, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment, and order refusing a new trial. This is an action upon an accident insurance policy. In his complaint, the plaintiff, after setting out the contract of insurance and his injury, avers that, "within three months of the time of such accident, plaintiff furnished unto the defendant affirmative proof of his said injury, and of the duration of his disability." The answer "admits that the plaintiff furnished defendant with what purported to be his affirmative proof at the time alleged in the complaint, but defendant denies that the same amounted to affirmative proof of the duration of his alleged disability." The policy required written notice to be given of any injury, and provided: "Unless affirmative proof of death, or loss of limb or sight, or of duration of disability, is so furnished within seven months from the time of such accident, all claims based thereon shall be forfeited to the company." At the trial plaintiff showed that his proof was made out on blanks furnished by the defendant, and with the advice of Dr. Ross, local examining surgeon of the defendant, and by him declared sufficient, but did not offer the papers themselves in evidence. Motion for nonsuit was made for alleged insufficiency of the evidence in this respect, and the same objection was urged on motion for a new trial, and is repeated here.

I think there are several reasons why this contention on the part of the appellant cannot be sustained: First, there is no sufficient denial. To admit that proof was made, and then to assert that it did not amount to affirmative proof, is but to state a legal conclusion,—the mere opinion of the pleader. If the defect were sufficiently material, it could have denied the allegation that the preliminary proof was made, or could have stated, with its denial, just what was done. But if the objection was merely as to the form of the proof,—that it was negative rather than affirmative,—meaning that the injury or disability was stated inferentially, and not directly, it is obvious that in this particular case such a defect might have been remedied, and, not having been specified by the defendant, was waived. The defendant, by its policy issued to plaintiff, insured him, "under classification preferred, (being a capitalist by occupation,) * * * in the sum of fifty dollars per week, against loss of time, not exceeding 26 consecutive weeks, resulting from bodily injuries * * * which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his occupation above stated." The policy also provides that, if the insured is injured in any other occupation or exposure classed by the company as more hazardous than that stated, his insurance shall be only for such sums as the premium paid by him will purchase at the rates fixed for such increased hazard. In the conditions it was stated that no claim for indemnity in excess of the money value of the insured's time should be valid. In the statement on motion for a new trial there is no attempt to set out the evidence which shows the disability, but its effect is thus summarized: "The plaintiff proved that he had sustained the accidents and injuries in mode and manner substantially as set forth in his complaint, (except that the second accident therein alleged was shown to have taken place on August 30, 1889, instead of August 16, 1889,) and plaintiff also proved that he had, in consequence of said accidents and injuries, been totally disabled from transacting any business for the period of twenty-six weeks next ensuing said accidents." It does not appear, in any way, that there was evidence conflicting with plaintiff's, the effect of which is thus stated. While it cannot be taken that this statement was agreed to, we have no alternative but to conclude that appellant concedes that plaintiff's testimony on that subject was satisfactory, and that it did not put in evidence which raised a substantial conflict, or its counsel would have had the evidence set out in the record. The record discloses, however, that appellant did object to testimony of plaintiff in regard to his occupation and services in the superintendence and cultivation of his orange orchard at his home place, on the ground that it was immaterial. The objection was overruled, but it does not appear that any evidence in regard to the matter was received after the objection. Whether the rulings were right or wrong, therefore, it does not appear that there was injury.

The appellant objects to certain instructions given at the instance of plaintiff. By the first the jury was told that if plaintiff's occupation was such a business as a person classed as a capitalist might reasonably follow, and if plaintiff was immediately and wholly disabled from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to his said occupation, the verdict should be for him; and, by the second, that the fact that he is described as a capitalist was to be regarded as the class in which he was insured, but not as necessarily determining his occupation, for the purpose of deciding whether or not he was totally disabled. Capitalists may follow various occupations, and if plaintiff was injured while pursuing any occupation not more hazardous than is usual among men classed as capitalists, and so injured as to deprive him of the ability to transact any business which a capitalist might reasonably be expected to follow, they should find for plaintiff. That these instructions are erroneous is, I think, quite patent. The policy does not, as the instruction assumes, class the plaintiff as a capitalist; it simply insures him in a preferred class, because he is a capitalist by occupation, which is a very different matter. One engaged, personally, in the manufacture of dynamite, may own the plant with which he is working. Therefore, since he owns property employed in productive industry, he is a capitalist. But he is not a capitalist by occupation. Especially where the classification is by an insurance company for the purpose of discriminating employments more or less hazardous, and fixing insurance rates in proportion to hazard. And, when the court told the jury that the occupation was not to be used to determine whether plaintiff was totally disabled from transacting any kind of business in which he was engaged, it was against the express provision of the policy, which, to entitle him to recover, requires that he be totally disabled from transacting any business pertaining to the occupation of capitalist. The court went even further, and told the jury that the plaintiff might recover if totally disabled from transacting any business which a person classed as a capitalist might reasonably be expected to follow. I know of no business which a capitalist might not as reasonably be expected to follow as any one else. This, at one stroke, swept away the classification, in accordance with which the insurance was graded. It was impossible to get further from the stipulations of the contract. But is it at all material? These instructions all go simply to the question whether the plaintiff was so injured that he could recover upon the policy. The evidence upon this subject was all for the plaintiff, and proved, without conflict, that plaintiff was totally disabled from transacting any business. The whole must include the parts; therefore plaintiff was disabled from transacting any business as a capitalist. And upon this proposition it does not appear that at the trial there was any controversy. However instructed, therefore, the jury could not conclude otherwise than they did, and appellant is not injured.

One of the grounds upon which the defendant moved for a new trial was that there was no evidence as to the value of plaintiff's time as a capitalist; and the statement shows that there was none, except upon the theory adopted by the court, that the business of taking care of his orchard, buying and selling land, locating and surveying land, and superintending the development of water, being such occupations as a capitalist might reasonably be expected to follow, were occupations as a capitalist. There were other instructions, which are duly excepted to by appellant, in which this idea is explained and insisted upon. The only objection to the testimony upon this subject was that it did not tend to find the value of plaintiff's services in the occupation of a capitalist. To the same effect is the specification of the insufficiency of the evidence. Was it essential, in respect to this question, for the plaintiff to prove the value of his time in the occupation named? I do not find it so nominated in the bond. On the other hand, I find that he may recover $50 per week, provided he shall recover no more than the money value of his time; not what his time was worth in the occupation named; nor do I think any such qualification was intended. It was merely that he could not make money by being hurt. Such a condition affords some security to the company against fraudulent claims, as much under the construction I have given it as the other. To simulate injury, and refrain from work, cannot be made profitable. It could not have been supposed that the insured might not transact any business not included in his general occupation. That he might be injured while transacting other business is provided for in the policy; and he is not precluded from recovery thereby, but his insurance is calculated at a different rate. Any one rendered unable to transact business may suffer loss, and his time may be of value outside of his regular employment. As the insurance was meant to indemnify the insured for the loss of his time in consequence of his injury, there is no reason why it should not include this. Such construction seems to effectuate the presumed intent of both parties, and is in consonance with the language of the policy.

The other exceptions seem utterly immaterial. There was no evidence which tended to show that plaintiff was injured in an occupation more hazardous than that named. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

BYRNE et al. v. BYRNE, (MCGRATH, Intervener. No. 14,567.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—ACTION BY ADMINISTRATRIX PERSONALLY.

Where plaintiff, who was also administratrix of her deceased father's estate, joined with the other children in an action against herself in that capacity, and as such suffered judgment to be entered against her by default, an objection by an intervening creditor, whose claim against the estate has been allowed, that decedent's estate was not competently represented, is valid. Brown v. Mann, 12 Pac. Rep. 51, 71 Cal. 192, applied.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court of Nevada county; J. CALDWELL, Judge.

Action by Mary F. Byrne and others against Mary F. Byrne, administratrix of Michael Byrne, deceased, defendant; B. McGrath, intervener as to the property in certain money recovered under a judgment by default against defendant. From a judgment on the minutes in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. J. Ridge, for appellant. A. D. Mason, A. B. Dibble, and C. W. Kitts, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. A striking peculiarity of the action is that the same person—Mary F. Byrne—is both plaintiff and defendant. In her simple, nonofficial character she sues herself as administratrix of the estate of her deceased father. As plaintiff, she actively prosecuted the action, giving material and important testimony for plaintiffs. As defendant, she failed to answer or demur, and her default was duly entered. Judgment was rendered in her favor as plaintiff, and against her as defendant. The effect of the judgment is to give her and her coplaintiffs $1,700, which, in her character of administratrix, she had received as the property of the estate of her father, and represented to be such in all her proceedings as administratrix from January, 1888, until May, 1890. Whether the money recovered by the judgment was the property of the estate of Michael Byrne or the property of the plaintiffs was the main issue tried; and this issue was raised by the pleading of the intervener, McGrath, a creditor of the estate, whose claim had been allowed, and who alone appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs—five in number—are the children of Michael Byrne and his wife, Mary F. Byrne, both deceased. The complaint alleges that on January 12, 1878, Mary F. Byrne, plaintiff's mother, executed her last will, whereby she devised and bequeathed to her husband, Michael Byrne, all her separate real and personal property, in trust, for the use, benefit, support, maintenance, and education of her children (the plaintiffs) or the survivor or survivors of them, and appointed Michael Byrne executor thereof; and that thereafter, on January 20, 1878, she died. It was found by the court that Michael Byrne was appointed executor, accepted the trust, and took possession of all the estate of the testatrix. No copy of the will appears in the transcript, nor does it appear what property the testatrix owned at the time of her death, nor what of her property came to the possession of her husband after her death, except that the court found he received $2,500 from her estate, which he invested in a drug store on January 1, 1884, in his own name, and thereafter conducted the store as his own property until December 7, 1887, when he died. On January 15, 1888, the plaintiff, Mary F. Byrne, was appointed administratrix of his estate. In her verified petition for letters of administration she stated that the drug store was a part of the estate of the decedent, and as such entered it in her inventory of the estate, and had it appraised. In her petition for a family allowance, and for an order allowing her to replenish the stock and to continue the business of the drug store, she represented the drug store to be a part of the estate. A family allowance of $1,800 was made, and taken principally from the drug store. By order of the court she was allowed to replenish the stock of the drug store on the credit of the estate, and to carry on business until May 23, 1890, when, on her petition, the whole stock was sold by order of court, as the property of the estate, for the sum of $1,700, which sum is the subject of contest in this action. The estate is still in debt for stock of drug store purchased by decedent in his lifetime, and also in the sum of $2,000 for stock purchased by the administratrix, and is insolvent. There was no demurrer to the complaint; but at the commencement of the trial the intervener, who claimed that the drug store was the property of the estate, and subject to the debts thereof, objected to any and all evidence offered by plaintiffs, on the ground that the complaint stated no cause of action upon which the plaintiffs were entitled to any relief whatever, because Mary F. Byrne was both plaintiff and defendant. This objection was overruled by the court, and the trial proceeded.

On his motion for a new trial, the intervener contended (1) that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the $2,500 invested in the drug store, or any part thereof, came from the estate of Mary F. Byrne, deceased, or was held by Michael Byrne in trust for the use of plaintiffs; (2) that, if said money was originally received from the estate of Mary F. Byrne in trust for plaintiffs, the evidence was insufficient to trace and identify any part thereof in the stock of the drug store at the time of Michael Byrne's death or thereafter. While I am inclined to the opinion that the evidence was not sufficient to distinguish any part of the trust fund from other property of the estate of Michael Byrne at or after the time of the commencement of this action, it is not necessary, in my view of the case, to decide this question, since I think the complaint is insufficient to entitle plaintiffs to any relief whatever. "No one can be both plaintiff and defendant in the same action. A party cannot have a right of action against himself as debtor or tort feasor." Barb. Parties, p. 18; Trustees v. Stewart, 27 Barb. 553; Blaisdell v. Ladd, 14 N. H. 129. "It is a first principle that, in whatever different capacities a person may act, he never can contract with himself, nor maintain an action against himself." Eastman v. Wright, 6 Pick. 316. In Brown v. Mann, 71 Cal. 192, 12 Pac. Rep. 51, it appears that Charles Brown, while administrator of Abel Mann, held a mortgage on the land of his intestate, and, for the mere purpose of having it foreclosed, he assigned it to his brother Adolphus, who commenced an action for that purpose, making Charles Brown, as administrator of Mann, a party defendant. A decree of foreclosure was rendered, under which the property was sold. After the sale, and after Charles Brown ceased to be administrator of Mann's estate, Adolphus Brown reassigned the mortgage debt and judgment to Charles Brown, who moved the court to substitute himself as plaintiff, and also to vacate the decree theretofore rendered, and allow him to file a supplemental complaint, making other parties defendant. These motions were granted, and subsequently another decree of foreclosure was rendered, on appeal from which this court said: "The proceedings had after the transfer of the note and mortgage by plaintiff (Charles Brown) to Adolphus Brown, with the suit thereon, must be disregarded, because Charles Brown, being the administrator of the estate of Abel Mann, could not, under the name of Adolphus Brown, have an action for his own benefit against himself as administrator, to foreclose the mortgage. He had ample means in other ways to obtain the benefit of his security. Not until he ceased to be administrator, and was substituted as plaintiff, which was after May 4, 1875, had he, Charles Brown, the plaintiff herein, commenced any proper action to foreclose the mortgage. At that time more than four years had elapsed after the note came due, and the action was barred." According to this opinion, the action at bar could not have been maintained even by the coplaintiffs of Mary F. Byrne, while she was interested with them and remained administratrix of the estate of her father. Therefore it is not a matter of misjoinder of parties plaintiff. The valid objection is that the estate of Michael Byrne, deceased, was not represented by a competent administrator. Mary F. Byrne was a proper party plaintiff, but neither she nor her coplaintiffs could maintain the action, except against a competent representative of Michael Byrne, deceased. For all purposes of this action, the office of administator of Michael Byrne, deceased, must be regarded as though it had been vacant. I think the judgment should be reversed, and that the court below should be instructed to dismiss the action.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Fitzgerald, C.

Kneier v. Watrous. (No. 14,575.)

Trial—Findings—Sufficiency.

Where a complaint charges in the first count that defendant negligently chased plaintiff's mare around a pasture, by reason of which she was injured, and in the second that he chased the said mare about the pasture, until she ran upon a post, and was thereby greatly injured, and the court finds that the defendant did not chase or drive the mare "negligently or at all," and that he did not "damage, hurt, or injure" her, this finding is sufficient to cover the issue as raised by both counts.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by George Kneier against Fred Watrous. From an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Louttit, Woods & Levinsky, for appellant. Baldwin & Campbell, for respondent.

Per Curiam. Plaintiff appeals from order refusing a new trial. The action is to recover the value of a mare, which it is averred on the 26th day of June, 1889, was being pastured for plaintiff at the Learned and Harris ranch, then in charge of one Lowry. Defendant also had a horse there on pasture, and went to the premises to get his animal. Lowry was not at the house, although on the premises, and defendant with his servant went into the pasture, without obtaining actual permission so to do from any one, and drove his horse into the corral for the purpose of catching it. There were several other horses there on pasture besides these two, and some seven or eight went into the corral with defendant's, and were, of course, locked in while he proceeded to catch his horse. In doing this his animal became frightened, and jumped over the fence, and plaintiff's mare, attempting to follow, was killed. The real question in the case is whether defendant is responsible.

The complainant contains two counts. The first charges the defendant with having "negligently chased and drove about" plaintiff's mare, by reason whereof it was injured. The charging part of the second is as follows: "That on or about the said 26th day of June, 1889, the said defendant, without right and against the will and consent of the plaintiff herein, entered into and upon the inclosure and pasture wherein the said bay mare then was, and without right, and against the will and consent of said plaintiff, chased and drove the said mare about the said inclosure and pasture, and into a corral then and there being, and while in said corral chased and drove the said mare about until she, in attempting to escape from the said corral, jumped upon a post then and there standing, and was thereby greatly hurt, damaged, and injured, so that the said bay mare, in consequence of said hurt, damage, and injury, was killed." By stipulation of the attorneys, the answer filed by the defendant was taken and considered as an answer to the amended complaint herein; but it is said that no finding was made upon the issue raised by the allegations of the second count and the denials thereof. The court did find, however, that the defendant did not chase or drive the mare about the inclosure or corral "negligently or at all," and that "the defendant did not damage, hurt, or injure, or cause to be damaged, hurt, or injured, the said mare." It follows, therefore, that the material allegations of the complaint were denied, and that the findings cover the only material issue. There is no appeal from the judgment, and there is no specification of insufficiency of the evidence to support any of the findings, nor is there any specification of error. The order is therefore affirmed.

TAX DEEDS—SUFFICIENCY — ADVERSE POSSESSION —UNINCLOSED LANDS.

1. Where a certificate of tax sale recites that the property was assessed to D., "and to all owners and claimants known and unknown," and the language quoted did not appear in the tax deed, the deed was void, under Pol. Code, § 3786, providing that "the matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the tax deed."

2. Defendants owned uninclosed land, on which various ranchers' cattle grazed at will. Plaintiff held a tax deed for defendant's land, and leased it for five years to M., a rancher, who also grazed his cattle thereon, and under the terms of his lease, to build shelter for "three valuable domestic animals," he built a shed ten feet square, inclosed on three sides, which was intended to be used by plaintiff as evidence of possession. Defendant had no notice of plaintiff's claim or of his lease to M. till about six months before the expiration of the lease, when he undertook to build a house on the land, and was told by the lessee while building the house that he claimed possession. Defendant completed the house, and built a fence on part of the land. After the expiration of M.'s lease, and while defendant and his employe were absent from the house, plaintiff took possession, and forcibly prevented defendant from re-entering. The land was assessed to defendant, who paid the taxes during all the time of the lease. Held, that plaintiff did not have adverse possession, under Code Civil Proc. § 323, providing that, to constitute adverse possession of land not inclosed, it must have been used for "purposes of husbandry, or for pasture, or for ordinary use of the occupant."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action by P. A. De Frieze against Elizabeth Quint, administratrix of Leander Quint, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Payson and Hepburn & Wilkins, for appellant. McKoon & Towle and Geo. W. Towle, Jr., for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet plaintiff's allged title to a tract of swamp and overflowed land containing 91 acres, situated in Marin county. The action was brought against Leander Quint in his lifetime, for whom the administratrix of his estate was substituted before trial. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom, and also from an order denying her motion for new trial. The defendant claimed title by a grant, bargain, and sale deed from plaintiff, reciting a paid consideration of $150, and executed January 18, 1879. The plaintiff claims title by a tax deed executed to him by the tax collector of Marin county on March 1, 1880; and also by prescription, alleging adverse possession under the tax deed during five years before the commencement of the action. The recitals in the tax deed show that the taxes for which the land was sold to plaintiff were state and county taxes assessed to John De Frieze for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, amounting to $1.55, and that the property was sold to plaintiff for this sum, plus costs and charges, altogether amounting to $2.73. The title was not traced to any higher source than the plaintiff, though the description of the land in the deed of January 18, 1879, from plaintiff to defendant, closes as follows: "For more particular description, see patent recorded in Liber A, page 377, of Records of Marin County." The patent referred to was not put in evidence, but in rebuttal plaintiff's counsel read in evidence the description of the land from the record of that patent, which appeared to be the same as that contained in the deed of plaintiff to the defendant, but did not read enough to show who was the patentee. There is nothing in the record tending to prove that John De Frieze was the patentee, or that he ever owned the land in question, except that the tax for which the land was sold was assessed to him. Finally, it does not appear how, or from whom, plaintiff originally acquired title to the land before the date of his deed to defendant; yet he is estopped by his deed to defendant, purporting to grant the absolute title, from denying that, before and at the date of that deed, he had such absolute title, and, by that deed, conveyed it to the defendant, (Belcher, etc., Min. Co. v. Deferrari, 62 Cal. 160; Dodge v. Walley, 22 Cal. 228; Haffley v. Maier, 13 Cal. 13; Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 613;) and it is also clear that, if any title passed by the tax deed, such title would have inured to the benefit of the defendant alone. But it appears that the tax deed was utterly void. The certificate of the tax sale, introduced by plaintiff as a part of his evidence in chief, states that the property was assessed to "John De Frieze, and to all owners and claimants, known and unknown." These words in italics do not appear in the tax deed, as required by section 3786 of the Political Code, although it appears that they were recited in the deed as drawn, but were stricken out before the deed was executed; thus showing that section 3786 of the Political Code was deliberately disregarded. Counsel for respondent contend that the deed alone can be received as evidence of the assessment, and that the certificate of sale put in evidence by plaintiff as a foundation for the deed must be disregarded. In this I think counsel are mistaken. The deed is only "primary" (prima facie) evidence "that the property was assessed as required by law," and this rests on the disputable presumption that the matters recited in the certificate are recited in the deed as required by section 3786 of the Political Code. Here the plaintiff proved by the certificate that the property was not assessed as required by law, before the deed was offered in evidence. Section 3776 of the Political Code requires the certificate to state (when known) "the name of the person assessed," while the deed is required to recite only the matters recited in the certificate. By first introducing the certificate the plaintiff proved, not only that the property was not lawfully assessed, (Daly v. Ah Goon, 64 Cal. 512, 2 Pac. Rep. 401,) but also that the deed did not contain the recitals required by law.

Plaintiff's main reliance, however, is upon title by prescription, arising from his alleged adverse possession. The evidence relied upon to prove adverse possession tended to prove only the following facts: Three years and five months after the execution of the tax deed, to wit, on August 13, 1883, the plaintiff executed to Bernard T. Miller a lease of the land in question for the term of five years, at a rental of $25 per year, the lessee covenanting to construct upon the premises, within 20 days from the date of the lease, "a building suitable to afford protection in winter to at least three valuable domestic animals." At the time of the execution of this lease the land had no improvements upon it, and never had been inclosed, cultivated, nor occupied by any person. The greater portion of it was low, boggy land, but during portions of the year it afforded feed for cattle which had been accustomed to graze upon it. James Miller, the father of the lessee, had a ranch adjoining the leased premises, on the west side thereof, but which was not fenced on that side. "Cattle could roam at will over this land (land in question) from any contiguous land." James Miller kept a dairy and a number of cows on his ranch. About the time that Bernard T. Miller took the lease from plaintiff he also leased from his father, James Miller, the latter's dairy and cows, and thereafter allowed these cows, with others of his own, to graze upon the leased land, but without a herder, except to drive the cows from the land for the purpose of milking, and to return them after milking. The cows were not confined to the leased land, but could graze upon other adjoining land; and there was nothing to prevent the cattle of other persons from grazing upon the leased land. Being asked if other cattle than his own were pastured upon it during the term of the lease, Bernard Miller answered: "They might have been. I cannot say positively. Cattle get back and forth on the ranches once in a while. I could not say positively whether there were or not. * * * I never remembered seeing any cattle on there excepting my own and those I had rented from my father." About a month after the date of the lease, B. F. Miller constructed a shed on the land, sufficient to shelter three cows, by setting a post in the ground at each of the four corners, and covering it with boards, and also boarding up three sides of it, but leaving one side open. This was the only improvement placed upon the land by him or plaintiff, and it does not appear whether the shed was ever used by him or not. During the first four years of the lease he resided about a half mile from the land, but within sight of it, and during the remainder of the term he resided further from the land. It does not appear that he personally attended to the dairy, but does appear that he was absent from it a considerable portion of the time. In the way above described, he used the land in question during a term of five years before the commencement of this action, but in no other way. It does not appear that his lease was recorded, nor that defendant had actual notice of it, or notice that he used or claimed the land for any purpose during the first four and a half years of the alleged adverse possession. About five months before the alleged five years of adverse possession expired the defendant erected a house upon the land, 20 feet long by 12 feet wide, in which his employe resided several weeks immediately after it was built, and it was while this house was being built that Miller first notified defendant that he (Miller) had a lease of the land and claimed the possession of it. Defendant also built a fence on a portion of the line between the land in question and the land of James Miller immediately after building the house. After the expiration of Miller's lease, and while defendant and his employe were absent from the house, the plaintiff took possession of it, and forcibly prevented them from re-entering. The tax deed to plaintiff was recorded March 1, 1880, and the plaintiff paid the taxes on the land for the years 1881, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, and 1888, said taxes having been assessed to him for those years; but there is no evidence that defendant had actual notice of the deed, or that plaintiff paid the taxes or claimed the land until after defendant built the house on the land. At no time after the execution of the tax deed was plaintiff in the possession of any part of the land, unless he was so by his tenant, Miller, until he took possession of the house built by defendant, as above stated.

On the facts above described counsel for appellant contend: First. That the tax deed gave plaintiff no color of title because he obtained it in bad faith, and for the mere purpose of creating a sham color of title. Second. That, even conceding that the tax deed gave color of title, the plaintiff never had adverse possession of the land during any period of time. Third. That, conceding adverse possession, it was not continuous during a period of five years, having been interrupted by defendant at the time he built the house and fence on the land five months before the five years' adverse possession was complete. As I think, the second of these positions should be sustained; the first and third need not be considered.

It is contended for respondent, and the court found, that the acts of plaintiff and his lessee, Miller, constituted "adverse possession," as defined in section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which is substantially the same as section 11 of the act of 1850, "defining the time for commencing civil actions," (Hitt. Gen. Laws, art. 4353,) and which, so far as applicable here, is as follows: "For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by any person claiming a title founded upon a written instrument, * * * land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases: * * * (3) Where, although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel or of fencing timber for the purposes of husbandry, or for pasture, or for the ordinary use of the occupant. * * *" It has been uniformly held in this state that, in order to set the statute of limitation in motion against the owner of land, the occupancy thereof must be sufficiently open and notorious to notify an ordinarily prudent owner of its existence, and of its hostile character, unless he is otherwise actually notified of these facts; and, to be available against persons dealing with the owner for the land, the occupancy must be of such a character, at least, as should put them upon inquiry as to the title of the occupant, (Thompson v. Pioche, 44 Cal. 508; Thompson v. Felton, 54 Cal. 547; Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 488; Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 182; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586; Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 457, 12 Pac. Rep. 491;) and the burden of proving all the essential elements of an adverse possession, including its hostile character, is upon the party relying upon it, (American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361; Lick v. Diaz, 30 Cal. 75; Garwood v. Hastings, 38 Cal. 223.) The evidence furnishes no ground for a pretense, even, that defendant ever had actual or express notice that the plaintiff or his lessee had or claimed any kind of possession until about the time that defendant built his house upon the land, which was not more than six months before the alleged period of five years' adverse possession expired. Conceding that what is proven to have been done on the land by plaintiff and his lessee, Miller, constituted any kind of possession which may be regarded as doubtful, such possession was not of such a character as to justify the inference that defendant had notice of its existence, even, much less that it was hostile to his title, until four years and six months of the alleged period of adverse possession had elapsed. The land was uninclosed and uncultivated. No person resided upon it. It was bounded on all sides by uninclosed land, upon which, as well as upon it, the cattle of the neighboring ranchers roamed and grazed without restraint. Defendant had no notice of the lease to Miller, nor that Miller had leased his father's dairy or cows, or controlled any cattle that grazed upon the land except his own. The grazing of his neighbor's cattle upon the land, so long as defendant made no effort to restrain them by inclosure or otherwise, did not indicate to him that his neighbors had or claimed adverse possession of his land. The little shed sufficient to afford shelter to "three valuable domestic animals," say ten feet square and seven feet high, is the only thing relied upon to indicate to defendant that plaintiff or Miller was in possession of the land; and no doubt it was intended to be used as evidence of such possession, and for no other purpose. So important was it considered by the plaintiff that the only visit he made to the land during the term of the lease was for the purpose of ascertaining whether Miller had built it according to the covenant in the lease. Why was this shed required to be sufficient to shelter only three valuable animals? Why is there no evidence that it was ever used for any purpose? It was obviously a mere sham, which should be allowed no effect whatever as evidence of possession. I think the finding of adverse possession of the land in question is not justified by the evidence, and that the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

PINSON v. SCHMALZ. (No. 13,751.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1892.)

ASSUMPSIT—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

Plaintiff, acting as agent for K. & D., shipped in his own name coffee by steamer to defendant, to whom by a previous understanding K. & D. were to ship all their coffee. On the same steamer plaintiff sent a letter directing defendants to hold the coffee to the order of K. & D., and to send plaintiff certain merchandise, "charging me [plaintiff] with the amount to the above-named gentlemen, [K. & D.]" Defendant accounted to K. & D. for the coffee, whereupon plaintiff demanded of him the proceeds of sale. Plaintiff had no interest in or lien on the coffee, and K. & D. were not indebted to him for commissions or any amount except for the cash proceeds of the coffee. Held, that plaintiff could not recover.

Action by H. F. Pinson against William Schmalz. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. M. Miller, for appellant. Nathan Vidaver, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for money had and received for the use of the plaintiff. Judgment for defendant, from which and from an order denying his motion for a new trial the plaintiff appeals. The facts upon which plaintiff's demand is founded are substantially as follows: On July 15, 1888, the plaintiff, then residing at Ocos, Guatemala, shipped to defendant in San Francisco, by steamer, 61 sacks of coffee in his own name as shipper, but for account of Messrs. Kunze & Duran of Guatemala, with whom defendant had dealings and a previous understanding that they were to ship their coffee to him. By the same steamer defendant received from plaintiff, who was then unknown to defendant, the following letter: "Ocos, July 15, 1888. Mr. Wm. Schmalz, San Francisco—My Dear Sir: By steamer of the 14th I sent to you sixty-one sacks of coffee, in gold, in accordance with letter of advice and bill of lading, by the agency of this port. The said lot you will please hold to the order of Messrs. Kunze & Duran, of the Rodeo Co. At the same time I request you to send me by the next steamer the inclosed bill of goods, charging me with the amount to the above-named gentlemen. Please to send me directly this consular invoice and bill of lading. Believe me, yours, truly, H. F. PINSON." After defendant had accounted to Kunze & Duran for the coffee as requested by them, the plaintiff demanded of defendant the proceeds of the sale thereof; and upon the defendant's refusal to accede to this demand, plaintiff commenced this action to recover such proceeds. It is admitted that in shipping the coffee plaintiff acted as the agent of Kunze & Duran, and it is not pretended that he had any interest in or lien upon the coffee, or that Kunze & Duran were indebted to him for commissions, or upon any amount whatever, except for the cash proceeds of the coffee. It appears that defendant did not send plaintiff the goods as requested in the above letter, but it is not pretended that defendant was under any obligation to do so. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

DOLLIVER v. DOLLIVER et al. (No. 13,140.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1892.)

RECORD ON APPEAL—RESCISSION OF CONTRACTS—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. On an appeal from a judgment, taken on the judgment roll alone, if the judgment is supported by the findings made, the failure to find on other issues presented by the pleadings is not ground for reversal unless the record shows that evidence on such issues was offered in the court below, and that a finding thereon from such evidence would countervail the findings actually made, so as to invalidate the judgment; nor does the fact that the court has made findings of fact not within the issues presented by the pleadings invalidate its judgment, if supported by the findings within the issues.

2. A transfer of property, sought to be rescinded, and for which a valuable consideration was falsely recited, was executed by plaintiff to defendant, her husband, to induce him to withdraw a divorce suit instituted by him for the purpose of forcing plaintiff, who was suffering from nervous prostration, to surrender part of her property. The transfer was executed in the presence of defendant and his attorney, and plaintiff had no independent advice as to the effect thereof. Held, that the transfer was executed under undue influence, within Civil Code, § 1575, and should be rescinded.

3. The pendency of a divorce suit does not affect the confidential relation existing between husband and wife, so as to relieve the husband from the good faith in dealings with his wife required by Civil Code, § 2228, from persons occupying confidential relations.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WM. T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action for the rescission of a transfer and a contract by Mary W. Dolliver against John S. Dolliver and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Dolliver appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, (H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for appellant. M. C. Blake and Wm. M. Pierson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action for the rescission of a contract. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment, bringing the case here upon the judgment roll alone. The court finds that the parties are husband and wife, having been married in 1873, and that the plaintiff at the time of their marriage was the owner of certain real estate as her separate property, at that time of the value of $125,000, and that, after her marriage with the defendant, she acquired certain other property, which was also her separate estate. On the 27th of August, 1885, the defendant abandoned the plaintiff, and thereafter ceased to live with her, and on the evening of that day, after leaving her, he caused her to be served at her residence with a summons and copy of a complaint in a suit for divorce brought by him against her. The court finds that at that time, and for some time previous, the plaintiff was a sufferer from general nervous prostration, and that the abandonment by the defendant and the nature of the charges in the complaint for divorce caused her great agitation and distress of mind, and greatly aggravated her bodily infirmity, and that, while so distressed in mind and sick in body, she almost immediately sought out the defendant, and urged him to dismiss the suit and return to her, and that on the 31st of August they met by appointment at the office of Mr. A. N. Drown, who was his attorney, and to whom he introduced the plaintiff, with the statement that they had come to make a settlement. At that interview, certain memoranda of the settlement were prepared by Mr. Drown in the presence of both parties, and signed by them, and on the next day formal instruments of settlement, which in the mean time had been prepared by his attorney, were executed by them. By these instruments the plaintiff made to the defendant her promissory notes amounting to $30,000, and secured their payment by a mortgage upon certain of her real estate, and a memorandum of agreement was signed by both parties, reciting that "all of the property belonging to both of said parties has hitherto been and is now held by Mary W. Dolliver," and that "differences have arisen between said parties relating to such property, and the respective rights of each concerning the same;" and that, "in mutual consideration of the premises," it was agreed by them that the property that day conveyed by him to her should be her separate property, and that the property transferred by her to him, together with the aforesaid promissory notes and mortgage, should be his separate property. It is for the rescission of these agreements, and the restitution of the plaintiff to the property so conveyed, and the surrender of the notes and mortgage, that this action was brought. The court finds that the above recitals in the memorandum of agreement had no foundation in fact; that no property of the defendant had been held by the plaintiff, and that he had no property; that there had been, in point of fact, no differences, in the sense assumed in the memorandum; that the claim set up by the defendant, and which the settlement purported to adjust, was not a bona fide claim on his part; and that the memorandum purported to give to the plaintiff nothing which was not in point of law and fact already hers, and effected nothing for her pecuniary advantage. The court also finds that the abandonment of the plaintiff "was without just cause, was made in bad faith, and the suit instituted by him, ostensibly to obtain a divorce, was brought by him merely to harass and vex the plaintiff, and as a means of coercing her into a surrender to him of a portion of her separate estate, and for no other purpose;" that the matters set forth in his complaint as substantive grounds for divorce were untrue in point of fact, and known by the defendant at the time to be untrue, and that the allegations inserted therein as to the amounts of money which had been turned over by him to his wife were not true in point of fact, and that those amounts were grossly and purposely exaggerated for the purpose of alarming her, and influencing her to make a settlement; that the plaintiff executed the instruments in manner and form as they had been prepared by the attorney for the defendant; that she had no independent advice concerning them, or their legal effect and operation, and did not in fact comprehend their effect, in point of law, upon her property rights; that she was constrained to their execution by considerations of the immunity she hoped to obtain from the personal disgrace apprehended by her from the trial of the suit for divorce upon the charges made against her in the complaint; and that it was under the moral pressure exerted upon her by these various considerations that she acted in executing the said instruments.

1. Upon the record before us, we cannot consider the proposition made on behalf of the appellant that the court has failed to make findings upon certain material issues presented by the pleadings. Upon an appeal from a judgment taken upon the judgment roll alone, if the judgment is supported by the findings which are made, the failure of the court to make findings upon other issues presented by the pleadings is not a ground for reversal, unless it shall appear from the record that evidence was offered upon such issues in the court below, and that a finding thereon from such evidence would countervail the findings actually made to such an extent as to invalidate the judgment. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. Rep. 504. Nor does the fact that the court has made findings of fact which are not within the issues presented by the pleadings invalidate its judgment, if that judgment finds support in the findings which are within the issues, independent of such extraneous findings.

2. An action for the rescission of a contract may be maintained whenever the consent of the party seeking to rescind was obtained through any fraud or undue influence of the other party. Civil Code, § 1689. "Undue influence" is defined in the Civil Code, § 1575, to consist "(1) in the use by one in whom a confidence is reposed by another, or who holds a real or apparent authority over him, of such confidence or authority for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over him; (2) in taking an unfair advantage of another's weakness of mind; or (3) in taking a grossly oppressive and unfair advantage of another's necessities or distress." The plaintiff and defendant were husband and wife, and by virtue of that relation a personal trust and confidence had been created between them, which imposed upon the defendant the obligation of exercising the highest good faith towards the plaintiff in any dealings between them, and precluded him from obtaining any advantage over her by means of any misrepresentation, concealment, or adverse pressure. Civil Code, § 2228. This relation, and the obligation arising from it, were not destroyed by the mere fact that an action for divorce was pending between them. They were still husband and wife, and so long as that relation existed between them the law would not permit any inquiry into the extent of the trust and confidence which is presumed to be placed by one in the other; nor can the husband, by bringing an action for divorce against his wife, divest himself of the obligations which are imposed upon him by virtue of such relation. The suit for divorce was brought by the husband on the 27th of August, under such circumstances as naturally to surprise and distress the wife. They had been living together for many years as husband and wife, and in the exercise and enjoyment of the confidential relations incident thereto. On that day he dined at home with her and the family, together with an invited guest, and immediately after dinner announced to her his intention of abandoning her, and on the same evening caused her to be served with the summons and complaint in the suit for divorce. Instead of resisting the suit, or assenting to its prosecution, she almost immediately sought him out, and urged him to dismiss the action and return to her. Although he at that time refused to do this, the parties within four days after the commencement of the action met by appointment at the office of his attorney to make a "settlement." Instead of insisting that the plaintiff should have the benefit of some independent and disinterested advice, he refrained from calling in any adviser for her, but took upon himself the duty of formulating the instruments by which the "settlement" was to be effected, and had himself the benefit of the presence and advice of his own attorney. The intervention of Mr. Drown in the preparation of the instruments cannot be considered as any protection to the plaintiff. He was the attorney of the defendant, had instituted the suit in his behalf, and was under his professional obligation to protect the interests of his client, and would feel under no obligation to protect the interest of the plaintiff, or to give to her any advice or counsel in reference thereto. The court finds: "In the progress of the settlement, particularly on August 31st, when its precise terms were being formulated, the defendant here had the benefit of the presence and advice of his attorney, Mr. Drown, who in fact instructed him as to the advisability in his interest of a certain important detail of the settlement. The plaintiff here, the wife, in point of fact, upon her part had no advice or assistance of any character in adjusting the terms, nor in the conduct of the negotiations which culminated in the settlement in question." Under these circumstances the husband must be held to have been bound to the exercise of all those duties towards the wife which spring from the existence of the relation between them, and to be subject to that familiar rule in equity "that he who bargains in matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence," and thus precluded from gaining any advantage from the transaction between them. When, therefore, the court found that the transaction was without any pecuniary advantage to the wife; that the husband had received great pecuniary advantage therefrom; that the consideration recited in the instrument of settlement, and upon which it purported to have been made, was untrue; that the suit for divorce had been brought by him as a means of coercing her into a surrender of a portion of her separate estate, and for no other purpose; that it had the effect to aggravate her bodily infirmity; and that she was constrained to execute the instruments of settlement by reason of the moral pressure exerted upon her by the consideration of the effect upon her that would be produced by the prosecution of the suit; and that she had no independent advice concerning the legal effect and operation of said instruments,—its conclusion of law and judgment that the defendant should surrender to the plaintiff all the fruits of said settlement, and that the settlement should be in all respects rescinded, was the necessary result of such findings, and must be affirmed.

3. The objection by the appellant to that portion of the judgment requiring the transfer of the Hyde street lot is without merit. The court finds that after the execution by the plaintiff to the defendant of her promissory notes, aforesaid, he hypothecated them to the Security Savings Bank for a loan of $9,000, and that he applied $6,500 of the money so received by him to the purchase of the Hyde street lot, giving at the same time a mortgage to the vendor for the sum of $6,000 to secure the unpaid portion of the purchase price thereof. The plaintiff had the right, as against the appellant, to an absolute surrender and cancellation of these notes; but, inasmuch as the Security Savings Bank was a bona fide holder of a lien thereon to the extent of $9,000, she had the right, at her option, to follow the proceeds of the notes into the property into which they had been converted. The defendant thereby suffers no injury, as he merely surrenders to the plaintiff the property which he obtained by the unauthorized use of her promissory notes, and the plaintiff can become the owner of the property only by the payment of the unpaid portion of the purchase price for which the property is held in mortgage. For the purpose of sustaining the judgment of the court, we can assume that the defendant was unable or unwilling to redeem the notes from the bank, or that the plaintiff elected to take the property into which the money for whose payment they were held had been converted; and, in the absence of any evidence upon the point, we must also assume that the purchase price of the property was its actual value. The proposition on the part of the appellant that he may be liable to a suit for the unpaid amount of the purchase price is sufficiently answered by the fact that it does not appear from the record that he gave any personal obligation therefor. If the defendant had desired to retain this property as his own, it was at least incumbent on him to offer to return to the plaintiff her promissory notes, freed from the claim of the bank. She was under no obligation to accept in lieu thereof the obligation of the defendant to return them when this lien should be discharged, or to accept the incumbrance on the property as their equivalent.

4. The provision in the judgment in reference to the lots in the "Paul tract" is not prejudicial to the defendant. The terms of the judgment are that he shall execute to her "a good and sufficient deed of all the interest acquired, or claimed to have been acquired, * * * by virtue of any instrument executed by the plaintiff to said defendant on the 31st day of August, 1885, or on the 1st day of September, 1885." The complete terms of the "settlement" between the plaintiff and defendant are not found by the court, and the allegation of the plaintiff that she signed other instruments than those set forth in the complaint is not denied. If the defendant did not acquire any interest in the "Paul tract" lots by virtue of any instrument executed on either of those days, he can suffer no injury by a compliance with the judgment; and, as the injury to the plaintiff is found by the court to have resulted solely and directly from the wrongful acts of the defendant, it is not for him to complain that the court has required of him as complete restitution as is within his power to make, so long as he sustains no injury or diminution of his estate. The judgment is affirmed.

People v. Hall. (No. 20,895.)

Burglary—Sufficiency of Information—Dying Declarations — Remarks of Counsel — Instructions.

1. Pen. Code, § 459, provides that "every person who enters any house * * * with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary." Held, that an information which alleged that defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously enter a certain dwelling house, * * * with intent then and there to commit grand and petit larceny," etc., was a sufficient charge of burglary, and alleged but one offense.

2. On such information the intent to commit both grand and petit larceny need not be shown.

3. Code Civil Proc. § 1870, subd. 4, which provides that "the act or declaration of a dying person, made under a sense of impending death, respecting the cause of his death," may be given in evidence in a criminal action, applies only where the death of deceased is the subject of the trial; and does not make the dying confession of an accomplice in a burglary admissible on a trial for that offense.

4. A prosecuting attorney may challenge counsel for defendant to explain the evidence in the case "upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt," and then comment on the failure to do so.

5. A court has a right to amend imperfect instructions submitted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; W. H. Grant, Judge.

George Hall was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Head, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Belcher, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 10 months; and the appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The charging part of the information was as follows: "The said George Hall, on or about the 28th day of June, 1891, in the said county of Yolo, state of California, then and there being, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously enter a certain dwelling house, which said dwelling house was then and there the property of one Joseph Glide, with intent then and there to commit grand and petit larceny," etc. The defendant demurred to the information on the grounds: First, that it did not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950–952 of the Penal Code, in that it did not contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended; and also in that it could not be ascertained therefrom what offense was charged; and, second, that it did not conform to the requirements of section 954 of the Penal Code, in that it charged two offenses, namely, an entry with intent to commit grand and petit larceny. The demurrer was overruled, and appellant contends that the ruling was erroneous, because the information, in effect, charged the commission of two burglaries. Under our statute every person who enters any house with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, is guilty of burglary. Pen. Code, § 459. The wrongful entry with intent to commit any of the crimes referred to constitutes the offense, and it is complete when the entry is made, whether the intent be afterwards consummated or not. An entry may be made with intent to commit two or more felonies, but that would constitute only one burglary. People v. Milne, 60 Cal. 71. If another crime were actually committed, then for that another and separate charge should be made. In our opinion, the information conformed with the requirements of the Code, and charged but one offense. The demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

Appellant also contends that, if the information was good, still, in order to justify a conviction, the prosecution should have proved an intent to commit both grand and petit larceny. The evidence is not brought up in the record, and it therefore cannot be ascertained what the proofs in this regard were. The bill of exceptions only states that witnesses were sworn and examined on the part of the prosecution, and "testimony was introduced tending to establish the guilt of said defendant." It will be presumed, therefore, that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict. But, in our opinion, the prosecution needed only to prove that defendant entered the building with intent to commit grand or petit larceny. It was proved that defendant and one Kingsberry were arrested for the alleged burglary at the same time and place and by the same persons, and that while under arrest they attempted to escape, and were fired upon and wounded by one of their captors; that a physician was then sent for to treat their wounds; and that Kingsberry died from the effects of his wounds before any complaint was filed against either of the parties. In his own behalf the defendant offered to prove that, after a careful examination, the physician was satisfied that Kingsberry's wounds were necessarily fatal, and that he so informed him at the time; that Kingsberry admitted to the physician that he fully realized "that he was mortally wounded, and was on the point of death, and had given up all hope of ever getting well; that he was conscious of death; and that, thus having a sense of impending death and without hope of reward, he made a full, free, and complete confession to said physician in relation to this alleged crime, stating that he himself had planned the entire scheme, and that said Hall had nothing to do with it, and was not connected with the guilt, and was in all respects innocent of any criminal act or intent in the matter." This evidence was objected to by the prosecution and excluded by the court, and the ruling is assigned as error. It is claimed that the evidence was admissible as a dying declaration, or, if not as such, then as a confession of guilt of one of the parties to the alleged crime. The Code provides that "the act or declaration of a dying person, made under a sense of impending death, respecting the cause of his death," may be given in evidence in a criminal action. Section 1870, subd. 4, Code Civil Proc. The rule, however, goes no further than to make the declarations admissible where the death of the deceased is the subject of the trial, and the circumstances of the death are the subject of the declaration. Whart. Crim. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 288. "Dying declarations are restricted to the act of the killing, and to the circumstances immediately attending it, and forming a part of the res gestæ." People v. Fong Ah Sing, 64 Cal. 253, 28 Pac. Rep. 233. As the declaration offered in evidence here had no relation to the death of the deceased, it was clearly inadmissible as a dying declaration. And as a confession the evidence was equally inadmissible. The rule is settled beyond controversy that in a prosecution for crime the declaration of another person that he committed the crime is not admissible. Proof of such declarations is mere hearsay evidence, and is always excluded, whether the person making them be dead or not. Whart. Crim. Ev. (9th Ed.) § 225; Greenfield v. People, 85 N. Y. 75; Snow v. State, 58 Ala. 372; Lyon v. State, 22 Ga. 400; Kelly v. State, 82 Ga. 444, 9 S. E. Rep. 171.

The point is made that the district attorney, in his closing argument to the jury, was allowed to go beyond the bounds of propriety, and thereby to prejudice the defendant. He said: "In my opening argument I challenged Mr. Head [counsel for defendant] to explain the facts and circumstances of the case upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt. He did not attempt any explanation. If there had been any other theory on earth by which the circumstances of this case could be explained, Mr. Head would have advanced that theory, and called your attention to it." And again: "There is no theory on the face of the earth—the possession of all this property, and trying to escape from these officers—that he can advance or has advanced." Counsel for defendant objected to these remarks, on the ground that the defendant was not called upon to explain anything; and he went on to argue that the burden never shifted on the defendant, but that he came before the jury with every presumption of innocence, and neither he nor his counsel was under any obligation to furnish any evidence in his behalf; that the remarks were harmful, because their tendency was to shift the burden on the defendant, which the law did not permit. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant reserved an exception. In making its ruling the court stated, in substance, that the defendant was not bound to offer any testimony in his own behalf, and that the burden of proof was never shifted on the defendant; that the jury could not take into consideration the fact that the defendant had not produced himself as a witness, and had not produced any witnesses, but that they were entitled to consider all the testimony before them; and it said: "If the evidence is criminating, and not explained, I will allow the district attorney to comment on it." We see no error in the ruling. The record shows that "the district attorney did not allude to or comment upon the fact that the defendant has not taken the stand in his own behalf, or failed to produce any witnesses to explain anything." The remarks complained of evidently had reference only to the testimony before the jury and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. The attorney simply challenged the opposing counsel to explain the facts proved, and give his version of the offense; and in this there was nothing improper.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in amending, and giving as amended, three of the instructions asked by him, and in refusing to give one that he asked. It does not appear from the record what the amendments made were. The instructions are simply indorsed, "Given as amended;" and as given they state the law correctly. A court has a right to amend imperfect instructions, and when it does so its action cannot be successfully complained of. Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 460; People v. Dodge, 30 Cal. 450. The instruction not given was properly refused. It stated, in substance, that the facts that defendant was found in possession of the property recently stolen, and was arrested, and while under arrest fled, or attempted to flee, were not sufficient to warrant the finding him guilty, nor even to raise in the minds of the jury a strong presumption of guilt, and that defendant could not be found guilty "except upon the most conclusive proof" that he committed the crime alleged. This is not a correct statement of the law. The "most conclusive proof" is not required, but only that which satisfies the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt. If given, the instruction would have been misleading and erroneous. We find no error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

HEINLEN v. HEILBRON et al. (No. 14,489.)

NOTICES—SERVICE BY MAIL.

Code Civil Proc. §§ 1012, 1013, provide for service by mail in certain cases, and that such service shall be by depositing the notice or other paper in the post office, addressed to the person on whom it is to be served at his office or residence. Held that, where a notice attempted to be served by mail was actually received by the person for whom it was intended, the service was sufficient, though it was mailed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Heinlen against Heilbron and others. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

H. H. Welsh, (Daggett & Adams, of counsel,) for appellants. G. A. Heinlen, (R. E. Houghton, of counsel,) for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In this action, pending in the county of Tulare, the superior court of that county made an order on the 9th day of February, 1891, denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. The attorney for the defendants resided and had his office in Fresno, and on the 28th of March, 1891, filed with the clerk of the above court a notice of an appeal by the defendants from the order denying their motion for a new trial. On the day previous he had deposited in the post office at Fresno a registered letter, containing a copy of the notice of appeal, inclosed in a sealed envelope, with the postage thereon prepaid, addressed to the attorney for the plaintiff, as follows: "G. A. Heinlen, Esq., Attorney at Law, Lemoore, Tulare County, Cal." The letter containing the notice of appeal was not delivered to Mr. Heinlen at Lemoore, but was forwarded to him through the mail from that place to San Jose, on the 31st day of March, and was received by him through the post office at San Jose on the 4th day of April, 1891. The attorney for the respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground "that the notice of appeal from the said order was not properly served on the attorney for respondent in the manner required by law, in that said service was made by mail, and it was not addressed to the attorney for said respondent, either at his residence or his place of business;" and in support of the motion presents his own affidavit "that previous to the month of February, 1891, deponent resided and had his office in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California;" and that in February, he removed his office and residence to San Jose, and "did not on the 27th day of March, 1891, and has not at any time since said date, and does not now, reside or have his office in the town of Lemoore; * * * that on the said 27th day of March, 1891, and for one month prior thereto, and ever since said date, his residence, office, place of business, and post office address was at San Jose." At the hearing of the motion several affidavits were submitted on behalf of the respective parties for the purpose of determining whether Mr. Heinlen had an office at Lemoore, but we do not deem it necessary to determine this question, although we think that it sufficiently appears from them that the attorney for the appellants had good reason to believe that that was the proper place at which to address any notice to be sent to him through the mail. Neither do we determine the question of practice suggested at the argument as to whether the affidavits should be filed in the first instance in this court, or be brought up from the superior court, as a part of the record in that court. Section 1011, Code Civil Proc., provides that the service of notices "may be personal, by delivery to the party or attorney on whom the service is required to be made;" and section 1012 provides that "service by mail may be made when the person making the service, and the person on whom it is to be made, reside or have their offices in different places between which there is a regular communication by mail;" and in section 1013 it is declared that "in case of service by mail the notice or other paper must be deposited in the post office, addressed to the person on whom it is to be served, at his office or place of residence, and the postage paid." The "delivery" which constitutes a personal service under section 1011 need not be made by the individual who is attempting to make the service, but can be effected through a clerk or messenger, or through any agency by which a "delivery" can be made; and when the notice is so delivered the service becomes a personal service. The fact that the person upon whom the service is to be made resides or has his office in a different place from that of the person making the service, does not require that the service be made by mail, or preclude a personal service, and the person seeking to make the service can avail himself of any agency,—such as Wells, Fargo & Co., or the instrumentality of the post office department,—with as much effect as if he had employed any other messenger. The delivery of the notice through such agency renders the service personal, and the proof of such delivery establishes a personal service.

The service by mail authorized by section 1012 does not contemplate a delivery as a part of the service, as is seen by the provision of section 1013, that "the service is complete at the time of the deposit" in the post office. Such a service is termed a "substituted service," and is intended to take the place of and be equivalent in point of law and effect to a personal service. Inasmuch, however, as it is the general rule that there shall be personal service of all notices in legal proceedings, and that substituted service can be made only in the cases and in the manner designated by the statute, it follows that it is incumbent upon any one who would avail himself of this mode of service to have it clearly appear upon the record that the case is one in which such service is permitted, and that the mode pointed out by the statute for making such service has been strictly followed. If the only proof of service appearing in the record were that a copy of the notice of appeal had been deposited in the post office, addressed to the attorney of the respondents at a place confessedly not his office or place of residence, or which was in some suitable mode shown not to be his office or place of residence, and a motion was made on that ground to dismiss the appeal, we should be compelled to grant the motion, for the reason that the appellant would have failed to show that any notice of appeal had been served, and, therefore, that it did not appear that we had any jurisdiction of the appeal. Jurisdiction, however, as has been frequently held, does not depend upon the proof of service, but upon the fact that service has been made, —In re Newman's Estate, 75 Cal. 220, 16 Pac.

Rep. 887; Sichler v. Look, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 220; and a motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that the record does not show a sufficient service of the notice will be denied if the appellant can show by other proof that the notice was properly served, even though the transcript be defective in that regard,—Perri v. Beaumont, 88 Cal. 108, 25 Pac. Rep. 1109. The affidavit herein of the attorney for the respondent that on the 4th day of April, 1891, he received a copy of the notice of appeal at his office and residence in San Jose, through the agency of the post office, is equivalent to an admission of service, indorsed by him upon the original notice, and establishes that there has been a personal service upon him of such notice, and that the court has thereby obtained jurisdiction of the appeal. The motion is denied.

(No. 13,685.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

PARTNERSHIP—EVIDENCE OF.

In an action on a note signed "G. & W.," evidence of statements made by G., in the absence of W., that G. and W. were partners, is inadmissible against W.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; J. K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by Vanderhurst, Sanborn & Co. against George W. De Witt and William De Witt. Plaintiffs had judgment, and William De Witt appeals. Reversed.

Geil & Morehouse, for appellant. Dorn & Parker, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Action upon a promissory note. The trial was by a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and the defendant William De Witt appeals.

The note sued upon is signed, "Geo. & Wm. De Witt," and was in fact so signed and delivered to plaintiffs by the defendant George W. De Witt. The appellant alleges in his answer that the note was executed without his knowledge and authority. The evidence upon the trial tended to show that the note was made by George W. De Witt in settlement of an account which the plaintiffs had against him for merchandise furnished to and used by him in carrying on a certain farming and threshing business, in which business the respondents claim that the appellant and the said George W. De Witt were in fact partners. The evidence further shows that at the time the goods and merchandise were sold they were charged personally to George W. De Witt, and appellant was not at the time held out to respondents as a partner in the business referred to, nor did they know of the existence of the partnership now alleged.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the right of the respondents to maintain this action against the appellant really turns upon the question whether he was in fact a partner of the defendant George W. De Witt in the business referred to, and upon this point the court instructed the jury, in substance, that, in order to constitute such partnership, there must have been an agreement between the appellant and his codefendant to carry on the business together, and to divide the profits between them, and that the fact that appellant was to receive one half of the net profits of the farming and threshing business would not make him a partner therein if the understanding and agreement between the parties was that he was to receive the same only as a compensation for the use of certain personal property let by appellant to George W. De Witt, to be used by said George W. De Witt in the prosecution of that business solely on his own account. The evidence upon the part of the appellant tended to show the facts referred to in this instruction, and the instruction was a correct statement of the law upon the subject to which it relates. Newspaper Co. v. Farrell, 88 Mo. 594; McDonald v. Matney, 82 Mo. 358; Lindl. Partn. (2d Ed.) marg. p. 34. But upon the trial the court, against the objection and exception of the appellant, admitted evidence of the declarations of the defendant George W. De Witt, not made in the presence of the appellant, to the effect that he and the appellant were such partners. There was error in the admission of this evidence. It is well settled that upon such an issue the declaration of an alleged partner, made in the absence of the other, cannot, as against the absent one, be used to establish the fact of partnership. Cowan v. Kinney, 33 Ohio St. 422; Flanigan v. Champion, 2 N. J. Eq. 54; Dutton v. Woodman, 9 Cush. 255; Whitney v. Ferris, 10 Johns. 66; McPherson v. Rathbone, 7 Wend. 216; Hardware Co. v. Wallace, 59 Conn. 336. In Dutton v. Woodman the rule which excludes such declarations and the self-evident reason upon which it is based is thus stated by BIGELOW, J.: "The authority of Thurston and I. F. Woodman to bind E. W. Woodman by their statements and declarations depend entirely upon the existence of the copartnership. Until that was proved, E. W. Woodman was not shown to have had any connection with either of them; and, as that was the point in controversy before the jury to be determined by their verdict, evidence which would be admissible only upon the assumption of the existence of the copartnership was clearly incompetent when offered to prove the fact upon which its competency depended." This evidence being incompetent, and relating, as it did, to a material question in the case, the judgment and the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial must be reversed.

Judgment and order reversed.

DE COURCEY V. COX. (No. 14,618.)

FALSE IMPRISONMENT—LIABILITY OF JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—JUDGMENT ON THE PLEADINGS.

1. A justice of the peace, since he has no jurisdiction of an act which constitutes no offense, is liable for false imprisonment if he issues a warrant for a person's arrest, charging him merely with refusing to return money paid to him by mistake, and, after rendering a judgment that he return the money or be committed, issues a warrant under which he is committed.

2. The granting of a motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, after having overruled a demurrer based on the same ground, is a mere irregularity.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN, Judge.

Action by one De Courcey against one Cox for false imprisonment. From a judgment for defendant on the pleadings, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Dodson & Ecker, for appellant. E. W. Hendrick, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for false imprisonment. The complaint was demurred to on two grounds, one of which was that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant filed his answer to the complaint. Afterwards defendant gave plaintiff notice of a motion for judgment in favor of defendant upon the pleadings, which was granted, and a judgment was entered in favor of defendant for his costs and disbursements. From that judgment plaintiff has appealed.

If the complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action the court undoubtedly erred in granting defendant's motion for judgment upon the pleadings. The complaint states that upon a complaint made before defendant, a justice of the peace, charging plaintiff with refusing to return the sum of $20, alleged to have been overpaid said plaintiff by mistake by the El Cajon Vineyard Company, defendant issued a warrant of arrest, upon which plaintiff was arrested and brought before defendant, and required to and did plead to said charge, and, after trial, defendant rendered a judgment that plaintiff restore said amount of $20, or be committed to the county jail for 20 days; and that, pursuant to said judgment, defendant issued a committal, and placed it in the hands of an officer, who executed it by imprisoning plaintiff in the county jail for the period of 3 days. Copies of the judgment and the commitment are inserted in the complaint, which recites that defendant proceeded wholly upon a complaint which charged plaintiff with having wrongfully retained money overpaid to her by mistake. Defendant proceeded upon the charge as he might have done had it constituted a crime, which it clearly did not. More than half a century ago, SPENCER, C. J., speaking for the supreme court of the state of New York, said: "I consider it perfectly well settled that to justify an inferior magistrate in committing a person he must have jurisdiction not only of the subject-matter of the complaint, but also of the person of the defendant." Bigelow v. Stearns, 19 Johns. 38. "If a magistrate acts beyond the limits of his jurisdiction, his proceedings are deemed to be coram non judice and void; if he attempts to enforce any process founded on any judgment, sentence, or conviction in such case, he thereby becomes a trespasser." Piper v. Pearson, 2 Gray, 120. "It is true that justices of the peace, while acting within the scope of their authority, as well as the judges of the higher courts, are not answerable in a private action for the erroneous exercise of the judicial functions with which they are invested by law. Such protection is essential to the honest and independent administration of justice. But, on the other hand, it would seem to be well settled that inferior tribunals, invested with special jurisdiction only, and persons clothed with limited authority, such as justices of the peace, must, at their peril, keep within their prescribed jurisdiction; and if they transcend the limits of their authority they are answerable to any one whose rights are thereby invaded. And honesty of purpose in such a case, while it may mitigate damages, cannot justify a clear usurpation of power." Truesdell v. Combs, 33 Ohio St. 186. Numerous cases to the same effect might be cited, but it is unnecessary to cite them, so long as we are unadvised of any case in which the doctrine of the cases cited has ever been questioned. In the case now before us the complaint shows that no warrant could legally be issued upon the complaint made against the appellant; that she was not convicted or adjudged guilty of any crime. She was charged with the commission of an act which did not constitute a crime, and therefore the defendant never acquired any jurisdiction to proceed in the matter, and the judgment and commitment are void on their faces. These facts appearing in the complaint, coupled with the arrest and imprisonment of appellant, certainly constitute a cause of action, and the court erred in granting the motion for and entering judgment for the defendant upon the pleadings.

We have not overlooked the point made by appellant on the action of the court in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, after having overruled a demurrer based on that ground. We think it nothing more serious than an irregularity, which it is better to avoid as far as practicable. All we desire to say on this point is that we think the demurrer was properly overruled, and the motion for judgment on the pleadings improperly granted. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to proceed and try the issues raised by the complaint and answer.

We concur: De Haven, J.; McFarland, J.

Consolidated Nat. Bank v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co. (No. 14,658.)

Authority of Agent—Evidence—Liabilities of Principal.

1. A bank sued to recover the amount of overdrafts made by defendant's agent, with which, unknown to his principal and its general agents, he had an account in his own name as "agent" only. The overdrafts were caused by drafts payable to the general agents, and remitted by him to them as money of defendant, to cover defalcations in his accounts with them. The agent had at all times sufficient money of defendant in hand to meet all the necessary expenses of the agency. Held, that it will not, in the absence of express authority to borrow money, be presumed that the overdrafts were for such purpose, and authorized by the principal.

2. Evidence on behalf of defendant to prove the agent's defalcations, that the overdrafts were made to cover same, and that he had money sufficient to meet all claims, is admissible as tending to disprove the agent's authority, and that the overdrafts were loans to defendant.

3. Evidence that defendant and its general agents were never notified of the agent's bank account or of his overdraft by the agent or by the bank; that this never appeared in his account; that the general agents always received the drafts remitted by him as drafts purchased with defendant's money; that no money borrowed by the agent was ever paid or recognized by them; and that they were not notified by the bank of the overdraft till 15 months after the agent's removal,—disproves ostensible authority of the agent to overdraw.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Consolidated National Bank against Pacific Coast Steamship Company to recover the amount of an overdraft incurred by defendant's agent. From judgment for defendant, and an order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Works, Gibson & Titus, (Works & Works, of counsel,) for appellant. Luce & McDonald, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. The complaint in this action, showing that plaintiff and defendant are corporations, is in two counts, the first alleging "that defendant is indebted to the plaintiff for moneys had and received by it from the plaintiff in the sum of thirteen thousand five hundred and seventy-four 47-100 dollars, which sum is now due and unpaid." In the second count it is alleged, substantially, that for many successive years the defendant did business with the plaintiff by depositing in plaintiff's bank, at the city of San Diego, and drawing therefrom on its checks, large sums of money, during which time the defendant frequently overdrew its account in large sums, which were repaid at various times, except as hereinafter alleged; "that between April 18, 1889, and November 1st of same year the defendant, by its checks, regularly drawn on the plaintiff, overdrew its account in the plaintiff's said bank in the sum of $10,754.91," which, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, amounts to $13,574.47. For this amount plaintiff prays judgment. A special demurrer to the first count, on the ground of uncertainty, was sustained by the court. The answer of the defendant specifically denies each allegation of the second count except that each party is a corporation. The case was tried without a jury, and the court found for defendant on all the issues, and rendered its judgment accordingly. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial, made on a bill of exceptions, having been denied, the plaintiff appeals both from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

1. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the court in any material particular. It appears that during the transactions in controversy the defendant was engaged in the business of marine carrier of freight and persons along the Pacific coast from Mexico to Alaska. Goodall, Perkins & Co., at San Francisco, were its general agents, but it had a local agent at each port on the coast where it did business. These local agents were under the control of the general agency, and were required to report directly to Goodall, Perkins & Co., at San Francisco. During the transaction in question J. H. Simpson was the local agent for the defendant at the port of San Diego in this state, and the plaintiff was there engaged in the business of banking. Continually since the organization of the plaintiff's bank, in 1883, until October, 1889, Simpson had an account of his deposits and drafts of money with plaintiff's bank kept in the name of "J. H. Simpson, Agent." To this account he deposited in the bank, from time to time during each month, considerable sums of money collected by him for the defendant. During the same period he was treasurer of a Masonic lodge, and also of a Unitarian Church, and from time to time deposited to the same account considerable sums of money belonging to the lodge and to the church, amounting to over $20,000, besides $23,000 of his own money. All his checks upon this account were signed "J. H. Simpson, Agent," and the greater portion of them made payable to himself, and actually paid to him. Of those paid to himself the greater portion was paid by drafts of the defendant on San Francisco, payable to Goodall, Perkins & Co. There was nothing on the checks, save the name of the payee, to indicate the purpose for which they were drawn. Neither the checks nor the account indicated for whom Simpson was agent. On or about October 1, 1889, Simpson was discovered to be some $9,000 short in his accounts with defendant, which he professed to be unable to pay, and for that reason was removed from his position as agent of defendant. At the same time his account with the plaintiff was overdrawn $11,404.32, which, with interest at 12 per cent. per annum, constitutes the amount sued for in this action. If Simpson had actual or ostensible authority to borrow money for the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, otherwise not. This is the ultimate and pivotal question of fact presented for decision. Upon this question the trial court found for the defendant, and I think the finding is justified by the evidence. The evidence is positive that no express authority to borrow money on defendant's account, nor even to deposit defendant's money in any bank, was ever given to Simpson; and there is no pretense to the contrary. But counsel for appellant contend, in substance, that such authority was implied from the necessity of borrowing money in order to carry on the business which Simpson was employed and authorized to do. The evidence, however, strongly tends to prove that no such necessity ever existed. It appears that Simpson occupied the position of agent for defendant at the port of San Diego since 1875, and that from some time in 1876 until the organization of the plaintiff bank in 1883 he had an account with the "Commercial Bank" of San Diego similar to that which he afterwards had with the plaintiff; and that upon the organization of the plaintiff bank, as the successor of the Commercial Bank, his account with the latter was transferred to the former. His account in the Commercial Bank was often overdrawn to the extent of $200 to $3,000. Between the 2d day of January, and the 31st day of December, 1888, he overdrew his account in the plaintiff bank 37 times, in sums ranging from $1,000 to $4,600; but these overdrafts were frequently canceled by deposits. On December 31, 1888, the account stood credited with a balance of $1,560.40 in Simpson's favor, and there was a still larger balance in his favor on the 13th day of February, 1889, when he drew a check in favor of himself for $15,026.92, and the next day (February 14th) drew another for $5,000. These two checks were paid to him in drafts on San Francisco, payable to Goodall, Perkins & Co., which were paid accordingly. On February 14, 1889, the overdraft was $8,930; March 13th, $13,782; April 19th, $12,567; May 17th, $13,741; June 19th, $14,099; July 16th, $14,111; August 21st, $13,692; September 12th, $15,717; October 3d, $13,398; and October 11th, when the account was closed, $11,404.32. It was proved that all overdrafts from December 31, 1888, until the account was closed were paid to Simpson in drafts on San Francisco, payable and actually paid to Goodall, Perkins & Co., as the general agents of the defendant. It seems incredible that the agents of plaintiff could have believed that any of these overdrafts were necessary to enable Simpson to carry on any business which he was authorized to do as local agent of the defendant at the port of San Diego, or that Simpson intended to use or could have used them for any such purpose. Nor, indeed, is there any evidence that they ever pretended so to believe. Yet the overdraft sued for must be included in those drawn since February 12, 1889. Mr. Simpson, who appeared as a witness on the part of the plaintiff, testified that there never was any necessity for his borrowing money to carry on any business which he was authorized to do for the defendant; that enough money was always collected by him to pay the running expenses of all the business he was authorized to do; that all his overdrafts which were paid to him by plaintiff in drafts on San Francisco, payable to Goodall, Perkins & Co., were made for the sole purpose of reducing the balance against him in his accounts with the defendant, kept by Goodall, Perkins & Co.; and that he so informed Mr. Bryant Howard, the president of the plaintiff bank, before the 13th of February, 1889. Mr. George C. Perkins, of the firm of Goodall, Perkins & Co., testified on behalf of the defendant that there never was any necessity for Simpson to borrow money for defendant for any purpose whatever. As to the implied power of an agent to borrow money on account of his principal the court of appeals, in Bickford v. Menier, 107 N. Y. 490, 14 N. E. Rep. 438, said: "If the transaction of the business absolutely required the exercise of the power to borrow money in order to carry it on, then that power was impliedly conferred as an incident to the employment; but it does not afford a sufficient ground for the inference of such a power to say the act proposed was convenient or advantageous or more effectual in the transaction of the business provided for, but it must be practically indispensable to the execution of the duties really delegated in order to justify its inference from the original employment." See, also, Hurley v. Watson, 68 Mich. 531, 36 N. W. Rep. 726; Mechem, Ag. § 399; Whart. Ag. § 137; Mor. Corp. § 606. The Civil Code, § 2319, provides that an agent has authority "to do everything necessary, or proper and usual, in the ordinary course of business, for effecting the purpose of his agency." It having been proved, as above shown, that there never was any necessity for borrowing money to effect any purpose of Simpson's agency, it will not be presumed without evidence that it was proper or usual, in the ordinary course of the business in which he was employed, to borrow money without express authority, when there was no necessity for so doing.

2. There is no evidence of ostensible authority. Simpson testified that he never notified the defendant or its general agents that he had overdrawn his account with plaintiff's bank, and that there was nothing in his correspondence with the defendant or its agents, or in the books which he kept for defendant, from which any such overdraft might have been inferred; and, furthermore, that he had never informed defendant that he had an account with plaintiff or any other bank, and did not believe that defendant had notice of any such account before October, 1889. The only circumstance which it is claimed should have operated as notice of such account to Goodall, Perkins & Co. is that seven or eight years before the trial they sent an expert accountant to examine the books kept by Simpson; and on that occasion, in order to balance his account, Simpson exhibited his pass book as a voucher for a small balance in his favor, in either the plaintiff's bank or the Commercial Bank. The pass book then exhibited showed the account to be in the name of "J. H. Simpson, Agent." Mr. Perkins testified that Goodall, Perkins & Co. never had notice that Simpson had any account with any bank; that in 1884 they had furnished him a good safe, supposed to be burglar proof, in which to keep the money of the defendant; and they always supposed that Simpson purchased the drafts remitted to them with defendant's money until after they discovered that he was short in his accounts with them, and after his last overdraft upon plaintiff. There was no evidence that defendant ever paid or recognized any debt for borrowed money contracted by Simpson or by any other local agent. Moreover, the circumstantial evidence had a tendency to prove that the agents of the plaintiff never regarded the account of "J. H. Simpson, Agent," as the account of the defendant, and never understood that defendant was responsible for Simpson's overdrafts. (1) Although often anxious to have the larger overdrafts reduced, and requesting Simpson to reduce them, they never notified the defendant of the existence of the account or of any overdraft until more than 15 months after Simpson was removed. (2) On June 20, 1888, the plaintiff took Simpson's individual note, signed "J. H. Simpson," for $7,000, to cover his overdrafts on the account of "J. H. Simpson, Agent." This note was afterwards, in July, 1888, paid by three memorandum checks drawn by the cashier on the account of "J. H. Simpson, Agent." (3) About the 1st of April, 1889, Mr. Howard, president of the bank, complained to Mr. Simpson of the amount of the overdraft, and requested that it be reduced. Simpson then told Mr. Howard that he (Simpson) was about to go to England, where he expected to get about $21,000, and on his return, in about three months, he would pay the overdraft. Howard asked him if he felt sure of that, and Simpson answered that he did. It was then agreed between them that an overdraft, not exceeding $12,000, would be allowed during Simpson's absence, and that Simpson's son, who was to act for his father during his absence, should be allowed to overdraw the account to that limit. Thereupon Simpson gave the bank written authority to his son to draw checks and transact all banking business for him until further orders, and Simpson left for England on April 8, 1889. I think it does not appear when he returned, but it does appear that he failed to raise any money. On May 17, 1889, the overdraft was $13,741, June 19th, $14,099, and September 12th, $15,717; yet during that time no notice of the overdraft was given to the general agents of the defendant. In October, 1889, Simpson was removed on account of the deficit in his accounts with the defendant. Of this the plaintiff had notice, and soon thereafter Mr. Howard, the president of the bank, went to San Francisco, and called on Goodall, Perkins & Co., and earnestly requested them to retain Mr. Simpson in their employ at San Diego in the same position he had before occupied, and offered to go on his bond for the faithful performance of his duties; yet did not then, nor until about 15 months thereafter, notify Goodall, Perkins & Co. of Simpson's overdraft in plaintiff's bank, nor of any demand against the defendant. Mr. Howard's attempted explanation of these circumstances seems unreasonable and wholly unsatisfactory. Section 2317 of the Civil Code defines ostensible authority to be "such as a principal intentionally, or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." If there was any evidence tending to prove this, I think it safe to say the preponderance of the evidence was against it, and fully justifies the finding of no ostensible authority. Robinson v. Bank, 81 Cal. 107, 22 Pac. Rep. 478.

3. It is contended that the sustaining of the special demurrer to the first count of the complaint was error prejudicial to defendant. Conceding that it was error, I think it appears that plaintiff was not injured thereby; for, although it may be true, as stated by counsel, that a state of facts may possibly have existed entitling plaintiff to recover under that count without proving the authority of the agent, Simpson, to borrow money for defendant, yet it is quite apparent from the evidence that no such state of facts did exist, and that the first and second counts were intended to represent the same cause of action.

4. The court sustained an objection to each of the following questions propounded by plaintiff's counsel to plaintiff's witness, Simpson: "First. When did you first commence to deposit moneys for defendant in the Consolidated National Bank? Second. State on whose account and for whom these deposits were made by you as agent." But the witness was afterwards permitted to answer, and did fully answer, these questions.

5. There was no error in allowing defendant to prove the amount of Simpson's defalcations, that his overdrafts were made to pay the amount he was behind in his accounts with defendant, and that at the times of the overdrafts he had money of the defendant on hand sufficient to pay all claims against the defendant. Obviously this testimony tended to prove that the overdrafts were not loans to defendant, and that Simpson had neither express nor implied authority from defendant to make them, but that they were made by Simpson for the purpose of paying his own debt to defendant. For these purposes the evidence was competent, even conceding that it did not touch the question as to the ostensible authority of Simpson.

6. The trial, so far as the evidence was concerned, was closed on July 3d, when, by consent of both parties, the summing up by counsel was postponed until July 7th. On July 7th, the court being otherwise engaged, it was again postponed until July 8th. On July 8th it was again postponed until July 9th, by request of plaintiff's counsel. On July 9th plaintiff's counsel, without previous notice, moved the court to open up the case for the purpose of allowing the plaintiff to make proof that Simpson, in the transaction of defendant's business, had signed receipts, advertised in the papers, and signed other papers and documents "J. H. Simpson, Agent;" and also that since the alleged overdrafts the defendant has taken conveyances of property from Simpson to secure defendant against loss. This motion was opposed on the grounds that the proposed evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, and that there was no showing or suggestion of surprise, oversight, or inability to have procured the proposed evidence upon the trial. The court denied the motion. Counsel for appellant contend that this action of the court was an abuse of its discretionary power; but in this I think they are mistaken. Neither the forms nor substance of the alleged receipts, advertisements, or other documents signed by Simpson as "agent" were shown. It may therefore be presumed that, unlike his account with and checks upon the plaintiff's bank, they contained the name of the principal, the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, and expressly showed the receipted demands to be claims against the principal, the advertisements to be the advertisements of the business of the principal, and that the other documents expressly purported to bind the principal. Such evidence would have added nothing favorable to plaintiff's case. Neither would the fact that defendant took security from Simpson, unless the security was given to indemnify defendant for loss on account of the demand of the plaintiff in suit, which is not pretended. Besides, there was no showing of any excuse for not having produced the evidence at the trial. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

In re LADD'S ESTATE. (No. 14,800.)

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—CODICIL.

A testator gave one half of his estate to his wife, and made the following provisions respecting the other half: "Clause Fourth. The remainder of my property shall remain as hereinafter provided in the hands of my executors. * * * Clause Fifth. Upon the death of either of my parents, one half of said property [mentioned in clause 4] shall be given to my wife * * * absolutely, * * * and the net income of the remainder, * * * not exceeding $1,200, * * * shall be paid to my sole surviving parent until his or her death, and then the entire property shall be given absolutely to my wife. * * * Clause Sixth. * * * If my wife * * * shall die after the death of one of my parents, and during the life time of the other, then the remainder of the one half of the property in the hands of my executors under said clause four shall be given to my said surviving parent." Afterwards the testator made a codicil reciting that whereas, since the making of the will, his father had died, and his property holdings had considerably increased, he now changed the fourth clause "in this regard, and to the extent only, that from the income of the property provided by said will to be held in trust" by his executors a monthly payment of $150 should be made to his mother, and other payments amounting to $450 to other beneficiaries. Held, that the codicil was intended only to make a different disposition of the income, and not to affect the wife's right to three fourths of the estate upon the death of the testator's father.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George S. Ladd, deceased.

Myrick & Deering, for appellants. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Appeal from a decree of distribution. By his will, which was executed February 24, 1878, the testator gave one half of his estate to his wife, and made the following provisions respecting the other half: "Clause Fourth. The remainder of my property shall remain as hereinafter provided in the hands of my executors, and be held or sold, and the proceeds reinvested or loaned by my executors, in their discretion, and the net income thereof, to an amount not exceeding twenty-four hundred dollars in United States gold coin per annum, payable in quarterly installments, shall be divided equally between my beloved parents, Horace Comstock Ladd and Sarah Ann Ladd, and the remainder of the income shall be paid to my wife, Elizabeth. Clause Fifth. Upon the death of either of my parents, one half of said property placed and to remain in the hands of my executors under the fourth clause of this will shall be given to my wife, Elizabeth, to be held by her absolutely and free from all trusts, and the net income of the remainder of such property, to an amount not exceeding twelve hundred dollars in United States gold coin per annum, payable in quarterly installments, shall be paid to my sole surviving parent until his or her death, and then the entire property shall be given to my wife, the said Elizabeth, to be held by her absolutely and free from all trusts. Clause Sixth. In the event that my beloved wife, Elizabeth, shall die before either of my parents, all of said one half of my estate placed and to remain in the hands of my executors under clause four of this will shall be given to my said parents in equal parts, to be held absolutely and free from all trusts. And if my wife, Elizabeth, shall die after the death of one of my parents, and during the lifetime of the other, then the remainder of the one half of the property placed and to remain in the hands of my executors under said clause four shall be given to my said surviving parent, to be held absolutely and free from all trusts." Before the death of the testator, his father died, and on the 18th of January, 1889, he made a codicil in the following terms: "Whereas, since the making of the foregoing will, my father has died, and my property holdings have considerably increased, I now change the fourth and ninth clauses of my said will in this regard, and to the extent only, that, from the income of the property provided by said will to be held in trust by my said executors, I will and direct that monthly payments be made by my said executors to the following named persons, and each of them, during their lives, that is to say: To Mrs. Anne Sarah Ladd, (my mother,) one hundred and fifty dollars," (and other sums amounting to $450 to different individuals.) The court distributed three fourths of the estate to the wife, and one fourth to the executors upon the trusts set forth in the will and codicil. From this decree the mother and a sister of the testator have appealed, claiming that, by the terms of the will and codicil, one half of the estate should have been distributed to the executors upon the said trusts.

We are of the opinion that the decree of distribution made by the court was in accordance with the terms of the will and codicil. By a proper construction of the terms of the original will, upon the death of the testator subsequent to the death of his father, only one fourth of his estate was to remain in the hands of his executors. The provision in clause 4 that the remainder (one half) of his property should remain in the hands of his executors, "as hereinafter provided," was by its terms limited and qualified by the provision subsequently made in the will, which is found in clause 5, that, upon the death of either of his parents, "one half of said property placed and to remain" in the hands of his executors under the fourth clause of his will "shall be given to my wife, Elizabeth, to be held by her absolutely, and free from all trusts." Clause 5 is a provision of the will, distinct in itself, qualifying and limiting the provision in clause 4; and from the two it clearly appears that it was the intention of the testator merely to provide a fund out of which should be derived an income for the support of his parents, and that if one parent should die before his wife the fund should be reduced to one half of the amount originally provided in clause 4, and the other half "given to his wife absolutely," and upon the death of both there should be no fund whatever, but that the entire property should be "given" to his wife. If the testator had survived both of his parents, and had made no change in his will, his wife would unquestionably have been entitled to the whole of his estate; or if he had died at the date of his codicil, and had not made the codicil, his mother only surviving him, the executors could not claim that more than one fourth of his estate should "remain" in their hands, for the reason that in clause 5 it was "hereinafter provided" that, upon the death of his father, one half of the "remainder" named in clause 4 should be given absolutely to his wife. It must be assumed that the testator, at the time of making his codicil, used the terms therein with reference to the provisions of the will, as they would be construed under the facts then existing, and with a knowledge of what property the will provided that the executors should "hold" in trust, and that he intended that no further change should be made in his will than was expressly declared in the codicil. The execution of the codicil had the effect "to republish the will, as modified by the codicil," (Civil Code, § 1287,) as of the date of the codicil, (Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 302.) Its effect was not limited to a republication of clause 4; and, although clause 4 is the only portion of the will which the codicil purports to modify, yet the effect of its execution was to republish the entire will, and not merely the clause so modified, "as if the testator had inserted in the codicil all the words of the will." York v. Walker, 12 Mees. & W. 597. The whole of the original will and the codicil are to be construed as a single instrument executed at the date of the codicil, and of which all the parts are to be construed "so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole." Civil Code, § 1321. A codicil is never construed to disturb the dispositions of the will further than is absolutely necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the codicil. 1 Jarm. Wills, p.

*176. "The dispositions made by a will are not to be disturbed by a codicil further than is absolutely necessary in order to give it effect, and a clear disposition made by the will is not revoked by a doubtful expression or inconsistent disposition in a codicil." Kane v. Astor's Ex'rs, 5 Sandf. 533. "The different parts of a will, or of a will and codicil, shall be reconciled, if possible, and, where a bequest has been once made, it shall not be revoked unless no other construction can be fairly put upon the language used by the testator." Colt v. Colt, 32 Conn. 446. See, also, Wetmore v. Parker, 52 N. Y. 462; University v. Pinckney, 55 Md. 365.

In the preamble to the codicil the testator gives as the reason for the change that since the making of the will his father had died, and his property holdings considerably increased; and it is to be presumed that the income had proportionately increased. By the terms of the original will, his wife would have received all the income after paying to his mother $1,200 a year; but, owing to the increase of income, he increased the payment to his mother, and also provided for his brother and sister, for whom in the original will he expressly declined to make any provision, —his wife at the same time receiving from the increased income of the one fourth which fell to her by reason of the death of his father a sufficient equivalent for the other payments directed to be made under the codicil. It was "in this regard"—that is, upon consideration of these facts—that he made the codicil by which he changed the fourth clause of his will "to the extent only" therein expressed; and the change made by the codicil is limited by the "extent" to which he has declared his intention to make the alteration. "A determination expressed to make an alteration in one particular negatives by implication any intention to alter it in any other respect." Quincy v. Rogers, 9 Cush. 296. The only change in his will which the testator purported to make by the codicil was in the fourth clause thereof, and the change which he purported to make in this clause was "only" to the extent of directing "that, from the income of the property provided by said will to be held in trust," his mother should receive $150 instead of $100 per month, and that, instead of paying all the remainder of the income from that property to his wife, $450 thereof should be paid to other beneficiaries. He does not either in terms or by implication change the fund from which that income is to be derived, but designates the will—not merely clause 4, but the whole will—for ascertaining the property from which to obtain the income for such payments, and declares that it is "the property provided by said will to be held in trust by my said executors." But the only property which the will authorizes the executors to hold in trust is that which he directs shall "remain" in their hands; and, as we have seen, this, after the death of the father, was only one half of the one half of the original amount set apart, since he had in clause 5 of his will directed that upon that contingency the other one half should be "given" to his wife, to be held by her absolutely and free from all trusts. It is very clear that the original purpose of the will was that the wife should take one half of his estate at his death, one half of the remainder at the death of one of his parents, and the other one half of such remainder at the death of the other. This purpose is not changed by any express language of the codicil, or by necessary implication from what he has said therein; and it must be held that, in his making a different disposition of the income, he did not intend to deprive the wife of the provision which he had previously made for her receiving a portion of his estate, upon the death of either of his parents. This construction of the effect of the codicil finds support, also, in clause 6 of the original will, in which it is provided that if his wife should die after the death of one of his parents, and during the life-time of the other, "the remainder of the one half" of the property "placed and to remain" in the hands of his executors under clause 4 —that is, one fourth of the estate of which he should die possessed—should be given to the surviving parent. It will be seen that no provision has been made in the will by which the mother can ever receive more than this one half of the "remainder of the one half of the property" which under clause 4 was to be placed in the hands of his executors. The decree of distribution is affirmed.

In re McDEVITT'S ESTATE. (No. 14,550.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1892.)

WILLS—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

1. Testator made a will in favor of a brother, with whom he lived, and to the exclusion of the contestants, the children of two deceased brothers. Testator was 65 years old, of sound mind and strong character, but in bad health, and no pressure had ever been brought to bear upon him as to the disposition of his property, and he alone gave instructions as to his will. The will when executed was taken in charge by the scrivener, and there was no proof that the brother knew the will had been made. The witnesses to the will testified to the evident capacity of the testator, his careful reading of the will, and emphatic approval of a clause expressing an intention to exclude the contestants. None of the contestants were ever denied access to him, but saw him often. One of the contestants testified that the testator seemed afraid of his brother, and that on one occasion after the execution of the will he cautioned the witness when he saw the brother approaching, to say nothing; that the property would all be his by and by. The testator took a strong interest also in another of the contestants, a boy 13 years old. He often expressed an intention to provide for the boy, and the boy finally went to live with him at the house of the brother. This was three years or more before the execution of the will. The boy testified that whenever the brother found that the testator had been to see any of the other contestants he would curse and abuse him, and that, when the witness had been getting a whipping at the hands of the brother the testator would tell him he was unable to interfere, as he would expect a whipping himself if he did. Held insufficient to establish undue influence.

2. The use of the past tense in describing acts of undue influence alleged as ground for setting aside a will does not render the statement insufficient in failing to connect the undue influence with the making of the will, where it is alleged in the concluding sentence that the decedent at a certain time, and while in the condition described, and unable to resist the importunities of a certain person, executed the pretended will.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Proceeding to contest the will of Charles McDevitt, deceased. From a judgment in favor of the contestants, the beneficiaries appeal. Reversed.

Jones & O'Donnell and E. W. McKinstry, (E. F. Preston, of counsel,) for appellants. P. F. Dunne and Thos. F. Barry, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This proceeding is to contest the will of decedent, and the appeal is taken by the beneficiaries under the will from a judgment in favor of the contestants, from an order refusing a new trial, and from an order refusing to dismiss the proceeding on the ground that the judgment was not entered within six months after its rendition. Charles McDevitt died on the 28th of February, 1890, at the age of 65 years. The will in question was executed September 27, 1889. The testator, at the time this will was executed, was an invalid, suffering from internal cancer, from which he finally died. He seems, however, not to have been so ill as to prevent his going out. One of the contestants, James McDevitt, testified that he and his family saw him nearly every day until three or four months before he died; and further: "I saw uncle Charley in our yard about a month or so before he died. He looked sickly then, and was as white as the wall. He died by inches." Deceased was at the time living with his brother Andrew, some distance from the residence of the witness; so that he must have been going about for several months after the will was executed. Deceased was a bachelor. He was a native of Ireland, and it appears that he had at one time three brothers and a sister living in San Francisco. The brothers were all married. Two, Michael and James, died before the testator, each leaving several children, the contestants herein. James McDevitt, the father of some of the contestants, and the deceased were at one time partners in the draying business in San Francisco. The business prospered, and they purchased a ranch in Sonoma county, which was managed by the deceased, while James managed the draying business. After 10 years before the testator's death there were business differences between himself and James, which resulted in litigation and the dissolution of the copartnership. Prior to that time, when visiting the city, which he did two or three times a year, the testator lived with his brother James. At the time of the litigation he went to live with his brother Andrew, and continued to reside there until his death, about 10 years later. After the dissolution James became the owner of the ranch, and Charles of the real estate, which now constitutes his estate. The deceased left, as heirs, a sister, residing in Massachusetts, a brother Andrew, at whose residence he died, seven nephews and nieces, children of his deceased brother James, and five nephews and nieces, children of a deceased brother Michael. All except the sister resided at San Francisco. In the will, executed, as we have seen, five months before his death, the deceased gave $1,000 to his sister, and all the residue of his estate to his brother Andrew and members of his family. The will contained the following: "I make no provision for the children of my deceased brother James McDevitt, nor those of my deceased brother Michael McDevitt, and my omission to provide for them is therefore intentional."

The contest is upon the ground that the will was procured through the undue influence of Andrew McDevitt, in this: that decedent had, prior to the execution of the will, for several years been living at the house of Andrew, and had become subject to the wishes and much in fear of, and dominated by, him; that at the time decedent had been sick and suffering, and became enfeebled in mind and body, and while in that condition was not permitted by said Andrew to see and converse with any of his relations except the immediate family of said Andrew, and was falsely told by said Andrew that his relations, except said Andrew and his family, cared nothing for him, and he ought not to do anything for them, and was urged and importuned by said Andrew, while in said condition, to make a will, giving all his estate to Andrew and his family; that, unable to resist the importunities, decedent made his mark to said will. The contest was tried with a jury, and by stipulation the only issue was, "Did the said Charles McDevitt, at the time of signing the instrument offered for probate, sign or execute the same under undue influence of Andrew McDevitt?" to which the jury answered, "Yes," and the findings of the court were in accordance with the verdict. The appellant contends that the statement of the contest is insufficient, because in the specifications of the acts of undue influence the past tense is used; but I think the concluding sentence, "that at said date, and while in said condition, and unable to resist the importunities of said Andrew, deceased made his mark to said pretended will," sufficiently connects the alleged undue influence with the testamentary act.

The appellant makes several points, either of which, he contends, requires a reversal. After a careful examination, I am convinced that the evidence is insufficient, as matter of law, to justify the verdict and decision. This is one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial. If this position be correct, the other points become matter of little consequence. I shall therefore proceed to consider this question. It may be premised, in the first place, that 65 is not such an advanced age as, of itself, to suggest senility; and that the evidence shows, without conflict, that the testator was a man of sound mind and memory and of strong will. There is no evidence which tends to show impairment of intellect, unless bad health necessarily has that effect. In the next place, there is no proof whatever that he was urged or importuned by Andrew or any one else to make a will, or that it was ever suggested by any one that he ought to give his property to Andrew or any one else. It does not appear that the subject of the testamentary disposition of his property was ever mentioned except to contestants, and Andrew testified that he did not know that a will had been made until after the death of the testator, who had sent him, as he says, to get a lawyer to look after his rents. Neither Andrew nor any member of his family was present when the will was executed, although it was at Andrew's house. The will when executed was taken away by the attorney, and there was no proof that any member of Andrew's family knew of it. The witnesses to the will testify to the evident capacity of the testator, the careful reading of the will, and the emphatic approval by the testator of the clause which expressed his intention to exclude the contestants. Upon the question whether decedent was not permitted to converse privately with contestants, the testimony on behalf of contestants shows, I think, beyond all controversy, not only that the charge is not sustained, but that the contrary is true. No relative was ever denied access to deceased, but, on the contrary, whenever any called to see him they were politely received and kindly treated. Nor do I think the effort to show that Mrs. Andrew McDevitt always remained present during such interviews a success. Very few of the contestants ever called at all, and these but seldom. This lack of attention is excused on the ground that they had business differences with their uncle Andrew, and did not think they were welcome at his house; but this does not tend to prove that they were prevented from seeing their uncle Charles. And, besides, the deceased was out and around, more or less, even during his last illness. Some of the contestants occupied the property which constitutes the estate, and many of them testify that they saw the decedent frequently out at the wharfs, and at his property, where some of them lived. It does not appear that he was attended by any one during these times, and it is absurd to say that they could not have seen him and conversed with him privately had they desired. There is no evidence tending to show that there was any period during which they did not so meet the decedent, and it appears affirmatively from their own testimony that some of them did so see him during his last illness, and for three months or more after the will was executed. James McDevitt, son of James McDevitt, deceased, brother of the testator, testified: "Afterwards [after his father's death] we saw him nearly every day until three or four months before he died." And again: "I saw uncle Charley in our yard about a month or so before he died." There is no evidence tending to prove that Andrew McDevitt or any one else ever told decedent that none of his relatives except Andrew and his family cared for him. There is, however, testimony to which that construction may be given so far as the children of James McDevitt are concerned, which is hereafter set out. Giving this the full effect that can be claimed for it, it still utterly fails to prove the allegation in the statement of the grounds of contest.

To prove the friendly relations existing between the decedent and the contestants, they were allowed to put in evidence several expressions of the deceased as to his testamentary intentions. That these expressions, as a general thing, do tend in some measure to prove a friendly feeling towards the persons in regard to whom they were used, cannot be denied. They were therefore properly received. But, unless made so near the time the will was executed as to constitute a part of the res gestæ, they did not tend to prove that the will was procured through undue influence, merely because it does not conform to these expressions. Although, therefore, such statements, when made under such circumstances as to show friendliness, are admissible for that purpose, the effect should be carefully limited by the court to the one for which they are admissible. Only so far as the friendly relations of the parties may have such effect can they throw any light upon the testamentary intentions of the decedent at the time of the execution of the will. In fact, in a case like this, where the testator was beyond question of sound mind, they were entitled to no weight at all, in the absence of proof of influence as to the very testamentary act. None of these expressions as to testamentary intent were sufficiently near the testamentary act to constitute them part of the res gestæ. One instance is shown, however, of such declarations which must have been after the execution of the will, and within two or three months of the time. I think there are no others brought within a year of that act. Charles McDevitt, son of James McDevitt, testified that he went to see decedent at Andrew McDevitt's house, in regard to the rents; that after some conversation uncle Charley said, when he saw uncle Andrew coming, "Sh! say nothing; it will all be yours by and by. * * * Question. Well, did he drop the conversation with you or did he drop it after Andrew came up? Answer. He dropped it. The deceased acted as though he were afraid of Andrew; never seemed to talk freely, except when he was away." On cross-examination he said the remark was: "Go ahead, you folks will have it when I am gone." The witness also stated that this happened two or three months before his uncle died. This witness also testified that he called three times during his uncle's illness. The second time Mrs. McDevitt ushered him into the room where his uncle was, and left him alone with him. He was treated kindly and politely by Andrew McDevitt's family. Whether by this statement the decedent intended to deceive the witness, or at the time intended to execute a new will, is alike immaterial. In neither case would it tend to prove that the will which had been executed was procured by undue influence. For that purpose the evidence would have been incompetent, except in connection with evidence tending to show fraud in procuring the will, or mental unsoundness. In the last case it might tend to prove that the alleged testator did not know the nature of the will he had executed. There is no chance for such supposition here. Although there is a charge of mental weakness in the contest, there was no proof tending to establish it, unless proof of physical infirmity constitutes such proof. That it did not go to this extent here we have seen. On the other hand, it is shown that he was a man of sound mind and strong will. The attending physician and the attorney who drew the will, and another subscribing witness, show beyond doubt his sound mental condition at the time, and thorough understanding of the will. Under such circumstances, this evidence and all other of like character is entitled to no weight. Waterman v. Whitney, 11 N. Y. 157.

Another witness, whose testimony has already been alluded to as showing an effort to prejudice the alleged testator against some of his nephews and nieces, and who also stated facts tending to show that decedent greatly feared his brother Andrew, is Charles McDevitt, son of Michael McDevitt. He was a boy about 13 years of age when his mother died. His uncle Charles on various occasions took great interest in him as a bright lad, and one who was not strong, and therefore unable to do hard work. Several times it is shown his uncle Charles had expressed his intention to assist in educating him, and had declared that he would provide for him. So far as I can find, these declarations were made at least two years before the will was executed, though some do not seem to be located as to time. After his mother's death his uncle Charley took him to live with himself at his uncle Andrew's, who, however, boarded both his uncle Charley and him without pay. He went there about February 7, 1886, and remained from four to six months. During this time the conversations testified to occurred. All must have been, therefore, more than three years before the execution of the will. He says his uncle Charley looked after his schooling, bought books and clothes, and furnished him spending money, etc. Further: "I heard Andrew, after he would find out that Charley had been down to see James' folks on Sansome street, abuse him about it. This would only happen after the tenants in the house, who used to play cards with them evenings, had retired. * * * He would say, 'I heard you have been down to your brother Jim's today;' and uncle Charley would not make any reply, and uncle Andrew would say, 'You damn dirty old fool, don't you know you ought to have better sense than to go there and see those people? You will allow those girls [having reference to uncle Jim's daughters] to kiss and love you and sponge all they can out of you; but it is not for love of you, but for love of your money, and, you damn old fool, you have not got sense enough to see through that.' * * * Uncle Andrew repeatedly told uncle Charles, 'Why, damn you, only for the way I went to court and lied like I did, and went around at the time of the law suit, you would not own one half of that property that you now own, that is your possession.' Charles would never make any answer. Uncle Andrew used to call uncle Charles an old crawler. * * * Generally in the morning we had a habit of getting up at half past seven or a little later, and if my uncle Andrew would get up before me my uncle Charley would say, 'How are you?' and I would say, 'All right;' 'Sleep good?' 'All right;' and my uncle Andrew would be in the dining room, and he would pull out a cat o' nine tails, and give me a good thrashing. I was not a bad boy, but was in bed. * * * When I would talk to uncle Charley about Andrew's licking me, he would say, 'Don't let your uncle Andy know that you are coming to me complaining; don't expect me to stick up for you, because you know how he abuses me; and if I should attempt to stick up for you in any manner I would get the same as you get.' Uncle Andy would pull me out of bed and lick me. He did this about half a dozen times during the six months that I was there. * * * I only heard Andrew call him a crawler from my bed. On no another occasion did I hear it. Uncle Charley appeared to me to be afraid of uncle Andrew. Uncle Charley told me that he was afraid uncle Andy would lick him if he would stick up for me. He says, 'Never ask me to stick up for you, because if I would make the least attempt to stick up for you when uncle Andrew is beating or abusing you, I would get the same from him.'" He also testified that his uncle Andrew used to beat his children, too, and that, when his uncle Charley said he had applied for letters of guardianship for him, (the witness,) uncle Andrew abused them both, saying that his brothers and sisters were grown up and working, and able to support him, (the witness,) and he ought to go to them, and not to uncle Charley. That he did not tell his father, or his brothers or sisters, about the beatings he received,—only complained to uncle Charley.

I think I have now made a full and fair statement of the contestants' case, and that the extracts given include all that can be claimed to bear upon the question whether Andrew McDevitt exercised, or attempted to exercise, any influence over the deceased as to the testamentary act. Does this testimony, admitting its entire truthfulness, taken in connection with the other uncontradicted evidence, make out a case for the contestants? I think it does not. The other facts have been already suggested. They are the undoubted mental soundness of the testator, the clear proof of his intelligent execution of the will; the fact that he alone instructed his attorney how to draw his will; and the entire absence of evidence that any pressure was brought to bear upon him at any time, by any one, in regard to the testamentary disposition of his estate. The scrivener did not know that any one else was aware that a will was contemplated. At all events, the decedent, unaided, gave him all his instructions. In fact, the only parties spoken to in regard to his testamentary intentions, so far as disclosed by the evidence, were the contestants themselves, except, perhaps, the witness Murray.

If efforts were made to prejudice the testator against the contestants, it is shown only by the testimony above set out, given by the younger Charles McDevitt. It had reference only to the children of James, with whom deceased had had trouble and litigation, and does not seem to have reference to testamentary favors which these children might expect, but to Andrew's fear that they were getting money from his brother Charles. It was three years at least before the execution of the will, but had they been made at the very time they would not have been sufficient, even then, of themselves, to throw the burden of proof upon the proponents, the mental competency of the testator being as clearly proven as in this case. As to the statement that the testator lived in fear of personal violence from his brother Andrew, it is simply incredible. Nor is it necessary to discredit the witness to come to this conclusion. Allowing that he said all that the witness affirms, it shows that he very properly refused to interfere with the order maintained by Andrew in his own house, and his statement of fear was to be rid of complaints. I understand the matter differently from the boy. To me it seems probable, from the statements, that his uncle approved of the punishment. What brutes it makes of both to suppose that Charles, when nothing had been said to him by Andrew about it, gratuitously believed that he, a man over 60 years of age, would have been whipped with a cat o' nine tails by his brother for merely suggesting that the boy ought not to be punished. Why did Charles remain with Andrew if he was so constantly abused and lived in such fear? He was able to provide for himself. He had then another brother living in San Francisco, and many affectionate nephews and nieces. Some were living in his own house, and he is represented as saying that he considered it his home, and would go there to live but for his brother Andrew. If constantly called such opprobrious names, and in fear, why did he not do so? Some people who are friendly still talk roughly, and we can only comprehend the condition here by supposing that these brothers were of that character. The evidence, however, refutes all suspicion that Andrew attempted, by flattery or simulated kindness, to get the good will of his brother and steal his inclinations in that way.

The will is not an undutiful will. Not to divide property equally among nephews and nieces does not make it an inequitable will. An uncle is under no obligations, ordinarily, to provide for his nephews, either when living or by his will. Failure to name them in the will does not under the statute raise a presumption that they were forgotten. Circumstances may be such that failure to provide for one who is a stranger in blood may seem inequitable. No such circumstances exist here with reference to any of the contestants. It has been held, however, that the mere fact that children are unprovided for and the estate given to strangers does not throw upon the beneficiaries the burden of proving fairness. Redf. Wills, 526, and cases. The will is not at variance with natural instincts. Charles McDevitt, the alleged testator, had no descendants, no one for whom a natural duty rested upon him to provide. He had quarreled with his brother James, and had had a lawsuit with him which must have been somewhat bitter. From the testimony of young Charles McDevitt, we must infer that Andrew in that quarrel had been a warm partisan of Charles. Soon after the trouble began he went to live with Andrew, who apparently had just married. He remained with Andrew 10 years, until his death, during which time he was generally more or less of an invalid, and several times was ill. At all these times, as during his last illness, he was cared for by Mrs. Andrew McDevitt. None of the contestants assisted or ever offered to assist in caring for him. Perhaps they had a valid reason for not doing so in their disagreements with Andrew about property. But nevertheless there is the fact. They were not present at these times of trial. The family of Andrew was present. Good feeling thus won does not invalidate the will, although the services may be rendered to induce testamentary favor. Five children were born in the house while the testator was an inmate. Contestants themselves concede that he was much attached to these children. He would have been less than human and they most unattractive if they did not get close to the old man's heart. For his board at the house of Andrew he never paid or offered to pay one cent. He required more money than he was getting for rents to improve his property. He borrowed some $3,700 from Andrew for this purpose. No part of this was ever paid, nor was any obligation given for it. Andrew was his only surviving brother, and the evidence only shows one sister, living in Massachusetts, whom he had not seen for years.

Is this will executed under such circumstances unnatural or inequitable? I think not. This being so, then I say that the testimony of the contestants, in connection with the clear and uncontradicted testimony that the will was dictated and executed by an understanding mind, in the absence of apparent restraint or influence, does not raise a presumption that Andrew McDevitt procured its execution by the use of undue influence. We are not called upon to approve the will, and may regret that the boy Charles was not provided for; but there was no duty resting upon the testator with reference to him, such as he would impute to a parent. Although I do not think it of special interest here, it is well to remember that one has a right to make an unjust will, an unreasonable will, or even a cruel will. Generally such questions turn our thoughts, as they are often intended to, from the only question at issue, which always is, only, is the will the spontaneous act of a competent testator? Of course, juries lean against wills which to them seem unequal or unjust. But the right to dispose of one's property by will is most solemnly assured by law, and is a most valuable incident to ownership, and does not depend upon its judicious use. The beneficiaries of a will are as much entitled to protection as any other property owners, and courts abdicate their functions when they permit the prejudices of a jury to set aside a will merely upon suspicion, or because it does not conform to their ideas of what was just and proper. General influence, not brought to bear upon the testamentary act, however strong or controlling, is not undue influence. There must be proof that the influence was used directly to procure the will, except in those cases where the beneficiaries or parties instrumental in having the will executed sustained a confidential relation to the testator. This case is not within the exception. In the long list of cases I have examined, the only further exception I find is that it has sometimes been held that when a testator is weak, physically and mentally, and those having exclusive access to him have procured what may be called an unnatural will,—one which we would conclude would be against the natural instincts of the testator,—a presumption is raised against the will. Evidence must be produced that pressure was brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act, but this evidence itself need not be direct. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient. It must, however, do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator. I think there is nothing beyond suspicion shown here. There is no proof. Circumstances have been proven which accord with the theory of undue influence, none of which are inconsistent with the hypothesis that the will was the free act of an intelligent mind. This does not amount to proof. And many circumstances are shown which are wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis of undue influence. And the presumption of law, in the absence of all proof in a contest, is in favor of the will. As to the order made after judgment, it is enough to say that I do not think this court should interfere with the action of the trial court. I think the judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, and that the order refusing to dismiss should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed. Motion to dismiss denied.

PENNIE v. ROACH. (No. 14,838.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 13, 1892.)

In bank.

On rehearing. For former report, see 29 Pac. Rep. 956.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied. In response to one point made in the petition for rehearing, we will say, in addition to the opinion heretofore filed, that that part of the decree in this case relating to the compensation and commissions of Philip A. Roach, deceased, properly construed, does not reserve any power to the superior court, sitting as a court of equity, to adjust, in this proceeding, the amount of commissions or compensation to be allowed to the administrators of the Blythe estate, or to apportion said amount among the respective administrators, but merely reserves the power to require payment to the defendant by the plaintiff or his successor of such sum as the probate court may award on final settlement of the Blythe estate to the representatives of Philip A. Roach, for his services as administrator.

In re MOORE'S ESTATE. (No. 14,275.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — WHEN APPOINTMENT CANNOT BE QUESTIONED — LIABILITY OF.

1. Where an executor qualified and acted for more than 20 years under his appointment, on appeal from his final settlement he will not be allowed to dispute the recitation in his appointment that citation to the heirs was issued and served.

2. Erecting a building on a lot belonging to the estate, and paying the rents thereof to the widow for the support of an infant legatee, is not a compliance with a bequest which directs the executor to keep a certain sum invested, and "allow the increase thereof to accumulate" for such infant; and the executor is liable for interest on the amount.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

On application of Ferris Jewett Moore, Jr., as legatee, the executor of the estate of Ferris Jewett Moore, deceased, was cited to render his final account. From the order settling his account the executor appeals. Reversed, and decree directed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Catlin & Blanchard, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial upon a contest over the final account of an executor. The testator died in 1868, leaving a widow and one child,—a son about 16 months old. The will was admitted to probate May 11, 1868, and the appellant was appointed executor, and at once qualified and entered upon his duties as such. He returned an inventory of the estate July 7, 1868, which showed personal property of the value of $15,176, and two lots in Sacramento, appraised at $1,461. The personal property consisted of solvent debts and a stock of goods. The latter were sold for nearly $1,000 above the appraised value after paying the expenses of sale, and the sale was approved April 27, 1870. Notice to creditors was duly published May 11, 1868. No claims against the estate were presented. The executor rendered no account of his administration until December, 1879, and then rendered no formal account as required by the statute, but only a statement of certain moneys received from his agent in charge of the property, or some of it, and disbursements made by him. In August, 1884, he filed a second account, which purports only to be a statement of receipts of rents and the disbursements of the same. A similar account, equally defective, was filed March 8, 1889. Having been cited to render a final account by the legatee, who had arrived at the age of majority, he filed what purports to be a final account June 21, 1889. This is little more than a recapitulation of the former reports, and also wholly fails to show what had become of the moneys received by the executor, except as to the rents of the real property received since the testator's death, which, it seems, amounted to $12,704. The court, however, proceeded to ascertain a balance from the evidence, and entered a final decree accordingly, adjudging the executor indebted to said estate in the sum of $12,577.50. No brief has been filed on behalf of the respondent.

The executor, on this appeal, objects that the order appointing him as such executor is void, because proper citations to the heirs were not issued and served. He took charge of the property of the estate as executor, having duly qualified under the order. For twenty odd years he has remained in possession, claiming no right save as executor, and now presents his final account as such, asking for a settlement and discharge, and in the very proceeding objects to the jurisdiction of the court. The order appointing him, and under which he qualified, recites that citations had been duly issued and served, and notices duly given according to law. If the notices were not in fact given, it was the fault of the appellant, and his taking possession of the estate was wrongful. He cannot make this objection. Moore v. Earl, 91 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. Rep. 1087. It seems that the executor, without authority, used some $5,000 of the money of the estate to erect a building upon one of the lots belonging to the estate in Sacramento. The rents of this building have since been paid to the surviving widow of the testator, who has supported Ferris Jewett Moore, Jr., son of the testator.

The ninth subdivision of the will is as follows: "I give and bequeath to my said executor the sum of three thousand, in trust of [for] my son, Ferris Jewett Moore, Jr., and I direct my said executor to invest and keep invested the said sum of three thousand dollars, and allow the increase thereof to accumulate; and when my said son shall arrive at his majority I direct my said executor to pay over to him the said sum and the increase thereof, and, in the event of the death of my said son during his minority, then the same shall go [to] my heirs forever." By the tenth subdivision the testator gave to his executor the residue of his estate after paying the debts, expenses, and other legacies, in trust to pay the interest thereon, and so much of the principal as might be necessary, to his widow for her support while she remained his widow, and for the support and education of his son until he should arrive at the age of majority. By a previous provision in the will the executor was authorized to sell at public or private sale all the property of the estate, real or personal, and convert the same into money or securities, and directed to pay all bequests, legacies, and appropriations in the will in United States legal tender currency, which the probate court construed to mean legal tender notes. The executor, as the court decided, did not make the investment directed by the ninth subdivision of the will, and therefore the court charged him with the $3,000, and credited him with $2,200, the cost in gold in 1870 of $3,000 legal tender notes. Legal interest was then computed upon this sum until the accounting. Appellant claims that he did invest this $3,000 in the building placed upon the lot belonging to the estate. This claim the probate court decided against him, and, we think, correctly. There are many cogent and obvious reasons for holding that the money expended in the erection of this building was not an investment under the ninth subdivision of the will; and, notwithstanding his positive testimony to that effect, it is also obvious that the executor himself did not so consider it. Under that subdivision he was required to allow the increase to accumulate. In fact he paid the rents to the mother of the legatee for his support, as he was required to do with the profits of the property held by him in trust under the tenth subdivision. We cannot see, however, what authority the court had to charge the executor with the difference between the value of the money held by him, as executor, in gold, and $3,000 in legal tender notes, which is virtually what it did by the method pursued. By the ninth subdivision Hathaway was vested with this money as trustee. Had the trustee named been a third person, the payment by the executor to such trustee would have entitled him to a credit for that amount. As he was himself the trustee, he should have procured an order distributing the amount to himself as trustee, and should have made the investment. Perhaps, had he in fact made the investment, the same result would have followed, and he would, as executor, have been entitled to a credit of that sum. But he procured no such partial distribution, and made no investment of the money. It would seem to follow, then, that he still held the money as executor, and his default consists in not promptly settling the estate. It was also found that he used the money in his own business. This would make him liable for interest. If these views are correct, the other points made do not seem to be of consequence. The result would be that the decree should be modified by simply deducting from the balance found the amount by which it was increased by charging the profit which would have been made if $3,000 in legal tender notes had been purchased, which can easily be done.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Vanclief, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to modify its decree settling the account of the appellant by charging him therein with the sum of $2,200 as the amount of the legacy given by Ferris Jewett Moore, Jr., by the last will and testament of Ferris Jewett Moore, deceased, instead of the sum of $3,000 in legal tender notes, and calculating interest on said sum of $2,200 in the same manner and for the same periods as it is calculated in the report of the referee on $3,000.

BLOOD v. WOODS. (No. 14,623.)

TOLL ROADS—DEDICATION—GRANT OF FRANCHISE BY SUPERVISORS.

1. The legislature in 1863 granted a 20-year franchise for a toll road between certain points. Plaintiff collected tolls on a road between those points for over 20 years after the grant of the franchise, but whether under authority thereof did not appear. Held, that as he was in possession, claiming the right to collect tolls, and made no claim under any other authority, it would be concluded that he claimed under the legislative franchise, which had expired by limitation.

2. One who without authority lays out a road, and permits the public to use it on payment of tolls, thereby dedicates it as a public road; and the portion used by those who, not going so far as the tollhouse, do not pay tolls, becomes a free public road, the use of which is not subject to the payment of tolls.

3. The board of supervisors of a county has no authority to grant a franchise to collect tolls on a free public road, and the attempt of the board so to do does not conclude inquiry as to the character of the road.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; C. V. GOTTSCHALK, Judge.

Action by Harvey S. Blood against George Woods to recover tolls. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reddick & Solinsky, for appellant. W. C. Green, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from a judgment taken within 60 days after its rendition. The action is to recover tolls claimed to be due from defendant for passing over plaintiff's alleged toll road. The validity of the franchise is questioned. An act of the legislature of this state, passed April 8, 1863, granted to certain persons named, to be incorporated as "Silver Mountain Turnpike Company," a franchise to construct and maintain a toll road from a point in Calaveras county to a point then in Mono county, now Alpine, the franchise to continue for 20 years, tolls to be fixed by the supervisors of Calaveras county. The record contains no direct evidence that the persons named, or their assigns, or the corporation ever constructed the road under this act. The plaintiff, however, testified: "I have been on this road twenty-seven years. It has been a toll road for the use of the public ever since that time. It has been a toll road ever since 1862. This is the same road referred to in the act of the legislature of this state of April 8, 1883. People have traveled over this road both in Calaveras county and in Alpine county ever since then by paying tolls." The road was known as the "Big Tree & Carson Toll Road," and the court finds from the above evidence that it is the road referred to in the act of the legislature. On the 7th day of April, 1887, the board of supervisors of the county of Calaveras passed the following ordinance: "Ordinance No. 20. The board of supervisors of the county of Calaveras do ordain as follows: (1) H. S. Blood is hereby granted the right, privilege, and franchise to collect tolls at a rate to be fixed by this board on that portion of the Big Tree & Carson Valley Toll Road situated and being in this county, to wit, beginning at the Big Trees, and extending easterly to the boundary line on said road between Calaveras and Alpine counties, for the period of ten years after the 23d day of April, 1887." Rates of toll were fixed, and plaintiff proceeded to collect tolls at Bear Valley station, which was in Alpine county. No tollgate had been authorized by the board of Calaveras county. May 7, 1890, the board of supervisors passed the following order: "Petition of H. S. Blood, owner of the franchise to collect tolls on the so-called 'Big Tree & Carson Valley Toll Road,' received and filed, petitioning this board to establish and fix a tollgate and place to collect tolls at Gardner's or Cold Spring ranch, about 2½ miles from the Big Trees, in Calaveras county; also petitioning this board to fix the rate of toll to be collected on this road for the ensuing year. On motion it was unanimously ordered that a tollgate and place to collect tolls on said road be, and the same is hereby, established at Gardner's house, on the said 'Cold Spring Ranch,' about 2½ miles from Big Trees, in Calaveras county, and the said H. S. Blood is hereby authorized and empowered to collect tolls on said road at said Gardner's house." The court found that the road in question was a free public road, and that the ordinance granting the franchise to plaintiff and the order authorizing a tollgate at Gardner's were void.

The appellant claims (1) that the evidence does not show that the road was a free public road, but, on the contrary, that it was a private toll road, belonging to him; (2) if it were a free public road, still the ordinance and order are valid; and (3) the ordinance is conclusive, and the court cannot go behind it to inquire whether the requisite facts to authorize the board to grant the franchise existed or not.

If the appellant can be regarded, under the evidence, as the successor of the beneficiaries of the act of the legislature, the answer to the first proposition is easy. By limitation, the franchise expired in 20 years, and the road became a free public highway. Section 2619, Pol. Code. This provision of the Code and the status of the road after the expiration of the franchise were fully considered in People v. Davidson, 79 Cal. 166, 21 Pac. Rep. 538. But the appellant contends that it was not shown that the persons or the company named in the act, or their assigns, ever constructed the road authorized by that act, or that he was the assignee of such persons, or ever collected toll under that franchise. He testifies that the road is the road authorized by that act; that ever since the passage of that act the public has been using the road, paying tolls for so doing; and that he has been there collecting tolls for 27 years. In other words, he has been in possession, claiming to own this franchise, and has enjoyed the benefit of it. Although the record is silent on that point, we must conclude that he has had the rates of toll fixed by the board and tollgates authorized. We cannot presume that he has demanded and received, for all these years, tolls as a wrongdoer. In fact, in his evidence and in his specifications he claims that the road was a toll road. It could only be made so by a grant of a franchise from some source. Such a grant is shown, and, as there is no claim that there was any other, we must conclude that the appellant claimed the right to collect tolls under that franchise. He certainly enjoyed the benefit of it, and cannot now escape the conditions of the franchise under the claim that his title was bad, and all his acts illegal and wrongful.

But the same consequence would follow if he could escape the conditions of the grant of the franchise by showing that his title was bad. In People v. Davidson, supra, it was held that the fact that tolls are demanded, and that the public uses the road only upon condition of paying tolls, does not affect the question of dedication. There is the offer of the land to the public, and an acceptance of the offer. That portion of the road which was in Calaveras county, up to 1890, had not only been used as a public road, but as a free public road, by all who did not travel as far as Bear Valley, in Alpine county. The defendant and his neighbors had had the free use of it. If plaintiff had no franchise, there was nothing to connect it with his road in Alpine county. It was a road thrown open to the public, and accepted and used by it. These acts would constitute a dedication.

This brings us to the question, conceding that it had become a free public road, could the board grant to plaintiff a franchise to collect tolls thereon? To establish his position appellant points out that, prior to the passage of the county government act, subdivision 4, § 4046, Pol. Code, authorized boards of supervisors to lay out and control public roads, turnpikes, etc.; and in subdivision 17, § 4046, to grant licenses and franchises, as provided by law, for constructing, keeping, and taking tolls on roads, etc. These provisions were re-enacted in the county government act in 1883. This act was amended in 1889, (St. 1889, p. 233.) Subdivision 4, § 25, of this act reads: "The boards of supervisors in their respective counties have jurisdiction and power, under such limitations and restrictions as are prescribed by law, * * * (4) to lay out, maintain, control, erect, and manage public roads, turnpikes, ferries, bridges within the county, and to grant franchises and licenses to collect tolls thereon." These general statements, grouping and to some extent defining the power of the board, cannot be held to place the board above the procedure elsewhere prescribed, which often very materially limits the jurisdiction and power apparently conferred by this general language, and in the amendment to the county government act, above quoted, the power is expressly limited and restricted.

Turning now to the provisions as to toll roads, we find, commencing with section 2779 of the Political Code, a chapter with reference to toll roads. Article 1 is entitled, "Construction of Toll Roads;" and the first section in the chapter prescribes a procedure where the company requires the use of the power of eminent domain. It will be seen that the board must appoint commissioners to lay out the road, and that they control the location. Section 2789, in this chapter, prescribes what shall be done where the company has no occasion to condemn lands. Then follow many provisions in regard to construction and management, erection of bridges, tollgates, etc. To a large extent these roads are placed under the control of the board of supervisors. In the Civil Code, commencing with section 512, are provisions defining, even more minutely, what shall be done to establish toll roads. Toll roads are public roads, as much so as free public highways, and the statutes relied upon by appellant confer the power to manage and control them upon boards of supervisors, as public roads. The public roads, therefore, upon which the board may regulate the collection of tolls, are the roads so constructed, and the mode in which the board must exercise the power to grant such franchises is prescribed by the statutes and procedure alluded to. Appellant relies for authority upon People v. Davidson, supra. There was no such question before the court in that case. It was not claimed that the road, before the granting of the franchise, was a public highway. The only questions discussed, as stated by the court itself, were whether the use by the public of the road, upon condition of paying tolls, amounted to a dedication, and whether, when the franchise defendant claimed to have had, expired, the road became a free public road. So far as these two questions are concerned, I have based this decision largely upon that case. Nothing further was there decided.

That the board of supervisors has no authority to grant a franchise to collect tolls upon a free public highway was expressly held in El Dorado County v. Davison, 30 Cal. 521. Does the fact that the board has attempted to grant a franchise to collect tolls imply that the board has decided that the road is not a free public highway, but is a toll road, within the meaning of this opinion, and, if so, is that conclusion one that can be questioned collaterally? The granting of a franchise is a legislative act. It is the use of delegated power, and the board cannot exceed its authority. No case has been cited, and I know of none, in which the right to inquire whether the power has been used upon a subject-matter not within the grant of power has been questioned, in whatever form it becomes material. In cases where the right to exercise the power depends upon the existence of some fact which the board may or may not be authorized to determine, the board, as to such preliminary matter, acts in a capacity somewhat different. Whether courts can go behind such a conclusion has been, and perhaps is, a vexed question. But it is not involved here. No such authority is given the board, and the point is that the act is not within the authority delegated to the board, and could not be done under any circumstances. The act of accepting a road as one constructed under the authority of the Code, and of fixing tolls, is to some extent a judicial act. But I see nothing in this which can preclude inquiry. To give these acts that effect would enable the board to do an act wholly outside of its authority, and then, by a subsequent assertion, place it beyond question. Certainly this cannot be done. The cases cited by appellant have no bearing upon the question. It is not necessary that the board of supervisors should cause a road to be recorded as such, to render a strip of land dedicated to the public as a public road a legal public highway. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LA RUE et al. (No. 13,288.)

WHARFINGERS—LIABILITIES ON BONDS.

Under Pol. Code, § 2523, giving the board of state harbor commissioners authority to "institute and prosecute to final judgment actions * * * for the collection of money due or that may become due," recovery on the official bond of a wharfinger for money collected and not paid over by him is not affected by a change in the law after the delinquency complained of, transferring the duty of collecting money from wharfingers to other officers.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. H. Rearden, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California against H. M. La Rue and A. S. Greenlaw as sureties on the bond of William M. Haynie, wharfinger. Judgment for plaintiff, and order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

J. F. Wendell and W. H. Burrows, for appellants. T. C. Coogan and F. S. Stratton, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action is brought against the defendants, as the sureties on the bond of one William M. Haynie, as wharfinger, appointed by the board of state harbor commissioners, to recover certain moneys lost to the said board by the delinquency of said Haynie. The cause was tried before a jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $800.30. Judgment was rendered accordingly. Upon motion made for a new trial the court granted the same, unless the plaintiff should remit a certain portion of the judgment. This the plaintiff did, and a new trial was then, by an order, duly denied. From the judgment given and made in the premises, and from the order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken.

Two contentions are made for a reversal of the judgment and order: (1) That the board of harbor commissioners have prosecuted the action without authority of law, because not done on the relation of the attorney general. (2) That Haynie, the principal on the bond sued on, was appointed in March, 1880, removed from office on the 6th of March, 1883, after the delinquency complained of had taken place, and the action was commenced after a change was made in the statute, whereby the duties of the wharfinger as existing while Haynie was in office were conferred upon another officer, called a "collector." It is contended that after the passage of the amendment to section 2522 of the Political Code,[1] on March 7, 1883, (the day following the removal of Haynie from office,) the board of state harbor commissioners could not sue for moneys which had been collected and not paid by a wharfinger, as said amendment had taken the collection of moneys from wharfingers, and imposed it upon collectors. We do not perceive how this change in the law, made after the duty was violated, could take away the right to make this wrongdoer responsible for his act, which right existed when he did the act complained of; for while, under the provisions of section 2522 as amended in 1883, the duties of a wharfinger, in a matter such as this in hand, were taken from him, as such officer, and put upon a collector, section 2523 of the same Code, which was enacted in 1876, was in full force when the delinquency of Haynie took place, and was not changed when this action was brought. Said section provides, among other things, that the board of state harbor commissioners "may institute and prosecute to final judgment actions in the name of the people of the state of California * * * for the collection of any money due, or that may become due, by authority of this article." Article 9, pt. 3, tit. 6, Pol. Code. This money had become due under this article before the change in the law. Hence we think the authority existed to bring this action, and to prosecute it to final judgment, as was done. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Belcher, C.

Redd v. Murry et ux. (No. 13,555.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

Deed—Sufficiency of Description—Quieting Title—Evidence.

1. Where a deed conveyed land as a numbered block, as marked on the plat of the grantor's addition to a town, this evidences the existence as against him of such a plat; and evidence tending to show a survey of the town prior to the conveyance, and that the grantor produced the plat in question some years afterwards as such plat, is sufficient to identify it as that mentioned in the deed. Sharpstein and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

2. Such plat, although on its face furnishing no data for locating the particular block in question, is sufficiently definite if, with the aid of parol evidence, the land can be identified from it. Sharpstein and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

3. Where the ownership of land, described in a deed as a numbered block, as marked on a plat produced, is put in issue by a denial of the allegation of ownership in the complaint, the plaintiff must prove title; and the decree for plaintiff, following the metes and bounds of the block as alleged in the complaint, is erroneous, in the absence of evidence identifying them as those of the block described in the deed. Sharpstein and McFarland, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W W. Cross, Judge.

Action by Redd against J. P. Murry and wife to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

For former report, see 24 Pac. Rep. 841.

Brown & Daggett, for appellants. N. O. Bradley and G. E. Lawrence, for respondent.

De Haven, J. Action to quiet title. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court, and the defendants appeal. The plaintiff claims the land in controversy by virtue of a deed made to her by the defendant J. P. Murry in June, 1871, in which the land conveyed to her is described as "situate, lying, and being in Porterville, county of Tulare, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: On the north, two hundred and forty feet on Mill street; on the east, one hundred and ten feet on a thirty-foot alley; on the south, two hundred and forty feet on an alley; on the west, one hundred and ten feet by a thirty-foot alley; and being all of lots Nos. one, two, three, and four, all of block No. eight, as per plat of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville, Tulare county, California." The defendant Martha Murry is the wife of plaintiff's grantor, and bases her claim to the land in dispute upon a deed made to her by her husband subsequently to the execution of the above-mentioned deed to plaintiff.

1. Plaintiff's deed is not upon its face void for uncertainty, as claimed by appellants, and parol evidence was properly admitted for the purpose of identifying the plat offered in evidence by her as the one referred to in such deed. It was incumbent upon plaintiff to produce, or, in the event of its loss or destruction, give secondary evidence of the contents of the maps referred to in her deed, as without such map there was no sufficient description of the land which the deed purported to convey, (Caldwell v. Center, 30 Cal. 542;) and the court did not err in admitting in evidence the map offered by plaintiff, and claimed by her to be the one mentioned in such deed. It is true no witness testified to having seen this particular map at any time prior to 1873, which was two years after the execution of plaintiff's deed, but still we think there was sufficient evidence before the court to justify it in finding that such plat was in existence at the date of that deed, and is the one to which reference is there made. The defendant J. P. Murry, in his deed to plaintiff, having described the land conveyed as block No. 8, as marked on the plat of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville, such deed is of itself, as against him and his codefendant, who claims under him by a subsequent conveyance, sufficient proof of the fact there was such a plat in existence when he made his deed to plaintiff. Patton v. Goldsborough, 9 Serg. & R. 53. There was also evidence given which tended to show that such an addition to the town of Porterville was in fact surveyed prior to 1871, and that defendant J. P. Murry himself produced this map some years afterwards, as the plat of Johnson & Murry's addition to that town. We think these facts were amply sufficient to identify the map in question as the one mentioned in the deed, and entitled it to be admitted in evidence.

2. It is claimed by appellant that the map is upon its face void for uncertainty, and that it furnishes no starting point or data from which a surveyor or any other person could locate the particular lots or block described in the deed, and that the court should have so held as a matter of law, and excluded it as evidence. We do not think the court committed any error in overruling this objection of appellant. It is true that no field notes accompanied it, nor are there upon it any signs or letters to indicate the different points of the compass, or any express designation of it as the map of any particular place. But there is shown upon its face streets and alleys and blocks subdivided into lots, a country road, and a river. Many of the streets are named, and the blocks are numbered, and it may be that persons acquainted with the locality of which it is claimed to be a map would at once recognize it as such. It certainly cannot be said, as a matter of law, that they could not, or that it would be impossible for one familiar with the town of Porterville, and Johnson & Murry's addition thereto, to locate upon the ground the block of land described in plaintiff's deed, with reference to the streets marked in this plat, and, this being so, the map is not void upon its face. Whether the block in question is capable of being thus identified is a pure question of fact, and upon this point the oral evidence of persons who are acquainted with the town of Porterville, and what is known as Johnson & Murry's addition thereto, and with the different streets or other objects shown on the map, is admissible. If the land which plaintiff's deed purported to convey can be thus identified, with the aid of the map referred to, the map is sufficiently definite, and the deed is not void for insufficiency in its description of the same.

3. The court found that plaintiff is the owner of block 8 of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville, and that it is more particularly described as "commencing at a point on the south boundary line of Mill street in said town of Porterville, thirty feet east of the northeast corner of lot five, in block twenty; thence running easterly along said boundary line of Mill street two hundred and forty feet; thence southerly, at right angles, one hundred and ten feet; thence westerly, at right angles, two hundred and forty feet; thence northerly one hundred and ten feet to the place of beginning," and thereupon entered a judgment quieting the title of plaintiff to the land thus described. The appellants contend that this finding is against the evidence, and it seems to us that, in so far as it states that plaintiff is the owner of the land therein particularly described by metes and bounds, this contention of appellants must be upheld. The evidence before the court would support a finding and judgment to the effect that plaintiff is the owner of block 8 as marked on the plat of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville, but there is nothing in the record before us which tends in any degree to show that this block would fall within the specific metes and bounds mentioned in the findings and judgment of the court below. If the plaintiff desired that the judgment quieting her title to the land in controversy should give a more definite description of its boundaries than is contained in the deed under which she claims, she should have introduced evidence showing that the land, which is simply referred to as a block in that deed, could also be properly described by the specific metes and bounds given in the decree. It may be that this can be shown by witnesses who know its location, but, in the absence of all evidence upon the point, the court was not justified in finding that the land which it describes in the decree by specific metes and bounds is the block 8, conveyed by plaintiff's deed.

4. The plaintiff contends, however, that under the pleadings the fact is admitted that block 8 of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville is also correctly described by the specific metes and bounds given in the judgment of the court, and that for this reason she was not required to prove the fact. We do not so construe the pleadings. The complaint, after alleging plaintiff's ownership of block 8, as marked on the plat of Johnson & Murry's addition to the town of Porterville, proceeds by way of recital to state that said block is particularly described according to certain specific metes and bounds, which are the same as those mentioned by the court below in its findings and judgment. The answer, without taking any special issue with the recital contained in the complaint as to the boundaries of the block claimed by plaintiff, simply denies that plaintiff is the owner of the land described in the complaint, or any part thereof. This was all defendants were required to do in order to throw upon plaintiff the burden of proving that she was the owner of the land mentioned in the complaint. It was unnecessary to particularly traverse the recital in the complaint as to the boundaries of the land claimed by plaintiff. The material allegation of the complaint is that which asserts plaintiff's ownerhip of the land described; and when this alleged fact was put in issue, as it was by the answer, the plaintiff was not entitled to a decree quieting her title to such land, no matter how it might be described, without proof that she had title to it; and the production of a deed which only described the land conveyed as a certain block, with reference to a plat, did not itself, in connection with the plat which was given in evidence upon the trial, show that such block might also be just as correctly described by the specific boundaries contained in the decree, and that, therefore, the land within such specific boundaries was conveyed by such deed.

NILES v. EDWARDS. (No. 13,050.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

SUPREME COURT — POWERS OF COURT IN BANK—REHEARING—MODIFYING JUDGMENT—RECORDING ORDER.

1. Under Const. art. 6, one supreme court is constituted, whose jurisdiction is exercised coordinately either in department or in bank; but the court in bank exercises supervisory jurisdiction over the action of the court in department, the exercise of which by the justices of the court may be without a distinct order that the cause be heard in bank.

2. The provision in the constitution that, within 30 days after judgment pronounced in a cause by a department of the supreme court, it may be ordered to be heard and decided in bank, is merely a provision for the consideration and determination thereof after judgment, and does not imply an additional or oral argument, the court having discretion to hear on the record and arguments or to direct additional arguments; and the word "heard" signifies the consideration, as distinguished from the trial, of a cause, and the court has control and jurisdiction of a cause for that period; and the department that pronounced the judgment itself, the court in bank, or the justices of the court may proceed to reconsider the cause, and to modify, correct, or vacate the judgment, and do so of its own motion.

3. The action of the court is not dependent upon entry of its orders by the clerk, but upon the fact of the order made, which having been shown, it is as effective as if entered of record.

In bank.

Motion for remittitur upon the judgment for plaintiff, originally pronounced, in department 2, in the action of Elizabeth Niles against William Edwards, upon the grounds that the court in bank had no jurisdiction to modify said judgment until the cause has been heard in bank, and that the order modifying said judgment was not entered by the clerk till after 30 days therefrom. Denied. For former reports, see 27 Pac. Rep. 159, 296.

HARRISON, J. Upon an opinion that had been prepared in this cause by Mr. Commissioner TEMPLE, the court in department 2 made an order on the 29th of June, 1891, reversing the judgment, and directing the court below to enter a judgment on the findings in favor of the plaintiff. Subsequently thereto an application was made on behalf of the respondent that the cause be heard in bank, and on the 29th of July, 1891, an order was made by the court in bank modifying the judgment that had been rendered by the department, and directing that the cause be remanded for a new trial. An opinion embodying the reasons for this modification was at the same time prepared, but it was not filed with the clerk, nor was the order entered in his minutes until the next day. For a report of the case, see 90 Cal. 10, 27 Pac. Rep. 159, 296. The appellant has moved for a remittitur upon the judgment originally pronounced in department 2, upon the ground that the court in bank has no jurisdiction to modify the judgment of a department until after the cause has been heard in bank upon an order therefor, and also upon the ground that the order modifying the judgment was not entered in the minutes of the clerk until after the expiration of 30 days from the time when the judgment had been pronounced in the department.

Under the constitution of this state there is but one supreme court, and the jurisdiction which is vested in it may be exercised either in bank or in department, and in either case its exercise is of equal import. The jurisdiction of the court in bank and in department is co-ordinate, and although in bank it may exercise a control over the action of a department, yet such jurisdiction is supervisory rather than appellate. As the constitution requires the court to "always be open for the transaction of business," any order that is made by a majority of the justices is an order of the court in bank, and the exercise by the justices of this supervisory control of the action of a department is the action of the court in bank. Nor is it necessary for the exercise of this supervisory jurisdiction that a distinct order be made that the cause be heard in bank. The modification by the court of the action of a department implies that it has already given to such action its consideration, and includes or dispenses with the formal order therefor. The provision in the constitution that within 30 days after judgment has been pronounced in a cause by a department an order may be made that it be heard and decided in bank is merely a provision that the cause may, after such judgment, be considered and determined by the court in bank, and does not necessarily imply that an additional or oral argument must be made or listened to before it can be so considered and determined. The term "heard," as here used, is taken from the practice in equity procedure, and corresponds to the term "trial," as used in cases at law. It signifies the consideration and determination of a cause by the court or by a judge, as distinguished from a trial of a cause, which is a term more properly predicated of its determination by a jury. See 3 Bl. Comm. 451, 453; Akerly v. Vilas, 24 Wis. 171; Merritt v. Portchester, 8 Hun, 45. This construction finds support from a consideration of the subsequent clauses of the same section, viz., that the concurrence of four justices "present at the argument" is necessary for a judgment by the court in bank; and that, if four justices "so present" do not concur in a judgment, all the justices qualified to "sit" in the cause "shall hear the argument." These clauses are not to be construed as requiring that a judgment cannot be pronounced by the court in bank unless concurred in by four of the justices who were physically present at an oral argument, or that all of the justices qualified to "sit" shall literally "hear" an argument; although it may be conceded that whenever there is an oral argument only the justices who were present at such argument would be authorized to take part in the decision of the cause. The meaning of these clauses and the construction to be given them are that the argument shall be "considered" by the court, or by those of the justices who are qualified to "act" in the cause, and that the judgment to be rendered shall be concurred in by four of the justices of the court.

The provision that a judgment pronounced in department shall not become final until the expiration of 30 days, unless approved in writing by the chief justice and two associate justices, has merely the effect to make definite by a constitutional requirement that which, prior to the adoption of the present constitution, existed only by virtue of a rule of court. Within this period of 30 days the case is still within the jurisdiction of the court, and the judgment, as well as the opinion, is subject to its control, and may be changed, modified, or vacated by the court, either in the department in which it was heard or in bank. The provision that the judgment shall become final, unless within that time an order be made that the cause be heard in bank, has only the effect to limit the time within which the judgment may be changed or modified, but it does not deprive the court of its inherent power to modify or change its judgment without such order, so long as the cause is still pending before it, and has not become final. "It is one of the inherent powers of every appellate court to revise, to modify, and to correct its judgments, so long as they are under its control." In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 466, 21 Pac. Rep. 976, and 22 Pac. Rep. 742, 1028. By the constitution the judgment that has been pronounced by the court in department is for 30 days thereafter "under the control" of the court,—not merely under the control of the department which pronounced the judgment, but of the court in bank as well,—and during that time the court—either the department which pronounced the judgment, or in bank—has the authority to modify or to correct the judgment in any particular which it may deem essential to justice. In Jessup's Case, supra, page 472, 81 Cal., and page 1032, 22 Pac. Rep., the following propositions were held: "(1) The perfecting of an appeal gives us jurisdiction of a cause, and that jurisdiction lasts until a remittitur is regularly issued; (2) while the cause remains subject to our jurisdiction, we have the power derived from the constitution to grant a rehearing after judgment, just as we have the power, independent of legislative enactment, to reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment of the inferior court, and to enforce our own judgment; (3) by the constitution a majority, consisting of four justices, may decide any matter within our jurisdiction."

In the exercise of its power to hear a cause in bank after a judgment thereon has been pronounced in department, the court is not limited to an application therefor by a party to the cause, or to the grounds upon which such application may be made, but this power may be exercised by it upon its own motion, irrespective of such application. The department that pronounced the judgment may itself modify or vacate the same, as may also the court in bank, or a majority of the justices of the court. An application that a cause may be so heard, whether addressed to the chief justice or to the court, is in fact an application to the court in bank; and it has been the invariable practice of the court since its organization to consider such applications, when convened in bank. Although the application may be granted upon the order of the chief justice, with the concurrence of two associate justices, yet the order is none the less the result of a consideration by the court in bank, and is to be regarded as the action of the court in bank, by virtue of the provision in the constitution that an order so made shall have the same effect as if made by a majority of the members of the court. When, therefore, the court in bank, or a majority of the justices, in the exercise of this supervisory control over the action of a department, determines that the judgment or opinion of the department should be modified, or that it is erroneous, it has the power to correct such error or to make such modification therein as the nature of the case or justice may seem to demand. Whether this shall be done upon the record already before it in the cause, including the arguments theretofore presented, or whether the court will direct additional argument, rests in its own discretion, and such discretion is to be exercised according to the exigencies of the individual case. This is the construction which has been invariably given to this section of the constitution. At the first session of the court subsequent to the adoption of the present constitution, after a judgment had been pronounced in department, the court in bank modified the opinion that had been rendered by the department. Langley v. Voll, 54 Cal. 435. See, also, to the same point, Aldrich v. Willis, 55 Cal. 86; Pulliam v. Bennett, Id. 368. In Pollard v. Putnam, 54 Cal. 630, a judgment had been rendered by the court in department reversing the cause, and remanding it to the court below, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of the defendant; and thereafter the court in bank, without making any order that the cause be heard in bank, modified the judgment by remanding the cause for a new trial. Similar action was had in Withers v. Little, 56 Cal. 373; People v. Miles, Id. 402; and in many other subsequent cases. In Falkner v. Hendy, 80 Cal. 638, 22 Pac. Rep. 401, the court in bank made a radical change in the judgment that had been pronounced in department, without ordering the cause to be heard in bank. The department has itself modified its own judgment. O'Connor v. Flynn, 57 Cal. 297. These instances (and many more might be added) of the construction given to the constitution by those who were first called upon to expound it have been followed so frequently, and the practice has been so uniform, that, if we had any doubts as to its correctness, we would not feel authorized now to give such a construction as would imply that our predecessors were in error.

The order of the court was not rendered nugatory by reason of the failure of the clerk to enter it in his minutes. The constitution declares that this court "shall always be open for the transaction of business," while the duties of the clerk are by the constitution left to be defined by the legislature, (article 6, § 11;) and, under the statute prescribing his duties, (Pol. Code, § 1030,) he is not required to keep his office open upon holidays, or upon any day except between the hours of 10 A. M. and 4 P. M. The action of the court does not depend upon the entry of its orders by the clerk, but upon the fact that the orders have been made, and, whenever it is shown that an order has been made by the court, it is as effective as if it had been entered of record by the clerk. It was held in Adams v. Dohrmann, 63 Cal. 417, that although the last day of the 30 days within which an order granting a hearing in bank may be made, fell upon a holiday, yet, inasmuch as the constitution provides that this court shall always be open for the transaction of business, such holiday was one of the 30 days within which such action must be taken. Inasmuch, however, as the court has the entire period of 30 days within which to take such action, it must result that any action taken upon that day is to be given effect, although the office of the clerk be not open for the purpose of making a record in his minutes of such action, and although no record thereof be made until after the expiration of the 30 days. The same principle makes effective any action of the court that may be taken after the office hours of the day, and the closing of his office by the clerk. The subsequent entry in his minutes does not give any greater effect to the order, but merely perpetuates by record the action of the court. The effect of the order of the court is determined by the fact that it was made within the limits of its constitutional authority, and any mode which the court itself may adopt for the purpose of authenticating its action is sufficient. The motion is denied.

CREDITORS' BILL—PLEADING—PARTIES.

1. A creditors' bill, based on a valid and subsisting judgment, wholly unsatisfied, against an insolvent corporation, need not allege that the judgment was based on a valid and subsisting debt.

2. In such a suit, an objection of defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff cannot be taken by general demurrer on the ground that other creditors should be joined when the complaint does not show on its face that there are other creditors.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLOR, Judge.

Action by Henry L. Tatum and others against E. Rosenthal and others in the nature of a creditors' bill to recover the amount of a judgment debt against an insolvent corporation in which defendants owned part paid-up shares. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Whitworth & Shurtleff, for appellants. George A. Rankin, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action is in the nature of a creditor's bill to compel certain subscribers to the capital stock of an insolvent corporation to account for and pay in the unpaid portion of their subscriptions, to the satisfaction, as far as it may, of a judgment obtained against the corporation, upon which execution had been returned wholly unsatisfied. Demurrers were filed to the complaint, which alleged, among other matters, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to show a cause of action. The demurrers were overruled, and answers were filed. A trial was had which resulted in a judgment for plaintiffs against certain of the defendants. Some of the latter have appealed from the judgment, and the only points made in their briefs for its reversal are:

1. That the complaint does not allege the indebtedness upon which the judgment set out in the complaint was recovered. As to this, it can be said that, when this judgment was rendered against the corporation, it established its liability conclusively, so far as a judgment can, to pay the debt. It concluded the stockholder, in a case like this, who was in privity with the corporation; and is valid until reversed in a direct proceeding. Thomp. Liab. Stockh. § 329. This being so, we can perceive no good reason why it should be alleged that this valid and subsisting judgment was also founded upon a valid and subsisting debt.

2. It is claimed that in all bills of the kind here involved it is essential that it should be alleged in the complaint that the proceedings are for the benefit of all the creditors of the insolvent corporation. It is true that in actions of this sort the fund realized from the payments by the subscribers to the capital stock was in equity equally a fund belonging to all the creditors, and in the distribution of it, if it appeared to the court that there were other creditors than those instituting the suit, it would be the duty of that tribunal to distribute to them their pro rata share of the fund. And this rule proceeds upon the idea that no one creditor can secure the payment of his debt to the exclusion of other creditors. Handley v. Stutz, 137 U. S. 369, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 117. But we do not think that under our statute, where the facts are as stated here, viz., that the judgment debt exists, that the corporation is insolvent, that the subscribers owe a certain sum on their unpaid subscriptions, that the execution issuing on the judgment has been returned wholly unsatisfied, and it does not appear from the complaint that there are any other creditors of the corporation,—that it should be held, because of the defect of or misjoinder of other creditors, or the failure to allege that the complaint is filed for the benefit of all creditors, that, upon a general demurrer, such as here involved, the complaint is bad. It would seem that such an objection must be taken by special demurrer, as for a defect or misjoinder of parties plaintiff, where it appears from the face of the complaint, as it does not here, that there are other creditors who should be made parties; or by an answer, if there are other creditors who should be joined, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 430, 433;) and, if this be not done, the defect or misjoinder is waived, (Id. § 434.) None of the cases cited to us involve this precise point, but Mr. Thompson, in his work on the Liability of Stockholders, has this to say upon the question, at section 351: "It has long been settled that a judgment creditor who has exhausted his legal remedy by an execution returned nulla bona may alone or with other judgment creditors file a bill against persons holding property of the debtor, which, on account of fraud or the existence of a trust, cannot be reached by execution." This doctrine seems to be sustained by good authority. Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 467, where it is also said: "Where a case exists in which a fund can only be divided satisfactorily among a certain class of persons, it is necessary to frame the decree in such a manner as that all those persons may be brought in for their distributive shares; but even then the bill may often be filed by any one of them on his own behalf. It is only when it appears to the court by the subsequent pleadings or otherwise that a distribution must be made (as where an executor pleads want of sufficient assets) that a decree will be made for the benefit of all." The party objecting here is not a creditor, who says he has not been made a party, nor does it appear that any such has asked to be made a party, or that there are any other creditors. It would seem, therefore, that, if the defendants were of the opinion that other parties should be joined as plaintiffs, they should, under our statute, and under the complaint, have pleaded by answer the nonjoinder of parties plaintiff. We are strengthened in our view of this matter from the fact that in Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448, where one creditor alone filed a bill, there did not seem to be any question made but what he could bring the action alone, and it was said: "It appears to us to be well settled that a suit such as was instituted by the plaintiff properly lies in a court of equity, unaffected by any remedy the creditor may have under the provisions of the constitution and the statutes." We perceive no merits in the points made, and advise that the judgment be affirmed.

Theilman v. Superior Court of Alameda County et al. (No. 15,013.)

Mandamus to Judge—Dismissal of Suit.

Both plaintiff and defendant in a suit for divorce desired its dismissal, but defendant's motion to dismiss was resisted by plaintiff's attorneys, on the ground that fees were due them from plaintiff. The court refused to dismiss, on the ground that plaintiff's attorneys of record had absolute right to control the action in her behalf. Held that, even though the suit should have been dismissed, mandamus will not lie to compel the court to dismiss it, since plaintiff, if she wishes a dismissal, has an adequate remedy in a substitution of attorneys, and, as to defendant, plaintiff's affidavit and prayer for dismissal constitute a condonation by which he can at any time defeat the action.

In bank.

Petition by M. C. Theilman for a writ of mandamus to compel the judge of the superior court of Alameda county to dismiss an action. Writ denied.

T. C. Van Ness and L. A. Redman, for petitioner. Dodge & Fry, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This is an original petition in this court for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to dismiss a certain action pending before them entitled Theilman vs. Theilman. L. D. Theilman, through her attorneys Dodge & Fry, commenced an action in the court of respondents against her husband, M. C. Theilman, to obtain a divorce. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint and overruled. Defendant then filed an answer, and the action is now pending and undetermined. The plaintiff, on March 8, 1892, made an affidavit that she did not desire to further prosecute the action, and prayed the court to dismiss it. Thereupon the defendant, M. C. Theilman, (petitioner herein,) upon notice to plaintiff's attorneys, moved the court to dismiss the action. At the hearing of the motion plaintiff's attorneys filed a written objection to the dismissal, which was based entirely upon the fact that plaintiff owed them a certain sum of money as attorneys' fees in the case, and in which they consented to the dismissal upon condition that said sum should be paid them. The objection was accompanied by the affidavit of one of plaintiff's said attorneys, showing the amount due them from plaintiff for legal services in the case. The court denied the motion. In the order denying it the court recites the fact that counsel for defendant were asked if they would pay said attorneys' fees, and declined to do so, and that plaintiff declined to consent to the dismissal unless their fee was paid, and contended that the action could not be dismissed without their consent while they remained attorneys of record; and the order declared that the motion was denied "on the ground that Messrs. Dodge & Fry, being attorneys of record for plaintiff, had the absolute right to control the action in her behalf." Thereupon the defendant (petitioner herein) commenced this proceeding to compel the respondents herein to dismiss said action.

It is not necessary to determine whether the respondents erred in refusing to dismiss the action. From the briefs we learn that the refusal to dismiss was based upon the authority of San Jose v. Younger, 29 Cal. 147. It may be remarked that the facts in that case were very different from the facts in this case. There it appears that the plaintiffs had authorized the dismissal of the action "under a misapprehension as to its true condition, and that they would not have done so had they been fully advised." The attorneys for plaintiff in that case refused to consent to the dismissal in order to protect the interest of their clients. They objected on behalf of their clients, and the court held that a client should have the benefit of the judgment and advice of his counsel, and that the control of a case by counsel was a "safeguard to the client against the intrigues of his adversary." But in Theilman v. Theilman it expressly appeared that counsel for plaintiff did not object to the dismissal "on behalf of" their client. They admitted that the dismissal was proper, and objected only on account of their fee, and were willing to consent if their fee was paid. Under these circumstances, it may be considered doubtful if San Jose v. Younger applies, particularly as the case was for a divorce. However, it is clear, we think, that mandamus will not lie. The plaintiff in Theilman v. Theilman, if she still wishes to dismiss the action, has an adequate remedy in a substitution of attorneys; and her affidavit and prayer for a dismissal constitute a condonation by which the defendant (petitioner herein) can at any time defeat the action. The prayer of the petitioner is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

Crane v. Barnard et al. (No. 14,694.)

Mortgages—Foreclosure—Decree—Costs.

1. In an action by the assignee of a mort gage for foreclosure, and the enforcement of a street assessment against the land, which he had paid, and for personal judgment on indorsement against the mortgagee for deficiency, if any, (the right to a personal judgment against the mortgagor having been lost by his decease and the mortgagee's failure to present the claim against the estate,) where the mortgagee denied the validity of the street assessment, and the owners of the land in their separate answers admitted "the truth of the allegations in the complaint," it was proper to order from the proceeds of the sale (1) payment of the mortgage, (2) payment of the street assessment, (3) the surplus, if any, to be paid to the owners of the land; and, in case of deficiency to pay the mortgage, then judgment therefor against the mortgagee alone.

2. Where a party appeals from a judgment in his favor, and the judgment roll fails to show that he filed or served a cost bill or moved for judgment for costs, he cannot complain that the court refused to allow him costs.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by Newton W. Crane against Charles Barnard and others to foreclose a mortgage, etc. From the decree entered plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Wilde, for appellant. E. S. Hall, J. Hamar, and Blackstock & Shepherd, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. On February 1, 1888, Robert W. Forth made his promissory note to the defendant Barnard for $400, payable one year after date, with interest at 1 per cent. per month, and to secure the same executed to Barnard a mortgage of same date on a lot of land situate in the town of San Buenaventura, county of Ventura. May 28, 1888, Forth died intestate. On June 16, 1888, the widow, Caroline, was appointed administratrix of Forth's estate. Publication of notice to creditors to present their claims within four months was duly made, commencing on June 22, 1888; but Barnard failed to present his note or mortgage within the four months, or at all. On March 14, 1889, Barnard assigned the note and mortgage to the plaintiff for a consideration of $400, then paid, which was equal to the amount then due upon the note, the interest having been paid to Barnard up to the date of the assignment. The written assignment of the note and mortgage, made on a separate paper, contained the following clause: "And the party of the first (assignor) does hereby make, constitute, and appoint the said party of the second part his true and lawful attorney, irrevocable, in his name or otherwise, but at the proper costs and charges of the said party of the second part, to have, use, and take all lawful ways and means for the recovery of the said money and interest." On December 31, 1889, the authorities of the town of San Buenaventura claimed to have levied a street assessment of $163.20 upon the mortgaged lot in favor of one Safford, who demanded payment thereof, and threatened to foreclose it as a lien upon the lot; whereupon plaintiff, as he alleges, to protect his mortgage interest, took from Safford an assignment of the street assessment and the alleged lien therefor, and paid Safford the amount of the assessment.

Plaintiff commenced this action on February 14, 1891, to foreclose both the street assessment and the mortgage, alleging substantially the facts above stated, and, in addition thereto, that Barnard indorsed the mortgage note; and praying judgment against the defendants for the amount due upon the note and mortgage for principal and interest; that the mortgaged premises be sold for cash, subject to the lien of the street assessment, "or, in default thereof, that the proceeds of said sale be appropriated and applied to the costs and expenses thereof, to the payment of the costs of this action and attorneys' fees therein, to the payment and discharge of said assessment and the amounts due thereon, and that the balance of said proceeds be applied to the payment of the amount due the plaintiff herein; * * * and that said plaintiff may have judgment and execution against the said defendant Charles Barnard for any deficiency," etc. The answer of defendants, other than Barnard, admits the facts stated in the complaint, and prays that any surplus of the proceeds, "after satisfying the judgment of the plaintiff herein," be paid to them; but, if there remains no surplus, that they "may go hence without costs," etc. The defendant Barnard, in his answer, denied that he indorsed the note. Admits that his name was written to a receipt indorsed upon the note for interest paid him before he assigned the note, but denies that it was written or intended as an indorsement of the note to plaintiff. Denies all the averments of the complaint relating to the street assessment. Alleges that at the time of the assignment the value of the mortgaged property was $800, and that plaintiff neglected to enforce payment of the note by suit or otherwise, nine months after the assignment, during which period he might have foreclosed the mortgage, and thereby realized the whole amount due thereon before the alleged street assessment was levied, and that since said assessment the property has greatly depreciated in value. Findings of fact were waived. The court decreed a sale of the mortgaged premises by the sheriff and from the proceeds ordered the sheriff to pay to the plaintiff $512,—the amount found to be due on the note and mortgage,—and from the surplus, if any, to pay plaintiff the further sum of $188.36 for principal and interest of the street assessment; and, should a surplus still remain, that it be paid into court for the defendants other than Barnard. And the court further ordered and adjudged that, if the money proceeds of the sale should be insufficient to pay the note and mortgage, the sheriff return the deficiency, and that the clerk docket a judgment therefor against the defendant Barnard alone, and that the other defendants be free from all liability for such deficiency. The plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment, upon the naked judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions.

1. It is contended that the court erred in directing the proceeds of the sale to be first applied to the payment of the note and mortgage. That the street assessment should have been first paid, and that a judgment should have been docketed against Barnard for the deficiency of the proceeds of the sale to pay both the assessment and the mortgage, since he was liable for both, and the mortgage was subject to the assessment. This, however, involves the untenable assumption that the street assessment was valid. Barnard denied the validity of that assessment, and the presumption, from the judgment roll containing no bill of exceptions nor findings of fact, must be that the court found in his favor upon the issue as to the validity of the street assessment. That the court allowed the street assessment as against the other defendants, who were the owners of the mortgaged property, is accounted for by the fact that they, in their separate answer, expressly admitted "the truth of the allegations in the complaint contained."

2. It is contended for appellant that the court erred in refusing plaintiff a judgment for costs. This point has no foundation in the record. It merely appears that there is no judgment for costs. It does not appear that plaintiff filed or served any cost bill, and it cannot be presumed that he did. Riddell v. Harrell, 71 Cal. 254, 12 Pac. Rep. 67; Thompson v. Brannan, 76 Cal. 618, 18 Pac. Rep. 783. Nor does it appear that he in any manner moved the court, either before or after final judgment, to allow him costs. But if the court erred in denying him costs before final judgment, the error should have been shown by bill of exceptions or statement on motion for new trial. Muir v. Meredith, 82 Cal. 19, 22 Pac. Rep. 1080. Had the court made an erroneous order after final judgment relating to costs, the only remedy would be by appeal from such order. Empire, etc., Co. v. Bonanza, etc., Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 Pac. Rep. 810. Upon the record here it must be presumed that the judgment is correct. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CAHILL v. MURPHY. (No. 14,047.)

SLANDER—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In an action for slander, evidence of the number and ages of plaintiff's children is competent, since she is entitled to damages for mental suffering, and such suffering may have been increased by the fear that her family would suffer by reason of the slander; but evidence that the children are dependent on her for support is inadmissible.

2. The fact that plaintiff, in an action for slander, after testifying, as was permissible, as to the number and ages of her children, was erroneously allowed to testify that they were dependent on her for support, is not ground for reversing a judgment entered on a verdict in her favor, where the verdict is not excessive, and the jury are not shown to have been influenced by the testimony.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Mary Cahill against Daniel Murphy for slander. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank McGowan, for appellant. Weaver & Crowe, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an action for slander. The complaint alleges, in substance, that on or about the 21st day of September, 1889, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff, with her children, occupied certain rooms in an hotel of which the defendant was owner and proprietor; that one of these rooms was situated on the ground floor of the hotel, and used by her for the purpose of carrying on and conducting a general merchandising business; that on said last-mentioned date, the soot in the chimney leading from the room used as a store became ignited, causing an alarm of fire to be given; and it is further alleged, upon information and belief, that the fire was communicated to the soot in the chimney from a fire in the stove situated in said store. The slanderous words, out of which this action arose, are alleged to have been falsely and maliciously spoken by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, and are laid as follows: "This is twice you [the plaintiff meaning] have tried to burn us [the said hotel meaning] out to get your fourteen hundred dollars insurance. But I will report you [the said plaintiff meaning] to the insurance company to-morrow morning, and have your insurance taken away from you." It is further alleged that the defendant, by the use of these words, intended to convey the meaning that the plaintiff willfully and maliciously communicated the fire to the soot in said chimney, and that by so doing she was guilty of an attempt to commit the crime of arson, and that they were so understood by those in whose presence they were uttered, to the damage of plaintiff's character and business in the sum of $10,000. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which, upon the grounds stated, was properly overruled. Defendant thereupon answered, specifically denying the material allegations of the complaint, and, upon the issues thus joined, plaintiff had verdict and judgment for $1,200.

The only error complained of, which we deem it necessary to consider, relates to the ruling of the court upon defendant's objection to the following question propounded to plaintiff on her examination in chief as a witness, and after she had testified, without objection, that she had "a family of four children." "Question. How many of them are dependent upon you for support?" (Objected to on the ground that the question 'is incompetent and immaterial.' The objection was overruled by the court, and defendant excepted.) Answer. Three are dependent upon me at present." It is claimed that the effect and purpose of this testimony was to arouse the sympathies and sentimental feelings of the jury, to the prejudice of defendant's case, by the introduction of an element that did not belong to it, and which the jury could not properly consider in the assessment of damages. In Rhodes v. Naglee, 66 Cal. 681, 6 Pac. Rep. 863, the ruling of the court below permitting the plaintiff, against defendant's objection, to prove that he was a married man, and had a family, was held not to be erroneous. And in Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. Rep. 179, the mother of the plaintiff was allowed to testify as to the number of her children, their ages, and the death of her husband. The rule laid down by this court in Rhodes v. Naglee, supra, and cited with approval in Dixon v. Allen, supra, rests upon the principle (although not stated) that, as mental suffering entitled the plaintiff to compensation in cases of this character, such suffering may be increased, and the damages consequently enhanced, by the fact that the members of the plaintiff's family would suffer by reason of the disgrace visited upon her by the slanderous charge. It was therefore competent in this case, on the question of damages, and for that purpose only, to prove the number and ages of plaintiff's children; but that they were dependent on her for support was irrelevant, and not within the issues raised by the pleadings; therefore erroneous. But was it such a material error as would justify a reversal? The rule in this state is well settled that injury will be presumed from error unless the record affirmatively shows to the contrary. It was competent, as we have stated, for the plaintiff to prove the number and ages of her children, and, if it appeared from the evidence that they were minors, the presumption would be that they were naturally and legally dependent on her for support. The effect, therefore, of such evidence would be the same as if proven by direct testimony. The evidence upon which the verdict was founded shows that the slanderous words charged were spoken wantonly and maliciously. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover of the defendant exemplary or punitive damages, and the assessment of such damages was almost entirely in the discretion of the jury. In view, therefore, of the enormity of the charge, and the situation of the parties, the plaintiff being a defenseless woman, coupled with the amount of damages awarded by the jury as compared with the sum sued for, we are satisfied that the jury was not influenced by this evidence prejudicially to the defendant's case. The verdict might well have been for a much larger sum, and yet not obnoxious to the objection that it was excessive. In this case we think the evidence immaterial, and its admission by the court a mere technical error. People v. Fick, 89 Cal. 144, 26 Pac. Rep. 759. The judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: Temple, C.; Foote, C.

Byrne v. Byrne. (No. 14,567.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 25, 1892.)

Action against Estate — Administrator both as Plaintiff and Defendant.

Where some of the heirs of a decedent bring an action against the administratrix of the estate, who is also one of the plaintiffs, to recover money from the estate, defendant is not qualified to represent the other heirs and the creditors of the estate, and a judgment for plaintiffs, without all the heirs and creditors having been made parties, is erroneous.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 29 Pac. Rep. 1115.

Per Curiam. This cause having been considered by the court in bank in connection with the respondent's petition for a rehearing, the opinion and judgment of the department is modified as follows: All of said opinion following the words quoted from the case of Brown v. Mann, 12 Pac. Rep. 51, and the judgment, are stricken out, and the following substituted: According to the principle of this decision, Mary F. Byrne being disqualified to represent the interest of the heirs and creditors of the estate by reason of her adverse interest as claimant under the alleged trust, it was necessary to make all creditors of the estate, as well as all heirs, parties to the action. The record does not show that all creditors were made parties, and the judgment is therefore erroneous. The inability of Mary F. Byrne to appear as one of the parties plaintiff and also as a party defendant, by reason of the antagonism of her interests in the two capacities, can be obviated by following the course pointed out in section 382, Code Civil Proc. For these reasons the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to allow the plaintiffs to amend their complaint by making the necessary parties defendant; and it is so ordered.

Rehearing denied.

Tyler v. Mayre et al. (No. 13,043.)

Trust—Attorneys—Limitations—Witnesses.

1. The owner of a note, who had brought suit on it against the maker, assigned the note, together with all the avails of the suit, to a trustee for the purpose of securing certain persons who had become sureties for him upon a bond, "first deducting and paying out of any money that may be realized all charges for costs and attorney's fees." Held, that such assignment created a trust in favor of the assignor's attorney for his fees and disbursements for costs in the suit on the note. 27 Pac. Rep. 160, affirmed. Sharpstein, J., dissenting.

2. Upon the death of such trustee the trust devolves upon his administrator, whose liability to the attorney may be enforced by suit. 27 Pac. Rep. 160, affirmed.

3. The attorney's right of action to enforce such trust is not within the purview of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1493, which limits the time for presenting against the estates of decedents claims arising upon contract. 27 Pac. Rep. 160, affirmed.

4. In an action against the administrator of a trustee and the administrator of the trustor to enforce the execution of the trust by the former, Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1880, which makes parties in actions upon claims against decedents incompetent as witnesses as against the representatives of the decedent, renders the plaintiff an incompetent witness to prove the contract between himself and the trustor, by virtue of which he became the cestui que trust. 27 Pac. Rep. 160, overruled.

In bank. On rehearing.

Per Curiam. After hearing in bank we are satisfied with the conclusion reached in department, and with the opinion therein delivered by Commissioner Vanclief, 27 Pac. Rep. 160; and for the reasons stated in such opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

De Haven, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment of reversal, but dissent from that part of the opinion which holds that the court erred in sustaining the objection made to plaintiff's offer to show by his own testimony that it was "agreed between plaintiff Jane E. Chase and Wm. Irvine, that plaintiff should continue to prosecute the case as attorney for plaintiff, and if he finally succeeded in getting a judgment he should be paid out of the proceeds of said judgment, when collected, a reasonable fee," and the further offer to show by the same testimony what was agreed at the same time in reference to the written agreement referred to in the testimony of witness Reinstein.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J

SHARPSTEIN, J., (dissenting.) There are four assignments of error herein, two of which are based upon the refusal of the court to permit plaintiff to testify to matters of fact occurring before the death of Jane E. Chase, deceased, whose administratrix, Clara J. Slater, was a defendant in the action. The only question which arises upon the exceptions to the rulings of the court upon the objections to the competency of the plaintiff to testify as to the matters of fact occurring before the death of Jane E. Chase is whether the action is prosecuted against the administratrix of her estate upon claim or demand against said estate. The complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against said administratrix, and the plaintiff prays for judgment; that there is due him from defendant Clara J. Slater, as administratrix of Jane E. Chase, deceased, the sum of $1,570, payable out of the amount due on a judgment recovered in the action of said Jane E. Chase against one Evoy, in the prosecution of which plaintiff alleges that he rendered the services as the attorney of said Jane E. Chase, for which he claims there is due him from the administratrix of said estate said sum of $1,570. The circumstance of his asking to have it adjudged that said amount is payable out of the amount due on said judgment does not change the character of the claim. If it is not a claim against the estate it cannot be adjudged payable out of a judgment belonging to the estate. The plaintiff was not a competent witness to prove the facts which he offered to prove by his own evidence, and the court properly sustained the objection to his testifying to said facts. Section 1880, Code Civil Proc. The court did not err in permitting the defendants to prove by the witness Reinstein that he had seen a written agreement between plaintiff and Jane E. Chase in which it was stipulated that plaintiff should receive $250 or $300 for his services in the action of Chase v. Evoy. The finding of the court that Jane E. Chase did not assign anything to William Irvine in trust for the purpose of paying to plaintiff for his services as her attorney, or for the purpose of paying him any charge or claim whatsoever, is, in my opinion, justified by the evidence. In the assignment of Jane E. Chase to Irvine the plaintiff is once, and only once, mentioned. After declaring that the assignment is made in trust for the following uses, intents, and purposes, to wit, there follows this clause: "To secure Geo. W. Tyler and H. K. W. Clark their and each of their heirs, executors, and administrators, for their respective obligations and liabilities incurred by them, and either of them, as the bondsmen of the party of the first part, as administratrix of the estate of M. S. Chase, deceased, made and delivered on her appointment as such administratrix, and also to secure any other substitutes of said bondsmen, or either of them, to be hereafter substituted as her bondsmen in the matter of her administration of said estate, first deducting and paying out of any moneys that may be realized out of said claims all charges for costs and attorneys' fees and charges, to provide for the payment of which this assignment and transfer is also made." I fail to discover any intention to assign the claim against Evoy in trust for the payment of plaintiff's fees and charges for prosecuting an action to recover the same. Therefore, in my judgment, the finding that no such assignment was made or trust created should not be disturbed. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

CITY OF SANTA CRUZ v. ENRIGHT et al.

(No. 13,667)

CONDEMNING WATERS—RIGHT OF CITY—NECESSITY—PRESUMPTION OF GOVERNMENT TITLE — EXPERT EVIDENCE.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that all cities shall be controlled by general laws; and Civil Code, § 1001, and Code Civil Proc. § 1238, providing that any person may by exercise of eminent domain acquire private property for the use of "canals, aqueducts, flumes, ditches, or pipes for conducting water for the use of the inhabitants" of any city,—a city, though not authorized by its charter so to do, may condemn the waters of a creek for the use of its inhabitants.

2. Where the waters of the creeks from which a water company receives its supply are insufficient in the summer time to supply the present wants of the inhabitants of a growing city to whom the company furnishes water, the city shows a necessity for condemning the waters of a stream sufficient in quantity and superior in quality, all other streams nearer the city being used by the water company.

3. In favor of one's claim of right in the waters of a creek by appropriation there is no presumption that at the time of the appropriation the lands were public lands, the provision of Act March 26, 1856, authorizing such presumption, being only for the protection of settlers, and to quiet land titles,

4. There being sufficient and uncontradicted evidence to prove defendant's title by prescription to the use of the waters of a creek, the rejection of evidence that his grantor conspicuously posted a notice at the point where he subsequently built a flume diverting the waters, stating that he claimed the waters to a certain extent for irrigation and domestic purposes, was harmless error.

5. There is no error in rejecting the testimony of one asked to give his opinion as an expert as to the effect of irrigation on lands in the mountains of Santa Cruz, it appearing that his experience had been confined to the southern part of Santa Clara county, and that he had never been on the lands under consideration except for a day in the winter; it being necessary, under such circumstances, to show that conditions as to climate, soil, topography, and rainfall were the same in both places, of which the court cannot take judicial notice.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCann, Judge.

Action by the city of Santa Cruz against James Enright and others to condemn waters of a creek. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Defendants' fifth and sixth requested instructions were: (5) "It is a fact admitted in this case that the Santa Cruz Water Company is a corporation organized for the purpose of supplying the city of Santa Cruz and its inhabitants with pure, fresh water, and that said company has acquired, and now holds title to, and the right to divert, the waters of Major's creek and both branches of Branciforte creek for the purpose of so supplying said city and its inhabitants. In view of this admitted fact, the court instructs you that the city of Santa Cruz has the power to acquire from said company the waters of said streams, either by purchase or condemnation; and if you find from the evidence that the waters from said streams are sufficient to supply said city and the inhabitants thereof with water, and you further find that both said streams are in much closer proximity to said city than Laguna creek, and that they can be brought into and distributed through said city at less expense than the waters of Laguna creek, then the court instructs you that the taking and acquisition of the waters of Laguna creek is not, within the meaning of the law, necessary, and you will find a verdict for the defendants." (6) "If the jury find from the evidence that the waters of Laguna creek, at the point at which it is proposed to divert them, are eleven miles distant from the city of Santa Cruz, and they further find that, much nearer than this to said city, are the waters of Major's creek, and of both branches of Branciforte creek, and that said Major's creek and Branciforte creek afford a perennial flow of pure, fresh water, sufficient to supply said city and its inhabitants with pure, fresh water, and the jury further find that the waters of Major's creek and Branciforte creek have already been diverted and appropriated to and are being used for the purpose of supplying said city and the inhabitants thereof with water, then the court instructs you that the acquisition of the waters of Laguna creek is not necessary for the supply of said city and its inhabitants, and the jury will find a verdict for the defendants."

D. M. Delmas, (Jos. M. Shirm, of counsel,) for appellants. W. D. Storey, (Fox & Kellogg, of counsel,) for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to condemn the waters of Laguna creek, a small stream in Santa Cruz county, for the purpose of supplying the wants of plaintiff and its inhabitants. The defendant Enright is the owner of a tract of land lying below the point of the proposed diversion, and bounded on the northwest for about three miles by the creek. The defendant Enright claims that there is neither any authority nor any necessity for the exercise of the power of eminent domain, but that, if such authority exist, he is entitled to compensation for the injury he will sustain, not only as a riparian proprietor, but as a prior appropriator and owner by prescription. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff on the main issues, and assessed the defendant Enright's compensation at $8,000, and the damages to be paid to each of the other defendants who claimed some interest in the property at $1. The defendants Enright and Sylva moved for a new trial. The motion was denied, and they have appealed from the order and from the judgment.

It may be conceded for the purposes of this decision that the charter of the city of Santa Cruz confers no authority upon the municipal authorities to condemn water for the use of the inhabitants of the city. Its warrant for the exercise of the power is found in the constitution and general laws of the state. Section 6, art. 11, of the constitution, provides that "cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted, by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." Section 1001, Civil Code, provides that "any person may, without further legislative action, acquire private property for any use specified in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, either by consent of the owner, or by proceedings had under the provisions of * * * the Code of Civil Procedure." Section 1238, Code Civil Proc., provides that the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following uses: "(3) * * * Canals, aqueducts, flumes, ditches, or pipes for conducting water for the use of the inhabitants of any county, incorporated city, or city and county, village, or town." These provisions of the Codes are "general laws," applicable to municipal corporations which were formed before, as well as to those which were formed after, the adoption of the constitution of 1879. Thomason v. Ashworth, 73 Cal. 73, 14 Pac. Rep. 615; People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 446, 18 Pac. Rep. 413; Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. Rep. 604. In the case last cited our chief justice, speaking for the whole court, said: "It follows, therefore, that under this general law—general in the fullest and widest sense of the term—any public or private corporation, or any natural person, may, for any of the uses defined in section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure, acquire private property without the consent of the owner. * * * But the mode of exercising the power of eminent domain, and the conditions upon which it may be invoked, are no part of municipal organization. They are the subject of general laws, applicable to every person alike, and the legislature has no power to make arbitrary discriminations in this respect between different classes of persons." Although the precise point to which these remarks were addressed in that case was the right of the legislature to impose upon cities of the fifth and sixth classes the duty of making an effort to agree with the owner as a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of eminent domain, yet the principles there announced are as applicable to the questions before us herein. If sections 1001 and 1238, supra, are general laws for one purpose, they are general laws for all purposes within the scope of their provisions; and the act of March 19, 1889, which is also a general law, provides how indebtedness for such works may be incurred and paid by municipal corporations. St. 1889, p. 399.

The court did not err in refusing to give the fifth and sixth instructions proposed by the defendant, relating to the question of necessity. The evidence shows that the waters of the creeks from which the Santa Cruz Water Company receives its supply are insufficient in quantity, and a portion of them inferior in quality. They are nearer the city than Laguna creek, and in the winter season afford an abundant supply of water; but in the summer months a large portion of the city is left without water sufficient for domestic purposes, and the population of the city is steadily increasing. Distance is, of course, a matter to be considered, but it is not controlling. One of the engineers testified as follows: "There are four elements to be considered in determining the availability of a stream for supplying a city: First, quality; second, quantity; third, elevation; and, fourth, distance. The waters of the Laguna creek are excellent in quality. Their quantity is abundant; their elevation is sufficient, and their distance,—it is the nearest source of supply to said city after Major's creek and both branches of Branciforte creek."

The instructions of the court on the questions as to the power to condemn, and the necessity claimed to exist, were full, clear, and correct; and, as there was no error in the rulings of the court in admitting or excluding evidence, we are clearly satisfied that the judgment, so far as this branch of the case is concerned, should be affirmed.

It is claimed that the court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant could not acquire any right in the waters of the creek by mere appropriation. This contention cannot be sustained. Alta Land Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 223, 24 Pac. Rep. 645. It does not appear whether the lands through which the stream ran at the time defendant claims to have acquired his right of appropriation were private or public property. If they were public lands of the United States at that time, we think it devolved upon the defendant to show that fact. It is contended that the presumption of law is that in 1873 the lands were public lands of the United States, and Burdge v. Smith, 14 Cal. 380, and Smith v. Doe, 15 Cal. 101, are cited in support of the proposition. We do not think such a presumption can be indulged in favor of the defendant upon his claim of right by appropriation. The decisions in the cases referred to were based upon the provision in the act of March 26, 1856, for the protection of settlers, and to quiet land titles, which reads as follows: "All lands in this state shall be deemed and regarded as public lands until the legal title is shown to have passed from the government to private parties."

During the examination of Gusshe, defendants' grantor, a notice signed by Gusshe, and dated April 14, 1873, stating that said Gusshe claimed the water flowing in Laguna creek to the extent of 125 inches under a 4-inch pressure, for irrigation and domestic purposes, was offered in evidence, and, upon objection of the plaintiff, was excluded, to which ruling the defendants excepted. The defendants offered to show that the notice had been posted in a conspicuous place at the point where Gusshe subsequently built his flume and diverted the waters of the creek, and that within 10 days a copy of the notice was recorded. The offer was rejected, and the defendants again excepted. We think this ruling of the court was erroneous. The notice was admissible on the question of title by prescription. It tended to show that defendant claimed the right to divert the water adversely to all other claimants. In view of the undisputed evidence, however, we do not see how the error could operate to the prejudice of the defendant. As stated by counsel himself in discussing another proposition: "The case was such as to leave no room for any possible doubt on the part of the jury. The evidence upon the adverse character of the diversion and use of the water by the defendant and his predecessor, Gusshe, for a period of over 15 years, was all one way. There was no conflict on the subject,—nothing which could leave any room for doubt. The witness Gusshe, the original owner, testified: 'The diversion of the water for the purposes that I have mentioned has been continued by me uninterruptedly from the time I commenced in 1873 or 1874 until I sold the land to Enright. * * * I diverted that water from the beginning, under a claim of right, openly and notoriously. All my neighbors knew of it, I suppose. No one ever objected to my doing so. I claimed that right as against everybody else on the stream.' The defendant Enright testified that 'he had continued to divert and use upon said land the waters of Laguna creek by means of the flume and ditch mentioned; that said use had been uninterrupted, open, notorious, under a claim of right against the whole world.' No witness whatever was called to contradict this, or to show that the use of the water was by permission, expressed or implied, or was otherwise than adverse." There is not a word of evidence in the record tending to impeach this statement. It is not claimed that Gusshe diverted the water under a license from any one. Gusshe stated that he had no grant from any owner of the land upon the stream to divert the water, nor any permission from any one to do so. Under these circumstances, the defendant was entitled to an instruction directing the jury to find that he had fully sustained by proof his allegation of title by adverse use; and it would have been error if such an instruction had been refused. The evidence being all one way—there being no room for doubt, as stated—on the question of adverse use of the water, we think the ruling of the court could not possibly operate to the prejudice of the defendant. The evidence offered would have been superfluous; it could have added nothing to the case which the defendant had already made on that subject. The jury were fully and fairly instructed upon all of the questions involved in the defendant's plea of title by prescription, and we must assume that they properly considered the evidence relating thereto, and included in their assessment of damages the value of defendant's prescriptive right.

We cannot say that the court erred in excluding the testimony of the witness Ray, called on behalf of the defendant. He was requested to give his opinion as an expert as to the effect of irrigation upon the lands owned by the defendant. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the question, on the ground that the witness was not shown to be competent to testify It appeared that the experience of the witness had been confined to the county of Santa Clara, and that he had never been upon the tract of land owned by the defendant, except for a period of one day in the winter prior to the time of the trial. To entitle the witness to testify it ought to have been shown that the conditions as to climate, soil, topography, and rainfall were the same in the mountains of Santa Cruz as they were in the southern part of Santa Clara county, where the witness resided. The court cannot take judicial notice of such matters.

We have carefully examined the instructions given to the jury, and, while there are two or three sentences obnoxious to criticism, when considered independent of the context, we think the charge of the court fairly presented the law applicable to the questions involved, and that the jurors were not misled by the expressions criticised by appellant. Judgment and order affirmed.

Jatunn v. Smith et al. (No. 13,829.)

Water Courses — Diversion — Prescription—Railroad Grant—When Title Passes.

Acts Cong. July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, granting sections of land to a railroad company in aid of the construction of its road, passed the legal title thereto upon the identification of the land by the survey and location of the road as of the date of the grant, rather than of the issuance of the patent, and consequently the title to land purchased from the company after the issuance of the patent in 1884 was not in the United States in 1874, and by a diversion of water running through it, commenced in the latter year, and continued for the statutory period, a prescriptive right to divert the same was acquired.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by James F. Jatunn against J. M. Smith and another to enjoin the diversion of a stream. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Kitts, for appellant. P. F. Simonds, for respondents.

De Haven, J. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land through which flows a stream of water known as "Wolf Creek," and the defendants, more than five years prior to the commencement of this action, diverted the waters of said stream at a point above where it enters upon the land of plaintiff. This action is brought for the purpose of enjoining the defendants from hereafter taking or diverting any of the waters of said stream, and for a judgment that plaintiff is entitled to have the stream flow down its natural bed and across the land of plaintiff. In their answer the defendants allege that plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and from this judgment he appeals. The land owned by plaintiff is an odd-numbered section which was granted to the Central Pacific Railroad Company to aid in the construction of its road by the acts of congress of July 1, 1862, (12 St. at Large, p. 489,) and July 2, 1864, (13 St. at Large, p. 356,) and the patent therefor did not issue to the railroad company until April, 1884, which was less than five years before this action was brought. The railroad, however, was constructed from Sacramento to the Nevada state line, and fully completed and equipped in the manner prescribed by said acts of congress as early as November 3, 1869, and this fact was on that day properly certified to by the commissioners appointed by the president for the purpose of examining and reporting in relation to the construction of said road, as is shown by the recitals contained in the patent. The title of plaintiff to the land owned by him is founded upon a deed executed to him by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, in December, 1884, after it obtained its patent from the United States. The defendants diverted the waters of Wolf creek in 1874, and it is not claimed by the appellant that the evidence given upon the trial in the superior court was insufficient to show that such diversion was thereafter continued under claim of right and under such circumstances as to ripen into a prescriptive right in defendants if the statute of limitations commenced to run in their favor prior to the date of the patent issued by the United States to his grantor, the railroad company. The contention of appellant is that the United States, by its patent, conveyed to the railroad company the legal title to the land now owned by him, with all its natural riparian rights as they existed at the date of the definite location of the railroad, and that as defendants could not hold adversely to the United States they can derive no advantage from their acts of diversion and user prior to the date of the United States patent. It was held by this court in the case of Mathews v. Ferrea, 45 Cal. 51, that there could be no successful assertion of a claim to a prescriptive right to divert waters from a stream to the injury of a riparian proprietor below who had acquired his title from the United States within five years, the court, in its opinion, saying that "prescription or adverse user will not mature into a title as against the United States, and that it will not avail as a defense unless the user has been adverse for the requisite period after the title passed from the United States." There can be no doubt of the correctness of the rule as thus declared. The general government is not subject to the jurisdiction of the state, and the latter is without power to prescribe the time within which the United States shall assert its rights in order to preserve them, and it must be regarded as settled that the statute of limitations of a state does not apply to the government of the United States, and, as a consequence, that there can be no adverse possession of land under such a law or adverse user of water to the natural flow of which such land is entitled while the title remains in the United States. Fremont v. Seals, 18 Cal. 434; Nessler v. Bigelow, 60 Cal. 98; Gardiner v. Miller, 47 Cal. 570; Treadway v. Wilder, 12 Nev. 108; Gibson v. Choteau, 13 Wall. 98. But we are unable to agree to the proposition contended for by appellant, that the legal title to the land owned by him remained in the United States until the issuance of the patent therefor to the Central Pacific Railroad Company in 1884, and that the effect of such patent was to then convey to the railroad company the legal title to such land with all the riparian rights which belonged to it at the time of the definite location of the line of such railroad. On the contrary, the grant of land to that company by the acts of congress of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of its road, was a grant in præsenti of every alternate section of land not reserved by such granting acts, passing the legal title thereto as of the date of the grant as soon as those sections were identified by a legal survey and the definite location of the road for which the grant was made.

In defining the nature of the grant made by the acts of congress just mentioned, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U. S. 241, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158, say: "As the sections granted were to be within a certain distance on each side of the line of the contemplated railroad, they could not be located until the line of the road was fixed. The grant was therefore in the nature of a 'float;' but when the route of the road was definitely fixed the sections granted became susceptible of identification, and the title then attached as of the date of the grant, except as to such parcels as had been in the mean time under its provisions appropriated to other purposes. * * * The terms used in the granting clause of the act of congress, and the interpretations thus given to them, exclude the idea that they are to be treated as words of contract or promise, rather than, as they naturally import, as words indicating an immediate transfer of interest. The title transferred is a legal title, as distinguished from an equitable or inchoate interest." See, also, Denny v. Dodson, 32 Fed. Rep. 899, and Forrester v. Scott, 92 Cal. 398, 28 Pac. Rep. 575, in which similar grants are construed in the same manner. And it was further held in the case from which we have just quoted that, although the acts of congress above referred to provide for the issuance of patents to the railroad company for the lands granted, upon the conditions therein named, such patents are not needed to convey the legal title to such lands, and it was not contemplated by those acts that they should be issued for any such purpose. Upon this point the court said: "While not essential to transfer the legal right, the patents would be evidence that the grantee had complied with the conditions of the grant, and to that extent that the grant was relieved from possibility of forfeiture for breach of its conditions. They would serve to identify the lands as coterminous with the road completed; they would obviate the necessity of any other evidence of the grantee's right to the lands; and they would be evidence that the lands were subject to the disposal of the railroad company with the consent of the government. They would be thus, in the grantee's hands, deeds of further assurance of his title, and therefore a source of peace and quiet to him in his possession." It necessarily follows from this view of the nature of the grant made to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by the acts of congress before mentioned, the position of appellant, that upon the completion of its railroad such company became only the equitable owner of the lands granted to it, and that the United States thereafter held the legal title to such lands in trust for it until the issuance of the patents provided for by said acts of congress, cannot be sustained. The land owned by plaintiff is an odd-numbered section, and the legal title to it passed from the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company when identified by a survey and the definite location of the line of its road. The title passed by the words of grant contained in the acts of congress, and not by the patent subsequently issued to it. When the legal title to land is granted by act of congress, the title of the government is as effectively divested as it would be by the issuance of a patent therefor by the executive department, under authority of law, and such land then becomes subject to the limitation laws of the state in which it is situated, and an adverse possession thereof after the date of such grant for the requisite period fixed by such laws will ripen into a legal title in favor of the adverse possessor, and the effect of such possession is not interrupted or defeated by the subsequent issuance of a patent therefor in pursuance of such act of congress. Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. 521; Longlois v. Crawford, 59 Mo. 456; Peting v. De Lore, 71 Mo. 1; Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78. The recitals contained in the patent under which plaintiff claims show that the line of the Central Pacific Railroad Company was definitely located prior to November 3, 1869, and that the company on July 26, 1882, filed with the register and receiver at Sacramento a selection of plaintiff's land, under the acts of congress before referred to, and that such selection was on that day properly certified to or approved by such register and receiver. These recitals are sufficient proof of the fact that the land was at the date of such selection surveyed by authority of the United States, and identified as land to which the grant made to that company had then attached, and that the costs of such survey, and other fees required by law, had been paid by such company. This being the case, it must be held, in accordance with the views contained in this opinion, that the legal title to such land was at that time vested in the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and the defendants, by their continued diversion of the waters of Wolf creek thereafter, under claim of right, until the commencement of this action in 1889, a period of more than five years, have acquired a prescriptive right to do so. Judgment and order affirmed.

SPENCE v. SCOTT et al. (No. 14,969.)

FORECLOSURE—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—STAY ON APPEAL.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 945, where a deficiency judgment is rendered on the foreclosure of a mortgage the proceedings will not be stayed if the appeal bond fails to provide for the payment of such deficiency.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by E. F. Spence, trustee, against Jesup W. Scott, Henry I. Kowalsky, and others, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Kowalsky applies for a stay of proceedings pending appeal. Application dismissed.

David Friedenrich, for petitioner. A. B. Hotchkiss and Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause is now before us upon the application of appellant, Kowalsky, for an order restraining the sheriff of Los Angeles county from executing a deed to respondent pursuant to a foreclosure sale, upon the ground that said Kowalsky has appealed to this court from the judgment of foreclosure, and has executed an undertaking on appeal, which stays all proceedings. A temporary order was made so restraining the sheriff pending the hearing and determination of the application. It appears now that the decree of foreclosure included a deficiency judgment, and that the undertaking on appeal in this case does not provide for the payment of such deficiency. It was substantially decided in the case of Johnson v. King, 91 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. Rep. 644, that in such a case the appellant, whosoever he may be, if he desires a stay of proceedings, must give an undertaking for the deficiency. And that case is not in conflict with either Association v. Wilkins, 64 Cal. 379, 1 Pac. Rep. 348, or Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal. 337, cited by appellant. In the former case an opinion seems to have been first rendered in department, but a hearing in bank was ordered, and in the opinion of the court in bank the point involved here was not determined; while Englund v. Lewis is strictly in accord with Johnson v. King. It is true that in Johnson v. King the appellant was in possession, although he was not the mortgagor, and there was no deficiency judgment against him; but it was held that the provision applies to all appellants. Section 945, Code Civil Proc., is entirely clear upon the subject. It provides that a judgment of foreclosure shall not be stayed unless there be an undertaking "on the part of the appellant" to the effect, among other things, that "when the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency." The temporary restraining order is discharged, and the application is dismissed.

GREEN v. HEBBARD, Judge. (No. 15,071.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE—REFUSAL TO FIX AMOUNT OF BOND.

Mandamus will lie to a judge to compel him to fix the amount of a bond, by a person having a right to appeal, necessary to stay the operation of a writ of possession under Code Civil Proc. § 945.

Department 2.

Mandamus by Green against Hebbard, judge of the superior court. Granted.

T. M. Osmond, for petitioner. E. F. Fitzpatrick, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is entitled to appeal from the order denying her motion to vacate or modify the order made in the action of Hyde v. Boyle, 29 Pac. Rep. 247, for the writ of possession. People v. Grant, 45 Cal. 97; City of San Jose v. Fulton, Id. 316. Having the right of appeal, it is the duty of the respondent, upon her application, to fix the amount of the undertaking necessary to stay the operation of the writ of possession under section 945 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We cannot, upon this present application, consider whether the court was right or wrong in its ruling upon petitioner's motion to vacate or modify the order for the issuance of the writ of possession, as the questions which would be involved in such an appeal are not before us. Ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

BERRY et al. v. KOWALSKY, (two cases. Nos. 13,116, 13,309.)

CONTRACT TO PURCHASE — NONPERFORMANCE BY PURCHASER—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint averred that plaintiff paid defendant for the privilege of delivering to him a quantity of wheat at a stated price, set forth a receipt signed by defendant wherein it was acknowledged that in consideration of the money so paid defendant allowed plaintiff "the privilege of delivering" the alleged quantity of "S | 87 wheat," and alleged that defendant refused to receive and pay for the same. Held, that it sufficiently showed a contract on defendant's part to receive and pay for the wheat, and was not demurrable because it did not aver the meaning of the words "S | 87 wheat," which could be explained by parol.

2. An alleged contract to buy a quantity of "S | 87 wheat," on which an action was brought for the refusal of the purchaser to receive and pay for the wheat, was written on paper on which was printed the rules of a produce exchange and call board, of which plaintiff had been, and his agent, who effected the contract, was, a member, and in which defendant owned a seat, though he had temporarily leased it. There was evidence that the words "S | 87 wheat" was an abbreviation used in the call board; that it meant that the seller was to have the season of 1887 in which to complete the contract; and that it meant that "No. 1 wheat" should be delivered. From other evidence it appeared that it meant that the wheat was not to be delivered, but merely "call-board contracts." Held, that the testimony of plaintiff that the printed words constituted no part of the contract; that he had never read them; and that the contract had no connection with the produce exchange,—was admissible, as was also for defendant that of a member of the produce exchange, who heard the preliminary negotiations, as to whether or not the contract was a "call-board contract," and was to be performed under the rules of the exchange and call board.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. F. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by F. G. Berry and another against E. H. Kowalsky. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thornton & Merzbach, for appellant. Whittemore & Sears, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. "There are two appeals in this case upon distinct records. No. 13,116 is from the final judgment, and upon the judgment roll. No. 13,309 is from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, upon a record consisting of a statement of the case in addition to the judgment roll. On the appeal from the judgment it is contended that the court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint, and that the findings do not support the judgment. On the appeal from the order the errors assigned are errors in law occurring at the trial. The following is a copy of the verified complaint: 'The said plaintiffs complain of the said defendant, and for cause of action herein allege: That on the 15th day of July, 1887, the plaintiffs paid to defendant the sum of one hundred dollars for the right and privilege of delivering to defendant five hundred tons of wheat at any time within thirty days from said 15th day of July, at the rate of one dollar and eighty cents per cental. Said contract is in the following words and figures, to wit: "San Francisco, July 15, 1887. Received of A. Gerberding one hundred dollars, for which I allow him the privilege of delivering me at any time, within thirty days from date, five hundred tons S | 87 wheat, at one dollar and eighty cents per cental. E. H. KOWALSKY." That said contract was made in the name of A. Gerberding, as the agent of plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs were and still are the real parties in interest. That said plaintiffs, on the 13th day of August, 1887, in the said city and county of San Francisco, at the office of said defendant, tendered the delivery of said five hundred tons of wheat to said defendant, and performed all the conditions on their part under said contract. Said plaintiffs then and there demanded from said defendant the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, payment as the price of said wheat according to said contract; that said defendant denied having purchased said wheat, and refused to pay for said wheat, to the damage of plaintiffs in the sum of eighteen thousand dollars. That said plaintiffs made said contract with said defendant in good faith for the purpose of delivering said wheat to said defendant, and had said wheat in warehouse in San Francisco for the purpose of delivering the same on said contract to said defendant. Wherefore plaintiffs pray for judgment against said defendant in the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, interest, and costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as justice may require. WHITTEMORE & SEARS, Att'ys for Plaintiffs.' This complaint was demurred to on the grounds (1) that it is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, in that 'no meaning is alleged of the words "S | 87" in the contract;' and (2) that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The alleged contract is not, does not purport to be, and is not alleged to be, an agreement 'to sell and buy;' nor an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs to sell wheat at any time. It imposes upon the plaintiffs no obligation to be performed by them. If it be a valid contract, it is an agreement by the defendant, for an executed consideration, to buy and accept delivery of, from the plaintiffs, a certain quantity of wheat, within a certain period of time, for a certain price, at the option of the plaintiffs, and to pay plaintiffs the price therefor. Civil Code, §§ 1726–1730; Whart. Cont. § 453*a*. Nor is the action brought to recover the price or value of wheat 'sold and delivered,' or 'bargained and sold,' but to recover damages for defendant's breach of his alleged conditional agreement to buy the wheat at plaintiffs' option.

"1. As against a general demurrer, I think the facts expressed and implied in the complaint barely constitute a cause of action. The written instrument set out purports to have been signed by the defendant, and it is designated as the contract for the breach of which (afterwards alleged) the action is brought. This implies that it was executed by the defendant. The instrument admits the receipt of a consideration of $100, for which defendant 'allows' (gives) plaintiffs the 'privilege' (option) to deliver (or not) to defendant, within thirty days, 500 tons of wheat, 'at (the price of) one dollar and eighty cents per cental.' The giving of the privilege to deliver the wheat to defendant at a certain price implies that he will receive and pay for it the price specified. The foregoing, I think, is the only admissible construction of the instrument as pleaded. If it will not bear this construction, it can have no effect as an agreement. As a breach of this agreement it is alleged that within thirty days the plaintiffs tendered a delivery of the wheat, and demanded payment of the price, thus creating the condition upon which defendant's liability depended, and that defendant refused to pay the price. This shows a breach of the agreement, for which the plaintiffs were entitled to such damages as proximately resulted therefrom.

"2. The grounds of the special demurrer, that the 'complaint is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain,' do not appear on the face of the complaint. The words or abbreviations, 'S | 87,' appear to have been used as descriptive of the wheat, and to require oral evidence of their customary meaning in the business of dealing in wheat; but such oral evidence need not be stated in a pleading in which the written agreement is set out in hæc verba. The meaning may be proved on the trial for the purpose of enabling the court to interpret the words. Civil Code, §§ 1636, 1644–1646; Callahan v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 476. Had it appeared on the face of the complaint that even with the aid of parol evidence the words 'S | 87,' as used, were meaningless, and that a complete contract was expressed without them, they might have been disregarded as surplusage, —Harrison v. McCormick, (Cal., No. 13,039,) 26 Pac. Rep. 830; and certainly a complete contract is expressed without them. But it does not appear that, read in the light of admissible oral evidence, they are meaningless or unintelligible. So read, they may have a certain, unambiguous meaning, descriptive of the subject of the contract. Therefore the court could not see on the trial of the demurrer that those words were unintelligible, or that their use rendered the complaint ambiguous or uncertain.

"3. The execution of the contract and the breach thereof, as alleged, are found as facts. Therefore the findings support the judgment.

"4. The contract as set out in the complaint being denied, it appears by the statement on motion for new trial that to prove the contract plaintiffs offered in evidence a paper on which was written the alleged contract as pleaded. Above the manuscript, and on the same paper, was printed matter, composed of what was admitted to be extracts from the rules of the produce exchange and call board of San Francisco. The paper was objected to by counsel for defendant on the ground that it varied from the contract as pleaded, the printed matter not being set out in the complaint. Thereupon, for the apparent purpose of proving that the printed matter was no part of the contract, and that the 'contract was entirely independent of the printed heading, the plaintiff Berry, on behalf of plaintiffs, testified to the circumstances under which the contract was made, and to what he claimed to have been all the verbal negotiations (all that was said by each party) preceding and leading up to the signing of the written contract, which, he said, was drawn by him according to the verbal understanding. He was further permitted to testify, against the objection of defendant's counsel, that the 'contract was drawn independent of any connection with what is known as the "Produce Exchange." * * * I was not figuring on the contract on the board. It was business outside. * * * I never read the printed matter on the top of the contract. It had nothing whatever to do with the contract. It is the written portion of this piece of paper that constitutes the entire contract between myself and the defendant.' F. J. Bonney, a witness for the defendant, testified that he was a farmer, and was a member of the produce exchange and call board on or about July 15, 1887, and was somewhat familiar with the rules thereof, and that he was present when the contract in suit was made, and heard the preliminary talk between the parties, but was not present when defendant signed the contract. Thereupon defendant's counsel asked the witness the following questions, each of which was objected to on the ground that the effect of the answer thereto would be to vary the written contract; and the objection to each question was sustained by the court, defendant duly excepting. 'Question. Was there any reference had in the conversation between these parties to what was known as the "Call-Board Contract?" Q. Was anything said about the contract which was to be entered into between the parties being governed or to be complied with or performed under the rules of the San Francisco produce exchange and call board? Q. Was the term "board contract" used in reference to the contract proposed to be executed by them in regard to the dealing in wheat upon which they were entering?' The defendant's counsel also offered in evidence all the rules and regulations of the produce and exchange call board, but upon objection by plaintiffs' counsel they were excluded by the court. It appears that Gerberding (in whose name the contract was made) was a member of the exchange board at the date of the contract. The defendant, at the same time, owned a seat in the board, but was not then occupying it, having leased it temporarily to another person. The plaintiff Berry had formerly been a member of the board. As to whether, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence, the contract could properly be considered a 'board contract,' and as to what extent, if at all, it was governed or affected by the rules and customs of the board, the testimony was conflicting."

The foregoing is adopted from the opinion of Commissioner Vanclief, delivered in department. 27 Pac. Rep. 286.

It is testified that the phrase "S | 87 wheat," used in the contract sued on, is an abbreviation which originated in the call board, where, from the necessities of business, such a phrase is understood to mean what it would take quite a number of words to express in detail. It was testified by most of the witnesses that "S | 87 wheat" meant that the seller was to have the season of 1887 on which to complete his contract, and that it meant also that the wheat should be "No. 1 white wheat." There was also testimony to the point that the said phrase "S | 87 wheat" does not mean that the one party is to actually deliver the amount of wheat stated in the contract, or that the other party is bound to receive it all and pay the whole amount at the stated price; but that the seller is simply to produce what are denominated "Call-Board Contracts" for the wheat, instead of the wheat itself. And owing to the peculiar character of the contract here sued on, and the testimony as to the technical meaning of some of its terms, we think that the court could not arrive at a just decision of the case without knowing whether the printed matter was a part of the contract, whether it should be considered as a "board contract," and whether the phrase "S | 87 wheat" has any meaning other than that given to it by said board, and what that meaning is. The solution of these questions involves matters of fact to be determined upon evidence. We think, therefore, that the testimony of plaintiff Berry, when testifying for plaintiffs, was properly admitted over the objections of defendant, and that the court erred in sustaining objections to the questions asked by defendant of the witness Bonney as above stated, and also in sustaining the objections to the introduction of the rules and regulations of the stock exchange and call board. The contract may turn out to be a pure gambling contract, and therefore void; but from any point of view the said evidence offered by defendant should have been admitted. Judgment and order reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Home for the Care of the Inebriates v. Reis, Treasurer. (No. 13,741.)

Fines—How Applied—Mandamus—When Lies.

1. Act March 17, 1876, (St. 1875–76, p. 325,) provides that the fines, not to exceed $800 in any one month, collected by the police court in the city of San Francisco for drunkenness, shall be paid by the clerk to the Home for the Care of Inebriates. Act March 5, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 62,) § 10, provides for the reorganization of the police court in San Francisco, and declares that all fines collected by that court shall be paid into the treasury of the city by the clerk once a week. Section 13 repeals all acts or parts of acts in conflict therewith. Held, that the latter act did not repeal that part of the former which entitles the home to the fines; and the money paid to the city treasurer to which the home is entitled is held by him for the use of the home. Sharpstein, Paterson, and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

2. Conceding that the act of 1889 does not conflict with the act of 1876, entitling the home to the fines collected by the police court, since no law authorizes the city treasurer, after the money has reached his hands, to pay the same to the home, the remedy of the home is by action, rather than by mandamus. McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Application of the Home for the Care of the Inebriates, a corporation, for mandamus to Christian Reis, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco. The writ was denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Tilden & Tilden, for petitioner. Geo. Flournoy, Jr., and John H Durst, for respondent.
